Hester led him up to the door of the room, where Rose Morley was sitting, and turned the handle with the utmost caution. They gazed in together, unheard and unseen. To Hester's surprise, Robert Waldron was no longer there; but Rose sat in her chair before the fire, with her face hidden in her hands, and sobbing in deep-drawn sobs. Lawson caught his breath, and grasped Hester's hand in an unconscious grip of iron; but she did not utter any cry. They stole down-stairs again into the lobby, and then Hester saw upon his face an expression of complete bewilderment and perplexity. Once more he peered into John Morley's dimly-lighted room; and then, shaking his head doubtfully, he opened the outer door, through which the snow came drifting in in large flakes, and still with a troubled look upon his face he bade the child good-night, and went out into the quiet street.

Again the sunshine had forsaken the home of John Morley, or only visited it in uncertain gleams of fitful brightness. There were seasons when his young wife sought his dull room as if it were a safe refuge, or a holy sanctuary; and sat there silent and inactive in the great antique chair, where Hester's mother had been wont to sit and watch him with fond eyes, while he worked among his beloved books. Once or twice, in his absence of mind, he had spoken to her without looking up, and called her by the other name, still cherished and familiar in his thoughts; and then Rose had started up quickly, and fled from the room, while he had been all unconscious of the blunder of his tongue.

It was a very troubled though profound love which John Morley felt for this girl, so much younger both in life and heart than himself; but it struck deeper roots into his nature every day, in part because it was so troubled. Hester's mother had been his equal, and they had confronted the difficulties of life side by side; mutual helpers, with the self-same thoughts and the self-same hope in the future. This love, which had possessed the equality of friendship, had been a strength to him—a serene satisfaction, which had been all-sufficing while it was his, but the loss of which had robbed him of even his natural energy and content. But for Rose he took the position of a protector and guardian; he stood before her to shield her from the unknown ills of the future.

There was a charm and sweetness in this which had been lacking in the more equal marriage with Hester's mother. Even his anxiety about her spiritual welfare, invested her with deeper and more fascinating interest; and Rose herself would have been startled, and would have shrunk from him in dread, if she could have looked into her husband's heart, and seen how she engrossed his thoughts, his hopes, and his prayers.

She was standing behind his chair one morning, looking down, he could not see how sadly, upon his bowed head, where white lines were mingling with the dark hair. She laid her hand upon it at last, softly and reverently; and as he turned smilingly to her, he caught the expression, half sorrowful and half frightened, imprinted upon her fair face.

"Why, what ails you, my dear?" he asked, putting his arm about her, while Rose sank down upon her knees beside him; "what is the matter with you, my Rose?"

"Nothing, nothing," she sobbed; "only I am such a silly young thing, and you are so wise and good! There is such a dreadful gulf between us two; and it will always be there, forever, and ever, and ever! I shall always be silly and wicked, and you will always be wise and good. Oh, why did you every marry such a creature as me?"

"Why?" said John Morley earnestly; "because I loved you; and I love you still more, Rose, if that be possible, now you have been my wife for more than a year. But it was selfish of me—a man's selfishness; and I do not know how to make you happy now you belong to me."

"No, no, no!" cried Rose, "it was not selfish. It was good, too good of you! You said—or you might have said—to yourself, 'Here is a poor, giddy thoughtless butterfly, just dancing and idling her precious life away; and I, a wise and good man, will take it into my own house, and give all my wisdom and goodness to the task of making it like myself now and in the world to come.' But you cannot; no, you cannot. I ought never to have been the wife of a good man! I ought never, never to have become the mother of little Hetty!"

"Yes, you ought," answered John Morley, stroking the soft hair and the burning cheek which would have dried up any tears, had any fallen upon it; "my house is not the same since you entered it, Rose. You have made us happy, Hester and me; more happy that we can tell you. Is there anything that troubles you specially, my love? Tell me, and if it be within my power the trouble shall be removed. And if it be not, we will pray God together either to take it away, or sanctify it for your good."

"No, there is nothing," answered Rose, kissing his hand again and again, "unless you could take me away from myself, unless you could make me somebody else but the silly, giddy, wicked, good-for-nothing creature I am. If you could only make me like Hester's mother! If you could only make me like Hester!"

GOD'S SIDE OF PRAYER.

S. S. Lesson for March 30. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Few Real Believers in Prayer—Silence when Prayer Reaches Heaven—David's Experience—Why God Does not Answer—God Attends to Details—Causes of Unanswered Prayers—Promises to Children not to Servants—Undoubting Hearts—Constant Urging of the Same Request—Daniel's Persistence—Paul's Unanswered Prayer—Assurance of God's Will.

DOES God hear prayer? The infidel says, No. The majority of believers think He does occasionally. Some who wish to be considered Christians say that if we do our duty in praying we cannot do more; and they seem to think prayer is more a matter of our conscience than God's chosen way of communicating blessings. It is only the few here and there who believe that God is really and always to be counted upon as the Hearer and Answerer of prayer. A little girl took her umbrella to church one intensely hot sunny day, when not a cloud was to be seen; she was laughed at by her friends when she said that it was going to rain, because her father had prayed for rain at family prayer. But the child was wiser than her elders, for the rain came while they were in church, and the little girl's umbrella was the only one among them. She counted on God, and believed that He meant what He said, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in My name, that will I do" (John 14 : 13).

Once God lifts the curtain and shows us prayer when it reaches heaven. "There was about the space of half an hour" (Rev. 8 : 1). What could be of sufficient importance to still every harp and every tongue in heaven? Prayer—"the prayers of all saints." Oh, how can we think that it is running a dangerous risk when, turning from all earthly help, we place our need only but wholly in the hands of God! With the prayers of the saints "incense ascended up before God," it was Christ who gave "Himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savor" (Eph. 5 : 2). God having stilled heaven to hear His children's prayers, casts them by the hand of the angel into the earth, "and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." God will shake the earth, send the tempest, dispose of the elements this way or that, rather than fail to answer one real prayer made in the name of Jesus.

David knew something of the heart of God, when he wrote, near the end of his life, "In my distress I called upon the Lord, and cried unto my God: He heard my voice out of His temple, and my cry came before Him, even into His ears. Then the earth shook and trembled; the foundations also of the hills moved and were shaken, because He was wroth. . . . He bowed the heavens also, and came down." David did not hesitate to say that God moved heaven and earth to answer His child's cry; he saw beyond natural laws and second causes that God thundered and lightened upon his enemies. "He sent from above, He took me, He drew me out of many waters.

HE DELIVERED ME

from my strong enemy, and from them which hated me: for they were too strong for me. . . He brought me forth also into a large place; He delivered me, because He delighted in me" (Ps. 18 : 6–19). The Psalmist says no such thing as we hear said continually by converted people, "I don't think my poor prayers can prevail with God; I don't think I can expect an answer while I am so little in earnest." David's plea was the Father-heart of God—such a Father could not but hear, could not but delight in answering His child. But there are many who fail to hear the answer. They are so occupied with their speaking that they do not listen to Him. He says, "Ask and ye shall receive, that your joy may be full."

It is far from uncommon to receive such requests as the following: "Will you pray for the conversion of my sons? I have had them prayed for at all the daily prayer-meetings which I have heard of, and many Christians are praying for them daily." What idea would this give to an infidel? Surely this, that the God we worship is very hard to move, and needs a great deal of pressure brought upon Him in order to induce Him to rouse Himself from His lethargy, and give some thought to the need of one whom He Himself calls child! An infidel would think that if God were so difficult to influence he would be far better off in shifting for himself as he could than in spending days and months in fruitless petitions to an unwilling God.

"But why does not God answer, and put an end to the matter?" say many whose prayer is of this kind. Dear soul, if He did you would be confirmed in your idea that the earnestness of the prayer or prayers had at last overcome God, and in your heart you would think of Him as the widow did of the unjust judge, you would think that although compassion could not move Him, yet

BECAUSE YOU TROUBLED HIM

He would grant your request! Oh, how different is our God! "Hear what the unjust judge saith. And shall not God (the just Judge) avenge His own elect, which cry day and night unto Him? (Not once in a way as the widow did, but about all which concerns them.) Yea, I say unto you that He will avenge them speedily" not tardily, as the unjust judge did.

We have heard people say sometimes that it is too much to expect of God that He should take an interest in the

of their lives. What does He say Himself? "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving make your requests known unto God" (Phil. 4 : 6); "your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things" (Matt. 6 : 32); "even the very hairs of your head are all numbered" (Luke 12 : 7). Can such a God resemble the man who said to his friend, "Trouble me not: the door is now shut, and my children are with me in bed: I cannot rise and give thee," and who yet was overcome by the importunity of his friend? No; for Jesus adds, "And I say unto you, Ask, and it shall be given you," your Father will not count it a trouble. "Seek and ye shall find," for He is not, as Elijah ironically supposed that Baal was, talking, pursuing, in a journey, or sleeping (1 Kings 18 : 27) "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Ps. 121 : 4); "knock, and it shall be opened unto you," for our Father has no doors closed against His children.

UNANSWERED PRAYERS.

Why, then, are so many prayers left unanswered? Just because so many approach God as though they were His servants, and His promises are made to His children not to servants, and He responds to faith not to merit. "Have faith in God. For verily I say unto you, That whosoever shall say unto this mountain, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea; and shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that those things which he saith shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he saith. Therefore I say unto you, Whatsoever things ye desire, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." Here is the true secret of prevailing prayer, "shall not doubt in his heart;" "believe that ye receive." This honors God, this is to be occupied with Him instead of with our unworthy selves. Thus doing, all thought of compelling God by our earnestness is impossible; our appeal is to what He is and what He says, and even that only in the name of Jesus. But so confidently in the name of Jesus that we cannot conceive of the possibility of God casting out our prayer, for it would be to dishonor the name of His only Son, it would be to falsify His own word and break His own promises.

But, say some, this must do away with the

of the same request? Of course. How can you believe you receive a thing, and continue to ask for it? The asking a second time is a sure sign that you do not believe you have received. You look upon the matter as still undecided, still an open question; and so doing you are not believing that you receive, and therefore not thanking God. "But," you will say, "there are many instances in Scripture of repeated urging of the same request." True; but let us examine them. Daniel prayed three full weeks, and ate no pleasant bread. But it is most noticeable that from the first day of his supplications, at the first mention of his request, his words were heard, and the Angel Gabriel "came for his words;" and it is also very striking that the prince of Persia was permitted to withstand Gabriel exactly the number of days during which Daniel continued to urge his request (Dan. 10 : 2, 3, 12, 13).

It was quite another thing when our blessed Lord was in Gethsemane, and prayed, "saying the same words." It is impossible for any of us ever to be in the same position in which He then was—as the Bearer of sin and its consequences. There may have been some doubt in His heart as to His Father's will whether He should die then and there of a broken heart, for He was "sorrowful even unto death," or whether He should fulfil His mission to the end. Again Paul prayed without ceasing for the Romans and for almost all the churches. But this is only natural; new needs arise from day to day in regard to churches as well as individuals, and thus He carried the needs to God as they arose, and as the Spirit taught him. Once we find him continually urging the same request; it was that he might be permitted to return to Thessalonica and perfect that which was lacking in the faith of his converts there. A prayer which was not granted, for he had to send Timothy instead (1 Thess 3 : 1, 2 and 10, 11). In the second epistle he does not even mention it. When we are resting in the Lord about anything which we have placed in His hands, prayer of necessity turns to praise.

But what about

GOD'S WILL?

It is, of course, quite impossible to pray with absolute faith for anything which we are not sure is the will of God. "This is the confidence that we have in Him, that if we ask anything according to His will, He heareth us; and if we know that He hear us, whatsoever we ask, we know that we have the petitions that we desired of Him" (1 John 5 : 14, 15). It glorifies our God when we act upon His side of prayer.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Desperate Battle was Fought on Thursday, March 13th, between the British and the Mahdi's followers under Osman Digna. After a severe struggle the British gained a victory, though at one time they were in retreat. The battle commenced before break of day, the Arabs firing upon the camp by moonlight. At sunrise the British opened fire, and the Arabs, under cover of the smoke, crept close up to the British lines and dashed against the marines and the Sixty-fifth and Black Watch regiments, throwing themselves upon the bayonets of the British, and giving and receiving fearful wounds. Great confusion ensued. The Sixty-fifth began to retreat, crowding upon the marines, when all became inextricably mixed. General Graham and his staff did their utmost to rally the men, retreating eight hundred yards to enable them to re-form. Assistance from the other brigade prevented a serious disaster. There were many narrow escapes among the officers. The horse of General Buller was shot from under him. The Arabs fought with the greatest pluck and bravado, but nearly all were killed. The second brigade met with obstinate resistance and was at one time repulsed. The Gatling and Gardiner guns fell into the hands of the Arabs and were only recovered after a severe fight, when the British likewise gained possession of their camp. The Arabs retired before the English slowly and sullenly. They were defeated, but not put to rout. They walked away as if sauntering through a bazaar, with arms folded or swinging at their sides. They were often shot down, but this did not hasten their companions' speed. A telegram describing the battle, says: "It was impossible to take prisoners. The wounded Arabs would lie motionless, without uttering a single cry or moan, and watch their chance to stab the advancing British with knife or spear. The victors walked among the wounded as among so many vipers. A wounded Arab killed a British marine during the night. Another attempted to stab Colonel Stewart while his aide-de-camp was giving the wounded man water."

The Fanatical Spirit of the Mahdi's Followers is described by Mr. Levi, an Austrian merchant, who was recently a prisoner in the camp of Osman Digna. To a correspondent of the New York Herald, he said: "I was told by the rebels that they were not at present thinking of the wrongs they had undergone, but that they were certain that the real Mahdi had come, who would overthrow all nations, destroy all his enemies, and then rule the world according to his own ideas. They said, moreover, that the men who are fighting under Osman Digna are not afraid of rifles, cannons, or anything that could be used against them; that they have power to capture all guns in perfect certainty, and that if they die in such a holy cause they will enjoy themselves forever in Paradise; that their swords and spears would destroy Sinkat and Tokar, and after the fall of these two forts all the people who now besiege them would together fall on Suakim, encamping by its wells, and, taking the town, they would not leave stone upon stone in it; that they intended to go to Jeddah and Mecca, take possession of Egypt, kill the Sultan of Stamboul and all the Englishmen and Christians, and then find themselves free to cope with the Abyssinians. They told me that at present people who own cattle, grain, and money gave up part voluntarily to Osman Digna, in order to supply the poor who wanted food; that Osman might have any amount of property, but did not want any. They had treasure places where they put all sorts of valuable things.

General Gordon's Position at Khartoum is considered critical. The Arabs have cut the telegraph wires to that city, and nothing has been heard from the intrepid commander for three days. All the indications show that the resistance to the British advance will be determined and formidable. The following despatch from the New York Herald correspondent gives a sombre account of the situation: "Sir Evelyn Baring, the British Minister at Cairo, warns the government that the spirit of the Arab leaders is still unbroken. He asserts that as many as thirty different tribes in the Soudan are prepared to maintain the war. General Graham telegraphs that in case he is ordered to advance into the interior re-enforcements must be sent to him. People had imagined that a single decisive defeat by British troops would so dishearten the leaders that they would be ready to come to terms. But it looks as though they were still determined to continue the conflict, and the spirit of insurrection seems to be spreading, notwithstanding the two overwhelming disasters which have befallen their arms and the dreadful carnage which they have suffered. The desperate fanaticism, bravery and recklessness which the Arabs display, their obstinate resistance in the face of the murderous fire of the British and the sullen deliberation of their retreat when forced to give way, prove that they are inspired with no ordinary spirit of rebellion. The impossibility of taking prisoners is a discouraging feature of the war, and the natural difficulties of the country and severity of the climate to Europeans render a prolonged campaign especially hazardous and arduous.

The Capture of Bacninh by the French is Reported. Despatches published in Paris on Thursday state that General Negrier, who led the French forces which advanced from Haidzuong, encountered the Chinese troops at Xairoy between Langthong and Lagbudi. A severe battle ensued. The enemy were at last forced to retreat, and the French forces pursued them into Bacninh by the Langson Road. The enemy evacuated the town in great disorder, and the French continued to pursue them in the direction of Thainguyen. It is now asserted that China is willing to treat for peace and to make large concessions, but the rumor is not confirmed.

An Attempt on the Life of the Count de Paris, the head of the Orleans branch of the French royal family, was made on March 7th. A package, which was handed in at the railway parcel office at Lyons, and addressed "Comte de Paris, at his hotel, Rue Varenne, Paris," was found, upon examination, to contain an infernal machine. The package was oblong in shape, being seventeen inches long and twelve wide. The officials were led to examine it by finding that the wrapping had become undone. They found in it a flat metal box containing a clock movement and a quantity of dynamite. The Comte was absent from his Paris residence, having gone to Cannes. Had the package reached its destination and exploded the domestics would have been the sufferers.

Prince Bismarck made his Defence to the Reichstag in the Lasker affair on March 13th. He said the governments of Germany and America had always been on good terms. "Nothing has occurred to disturb these good relations. From the outset I regarded the resolution touching Herr Lasker as an expression of the good feeling of the American Congress toward Germany—the good feeling which has been promoted and cultivated by myself. I would have presented the resolution to the Reichstag had I not been prevented by its form. It was not confined to a general expression of sympathy, but it expressed the conviction that Herr Lasker's labors had been very useful to Germany. This clause was directed against the policy which, in the Emperor's name, I have been pursuing, and which Herr Lasker had opposed for years."

A Vigorous Indictment of the Gladstone ministry was made by the Marquis of Salisbury, the leader of the Conservatives, on March 12th, in the course of a speech at a public meeting. The conservative programme, he said, was to appeal to the people on public business, especially on measures like the Franchise bill, which sacrificed England and Scotland for Ireland—a fact which forboded an early appeal. He urged a dissolution of Parliament before any change was made in the franchise system. He declared that the government's policy had aggravated and perpetuated the depression in industry and trade and caused the low wages of the working classes. The Irish land market was paralyzed, and no capital could be introduced into Ireland. The shipping interest was attacked on fantastic grounds, and panic and confusion were thrown into interests upon which the country depends. The radical attacks upon property would destroy the workingmen's means of livelihood. The Egyptian disasters were due to indecision arising from divided counsels in the Cabinet. The "fantastic grounds" the nobleman alluded to are that wicked ship-owners buy rotten ships, and having insured them beyond their value, send them to sea expecting that they will founder with all on board. That charge is true, whether fantastic or not.

An Urgent Appeal on Behalf of Canadian missions was made at a crowded meeting held in London on March 12th, in connection with missionary work among the Ontario and Ojibway Indians. The Marquis of Lorne presided. The Bishop of Algoma urgently appealed for funds and more workers, saying that there were only fifteen missionaries to attend to 60,000 souls. He especially begged the gift of a river steamer. Archdeacon Farrar, of Westminster, strongly supported the Bishop.

A Fresh Outbreak of Persecution of the Jews is reported from Germany. Four German Jews, who were recently acquitted at Konitz of the charge of setting fire to a synagogue at Neustettin, have been severely maltreated by the populace of the latter place. One of them was nearly killed by the mob. A majority of the Jewish shops and houses in Neustettin have been destroyed. The police profess to be powerless to suppress the outrages.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services in London continue to be attended by immense crowds of eager hearers. Mr. Moody went to Edinburgh on March 4th, and opened new mission premises at Carrubber's Close, near John Knox's house. This is one of the many fruits of the evangelists' labors in the north. Mr. Moody returned the following day to commence the St. Pancras Mission. A committee of ladies sent out before the services many personal invitations to families residing in the squares in the neighborhood. The hall, fresh from Stratford, occupied a famous site, adjoining the Midland Railway terminus. At the recent missions of the evangleists women have gone into the depths, and personally invited the most depraved. Not content with this, they have actually escorted them singly and in gangs to the place of meeting. They have founded baby-homes, and nurse the infants while poor mothers attend the services. At other times they stay in the miserable home tending the little family, rather than let the "non-churchgoing" mother lose a chance of hearing the evangelists. This is only one of many methods adopted by the Christians of the city to gather in hearers for the American laborers, and the permanent results show that God is blessing the means used.

ROYAL personages, their appearance, their words and actions and manner of life, exercise a strong fascination for many people, who are unable to overcome their fancy that kings and queens are in themselves superior to ordinary mortals. That idea is very prevalent in lands in which the citizens still are of opinion that royalty is worth its cost, and though in this country the idea has been outgrown, yet even here there is sufficient curiosity about the men and women who wear the crowns of Europe to render welcome the details respecting one of them published in these columns this week.

So much gossip and scandal has been published about royalty and courts and courtiers, that the public looks with suspicion on all narratives purporting to describe court life. But in this case there is no ground for doubt. The information here given, consists of extracts from a work recently written and published by the Queen of England, entitled "More Leaves from the Journal of a Life in the Highlands." It is issued in this country by the eminent publishing firm of Messrs. Harper & Brothers, of New York, a firm which has won the esteem and confidence of the whole country, not only by its enterprise, but by the care it has always taken to avoid issuing from its presses any literature that is impure, immoral, or mischievous in its tendency.

The Queen's book is precisely what it professes to be—the record of a quiet home life. It is necessary to emphasize this fact, because readers in England, who went to it expecting to find recorded there the Queen's impressions and opinions on public events, were disappointed. The Queen has shown her good taste and her wisdom by refraining from comments on public topics, which assuredly would, had they been published, have been misunderstood and have given rise to invidious inferences. It is believed that she takes an intelligent interest in all matters of national concern, and is not indifferent to affairs affecting foreign countries, but in this book she has nothing to say on those subjects. She describes her home life as a woman, and not her public life as the nominal ruler of a vast empire.

That fact being understood, the reader is impressed with the manner in which the Queen executes her plan. She takes her readers into her confidence with open frankness, and relates the details of her life with remarkable simplicity. She has also shown considerable tact by avoiding, in the greater part of her work, crossing the line which separates simplicity from silliness. The facts recorded so minutely appear trivial, it is true, but their very triviality shows that her life is decorous, even if it is dull, which is a much better exhibit than would have been a truthful chronicle of the lives of some monarchs who have sat on that throne.

One element that has caused some little vexation and regret is the prominent place occupied in its pages by the writer's manservant, John Brown. His is the central figure in the book, as was the figure of Prince Albert in the Queen's previous work. It was perhaps inevitable that it should be so. Her Majesty was touched by the rough, brute-like affection and devotion Brown displayed toward her, and appreciated his zealous efforts to promote her personal comfort and save her from annoyance. He was her constant attendant in her walks and rides, and the Queen in her lonely widowhood grew to depend more and more on his energy and sagacity. But, after all, he was a coarse, uncultured man, promoted from the stable, and the Queen's connections and her subjects would have been better pleased had she chosen for her confidential friend and companion, some man who, if not of noble birth, had at least the manners and instincts of a gentleman. But of Brown's unremitting attention and devotion there could be no question, and it is creditable to the Queen that she showed her gratitude therefor.

The book opens with the following

DEDICATION:

"To my loyal Highlanders, and especially to the memory of my devoted personal attendant, John Brown, these records of my widowed life in Scotland are gratefully dedicated. Victoria, R. I." Then follows this graceful preface:

"The little volume, 'Our Life in the Highlands,' published fifteen years ago, with its simple records of the never-to-be-forgotten days spent with him 'who made the writer's life bright and happy,' was received with a warmth of sympathy and interest which was very gratifying to her heart. The kind editor of that volume is no longer here to advise and help her, though friendly assistance has not been wanting on the present occasion. But remembering the feeling with which that little book was received, the writer thinks that the present volume may equally evoke sympathy, as, while describing a very altered life, it shows how her sad and suffering heart was soothed and cheered by the excursions and incidents it recounts, as well as by the simple mountaineers, from whom she learned many a lesson of resignation and faith in the pure air and quiet of the beautiful Highlands."

A CAIRN TO PRINCE ALBERT.

The first Leaves of the Journal, written in August, 1862, eight months after the Prince Consort's death, relate to a visit to the Cairn, forty feet wide, that was to be erected on the top of Craig Lowrigan to his memory. The shadow of that great and lasting sorrow lies heavy on the opening page. Princess Beatrice was then described as a "Sweet Baby." "The view was so fine, the day so bright, and the heather so beautifully pink; but no pleasure, no joy, all dead!" The Queen had driven to the top of the hill, following the track which the carts had gone. "Bertie" (the Prince of Wales) had joined her from Birkhall. Walking down as far as the rough road through the heather, the Queen felt shaken and tired. A few days later another visit is paid to the Cairn. "Grant" (an old Scotch servant) said, "'I thought you would like to be here to-day on his birthday,' so entirely was he of opinion that this beloved day, and even the 14th of December" (the day of his death) "must not be looked upon as a day of mourning. 'That's not the light to look at it.' There is so much true and strong faith in these good, simple people."

A CARRIAGE ACCIDENT

occurred during one of these mountain excursions. The Queen thus describes it: "We started at about twenty minutes to seven from Altnagiuthasach, Brown on the box next Smith, who was driving, little Willem (Alice's black serving boy) behind. It was quite dark when we left, but all the lamps were lit as usual; from the first, however, Smith seemed to be quite confused (and indeed has been much altered of late), and got off the road several times, once in a very dangerous place, when Alice called out and Brown got off the box to show him the way. After that, however, though going very slowly, we seemed to be all right, but Alice was not at all reassured, and thought Brown's holding up the lantern all the time on the box indicated that Smith could not see where he was going, though the road was as broad and plain as possible. Suddenly, about two miles from Altnagiuthasach, and about twenty minutes after we had started, the carriage began to turn up on one side; we called out, 'What's the matter?' There was an awful pause, during which Alice said, 'We are upsetting.' In another moment—during which I had time to reflect whether we should be killed or not, and thought there were still things I had not settled and wanted to do—the carriage turned over on its side and we were all precipitated to the ground. I came down very hard with my face upon the ground near the carriage, the horses both on the ground. (See frontispiece.)

"Alice was soon helped up by means of tearing all her clothes to disentangle her; but Lenchen, who had also got caught in her dress, called out very piteously, which frightened me a good deal, but she was also got out with Brown's assistance, and neither she nor Alice was at all hurt. I reassured them that I was not hurt, and urged that we should make the best of it, as it was an inevitable misfortune. Smith, utterly confused and bewildered, at length came up to ask if I was hurt. Meantime the horses were lying on the ground as if dead, and it was absolutely necessary to get them up again. Alice, whose calmness and coolness were admirable, held one of the lamps while Brown cut the traces, to the horror of Smith, and the horses were speedily released and got up unhurt.

"There was now no means of getting home except by sending back Smith with the two horses to get another carriage. All this took some time, about half an hour, before we got off. By this time I felt that my face was a good deal bruised and swollen, and above all, my right thumb was excessively painful and much swollen; indeed I thought at first it was broken, till we began to move it. Alice advised then that we should sit down in the carriage—that is, with the bottom of the carriage as a back—which we did. We had been sitting here about half an hour when we heard the sound of voices and of horses' hoofs, which came nearer and nearer. To our relief we found it was our ponies. At the hill, where the gate of the deer-fence is, above the distillery, we met the other carriage, again driven by Smith, and a number of stable people come to raise the first carriage and a pair of horses to bring it home. We preferred, however, riding home, which we reached at about twenty minutes to ten o'clock."

A VISIT TO LORD DALHOUSIE.

In September, 1865, the Queen visited Lord Dalhousie at Invermark. Here, again, the place was full of the "memories that make the heart a tomb." The fine wild pass of Ladder Burn "seemed to strike me much less than when I first saw it, as all is flat now." At the well the Queen found an inscription recording that "Queen Victoria with the Prince Consort visited this well and drank of its refreshing waters on the 20th of September, 1861," the year of her Majesty's "great sorrow." "And round the spring which bubbles up beautifully, and quite on a level with the ground, is inscribed in Old English characters the following legend:

"Rest, traveller, on this lonely green,
And drink and pray for Scotland's Queen.

"We drank with sorrowing hearts from this very well, where just four years ago I had drunk with my beloved Albert, and Grant handed me the flask (one I had given him), out of which we drank on that day. Lord Dalhousie has kindly built this well in remembrance of that occasion. It was quite a pilgrimage." The sky, the glen, the hills—all were beautiful; "and yet to me all seemed strange, unnatural, and sad." When they reached the house and the little drawing-room, "it brought all back to me. I felt tired, sad, and bewildered. For the first time in my life I was without either mother or husband, and the thought distressed me deeply.

In Rob Roy's country the Queen follows the footsteps of the lawless chief with ardent curiosity, and when she comes to the last refuge and hiding-place of Prince Charles Edward, or passes by the Field of Culloden, she is a Jacobite of Jacobites, and claims with pride her kinship with that romantic and despicable race. These passages in her diary are singularly interesting. She seems to be impressed with the irony of history and of fate, which has made her the loving and beloved Sovereign of Scottish homes and Scottish hearts, welcomed and fêted by the de-ndants of the clansmen who turned out to do tle for one of her ancestors against another of ancestors, and of the chiefs who fell in bat- or lost their estates and their titles for their ns. Of Queen Mary she speaks with the derest compassion.

The "Leaves" contain many fresh and vivid tures of such scenes of country life in the ghlands as the "Hallowe'en," the "Juicing Sheep," the "Christening," the "Sheep pping," the "Communion Sunday at Cra-e," and the "Highland Funeral."

THE KEEPING OF HALLOWE'EN

shown in our second frontispiece picture. e word Hallowe'en signifies the Hallowed ening before All Saints' Day, November 1st. der date October 31st, 1866, the Queen gives following description: "We saw the com-ncement of the keeping of Hallowe'en.

'On the same day in the following year we l an opportunity of again seeing the celebra-n of Hallowe'en, and even of taking part in We had been out driving, but we hurried k to be in time for the celebration. Close to nald Stewart's house we were met by two ies bearing torches. Louise got out and k one, walking by the side of the carriage, l looking like one of the witches in Macbeth. we approached Balmoral, the keepers, and ir wives and children, the gillies, and other ple met us, all with torches: Brown also rying one. We got out at the house, where pold joined us, and a torch was given to n. We walked round the whole house, pre-ed by Ross playing the pipes. Louise and pold went first, then came Janie Ely and I, owed by every one carrying torches, which l a very pretty effect. After this a bonfire s made of all the torches, close to the house, l they danced reels, while Ross played the es."

"JUICING THE SHEEP,"

subject of our third frontispiece picture, is s referred to in her Majesty's book: "I ve off with Louise and Leopold in the wag-nette up to near the 'Bush,' the residence of lliam Brown, the farmer, to see them 'juice sheep.' This is a practice pursued all over Highlands before the sheep are sent down the low country for the winter. It is done to serve the wool. Not far from the burnside, ere there are a few hillocks, was a pen in ich the sheep were placed, and then just out-e it, a large sort of trough filled with liquid bacco and soap, and into this the sheep were ped one after the other; one man took the ep one by one out of the pen and turned m on their backs; they were then dipped ll in, after which they were let into another n, and here they had to remain to dry. Chil-en and many collie dogs were grouped about, l several men and shepherds were helping. was a curious and picturesque sight."

A CHRISTENING AND A DEATH

thus characteristically described by the yal writer: "On Monday, November 1st, I ve down at a quarter to four with Louise, atrice, Leopold (who was on the box with own), and Lady Ely, to the Bush (William own's) to witness the christening of his first ild, just a week old, which was to be called bert. The service was exceedingly simple, ly two instead of three prayers, and the ung mother seated by the fire, looking very e, with the baby on her lap.

"On Sunday, August 22d, 1869, I went to old Mrs. Grant, whom I was grieved to see ting in her chair supported by pillows, and r poor feet raised upon cushions, very much ered in her face, and, I fear, dying of dropsy. August 26th I again saw her, and gave her a awl and pair of socks, and found the poor old ly in bed, looking very weak and very ill, but wing her head and thanking me in her usual y. I took her hand and held it. On the 27th e died. On the 28th I stopped at her cottage, d went in with Louise and Leopold. We nd all so clean and tidy, but all so silent. e was in her eighty-ninth year."

A COMMUNION SERVICE

at the kirk is thus vividly described: "The appearance of the kirk was very striking, with the tables in the cross seats, on either side facing the pulpit, covered with a white cloth. Neither Brown, though he came with us, nor any of our Scotch servants, sat behind us, as usual, but all below, as every one does who intends taking the sacrament at the 'first table.' A table, also covered with a white cloth, was placed in front of the middle pew, directly facing the pulpit.

"The prayer after the sermon was very short, after which Dr. Taylor delivered an address from the pulpit, in which he very beautifully invited all true penitents to receive the communion, the hardened sinner alone to abstain. After this address as it is called—the minister came down to the small table in front of the pulpit, where he stood with the assistant minister, and the elders on either side, and while the 35th Psalm was being sung the elders brought in the Elements, and placed them on the table, viz., the bread cut into small pieces, and two large plates lined with napkins, and the wine in four large silver cups. The minister then read the words of the institution of the Lord's Supper, from 1 Corinthians 11: 23, and this was followed by a short but very impressive prayer of consecration.

"This done, he handed the bread first, and then the wine right and left to the elders. The bread was then reverently eaten, and the wine drunk, sitting, each person passing it on one to the other; the cup being replaced by each on the table before them after they had partaken of the wine, and then the elder carried it on to the next pews, in which there were tables, until all those in that portion of the church prepared for the Lord's Supper had communicated."

THE DEATH OF DR. NORMAN MACLEOD

only a fortnight after his last visit to Balmoral deeply affected the Queen. "Dear Dr. Macleod likewise came to Balmoral, and preached there, on the following occasions: October 11th, 1863; May 2d, 1864 (my birthday, after his visit to the Holy Land); on May 27th, 1867; and on May 29th, 1869. When I last saw him I was greatly distressed at his depression and sadness, and instead of my looking to him to cheer and encourage me, I tried to cheer him. He said he had been ordered to give up all work, and to give up his house at Glasgow, merely continuing to preach at the Barony Church; and that then they gave him hopes of a recovery, but it was not at all certain. He must give up the Indian Mission, which was a great sorrow to him.

"He had not much confidence, he said, in his recovery; but he might be wrong. All was in God's hand. 'It is the nature of Highlanders to despond when they are ill,' he added. He hoped God would allow him to live a few years longer, for his children, and to be able to go on with 'Good Words.' He dwelt then, as always, on the love and goodness of God.

"When I wished him good-by, and shook hands with him, he said, 'God bless your Majesty,' and the tears were in his eyes. Only then did the thought suddenly flash upon me, as I closed the door of my room, that I might never see this dear friend again, and it nearly overcame me. But this thought passed, and never did I think that not quite three weeks after his noble, pure spirit would be with the God and Saviour he loved and served so well. I have since heard that he mentioned to several at Balmoral that he thought he should never come there again."

Among the happier of these "Leaves" are those which record

THE BETROTHAL OF LOUISE.

Of October 3d, 1870, her Majesty writes as follows: "This was an eventful day! Our dear Louise was engaged to Lord Lorne. The event took place during a walk from the Glassalt Shiel to the Dhu Loch. She had gone there with Janie Ely, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Hatherley), and Lorne. I had driven with Beatrice and the Hon. Mrs. Ponsonby to Pannanich Wells, two miles from Ballater, on the south side of the Dee, where I had been many years ago. The sky perfectly cloudless as on the two preceding days. We got home by seven. Louise, who returned some time after we did, told me that Lorne had spoken of his devotion to her and proposed to her, and that she had accepted him, knowing that I would approve. Though I was not unprepared for this result, I felt painfully the thought of losing her. But I naturally gave my consent and could only pray that she might be happy."

But these years were not unaccompanied with new sorrows. The death of the Princess Alice from diphtheria in Germany, on December 14th, 1878—"my darling Alice"—a woman of exquisite nature and priceless worth—is only glanced at here. "It was to all an unspeakable calamity."

Another scene minutely described by the Queen, and which appears to have deeply distressed her, was an INJURY TO BROWN.

Under date of October 11th, 1865, the Queen writes: "Another wretchedly wet morning. Was much distressed at breakfast to find that poor Brown's legs had been dreadfully cut by the edge of his wet kilt on Monday, just at the back of the knee, and he said nothing about it; but to-day one became so inflamed, and swelled so much, that he could hardly move. The doctor said he must keep it up as much as possible, and walk very little, but did not forbid his going out with the carriage, which he wished to do. I did not go out in the morning." The next day, October 12th, she writes: "Brown's leg is much better. The doctor thought he could walk over the hill to-morrow."

occur occasionally in the course of the pages of the Queen's work. Referring to the trying part she had to take in unveiling the statue of Prince Albert, at Aberdeen, in 1863, her Majesty thus indicates her faith in the power of prayer: "I was terribly nervous in the morning. Longed not to have to go through this ordeal. Prayed for help, and got up earlier."

Her Majesty's estimate of Dr. Norman Macleod's character reveals her regard for that which most draws the soul to confidence in God. We read: "No one ever felt so convinced and so anxious as he to convince others, that God was a loving Father, who wished all to come to Him, and to preach of a living personal Saviour, One who loved us as a brother and a friend, to whom all could and should come with trust and confidence."

One Sunday her Majesty heard Dr. Macleod preach a sermon from Genesis 3: 13, which she speaks of as "touching, and striking, and useful." "And then he showed how we all had a secret life which no one knew but God, and showed the frightful danger of living a life of deception till you deceived yourself, and no longer knew wrong from right. I wish I could repeat all he said, but it was admirable."

and to a eulogium of him. She thus writes: "A few words I must add in conclusion to this volume. The faithful attendant who is so often mentioned throughout these Leaves, is no longer with her whom he served so truly, devotedly, untiringly. In the fulness of health and strength he was snatched away from his career of usefulness, after an illness of only three days, on the 27th of March of this year, respected and beloved by all who recognized his rare worth and kindness of heart, and truly regretted by all who knew him. His loss to me (ill and helpless as I was at the time from an accident) is irreparable, for he deservedly possessed my entire confidence; and to say that he is daily nay, hourly, missed by me, whose lifelong gratitude he won by his constant care, attention, and devotion, is but a feeble expression of the truth

"A truer, nobler, trustier heart,
More loyal, and more loving, never beat
Within a human breast."

THE GO-BETWEEN.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 23, 1884.

"For there is one God, and one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."—1 TIM. 2 : 5.

Paul's Grand Spiritual Vision—The Alegone of Spiritual Astronomy — Paradise a Colony of Heaven — The Estrangement — A Champion Needed—Christ is Qualified—On Good Terms with Both Parties—The Cross-Beams at the Crucifixion—His Integrity—Wisdom, Tact, and Delicacy—Filial Reminiscences—Perseverance and Determination—Must Realize the Importance of the Task—Kate Shelley's Gold Medal — A Tremendous Question — The Cagliostro Necklace—Imperishable Diamonds of Frozen Tears.

WORDS of an old minister to a young theological student. Paul to Timothy. The old man was afflicted with diseased eyes. The pain was so sharp and stinging that he describes it as "a thorn in the flesh," and he so excites the sympathies of his friends that he says on one occasion that they would have plucked out their eyes and given them to him in substitute for his poor eyes. But though the apostle's physical eyesight was so poor, he had and he saw Jesus Christ as no man on earth ever saw Him. Christ was to him the ark of all perfection. Alegone is the name of the brightest star of the Pleiades, and it is supposed to be at the centre of the great arc in which our sun and the planets move. Jesus Christ to Paul was the brightest star and the centre star, the Alegone of his spiritual astronomy.

In my text Paul calls Christ an arbitrator. For some reason heaven and earth swung apart. They were once fully accordant. Paradise was only a colonization of the celestial. The trees on the banks of the river Hiddekel were a transplantation from a higher garden. Earth was a long, sweet echo of heaven. But in the evilest hour of eternity our progenitor reached up his hand and unhooked the chain that bound the celestial and the terrestrial, and forthwith we are all adrift. For this high treason of our progenitor, a high treason in which at some time we all sympathized, there must come severe punishment unless there be some plan projected different from anything that human brain ever dreamed of.

How is it possible for a God who hates sin with such withering, all-consuming and everlasting fury, to be brought into amity with our recreant and sinful world? It will never be done except through negotiation. You and I have known persons who had a difference seemingly irreconcilable, yet after a while they shook hands. We have read in history of nations that were in divergence seemingly beyond all adjustment, and yet they signed a compact. And I wonder if there is not something that can bridge over the difference between the Creator and the created, between the immaculate and the sinful, between eternity and time, between earth and heaven? Hear, all ye spaces of earth and all ye armies of heaven. Where is the one who will step forth able and willing to effect this negotiation? In vain we look among the heroic and the gallant of earth. They have sturdy hearts, but are not brave enough for this. In vain we look among all the thrones of the angels. Not one of the angels is willing to be dethroned for this negotiation. Where is the relief to come from?

WE WANT A CHAMPION.

Heaven and earth both want champions if this matter is to be settled. David and Goliath went forth as champions. Goliath said: "Come to me, and I will give thy flesh unto the fowls of the air," and David answered: "Thou comest to me with a sword, and with a spear, and with a shield; but I came to thee in the name of the Lord of hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom thou hast defied, and I will take thine head from thee." But who shall be our champion in this great difference between heaven and earth? Jesus Christ steps forth, and He says: "I will undertake that work at which all the universe is silent and abashed." And He lays one hand on the earth and He lays the other hand on heaven, and He swings them together. Strophe and antistrophe of music celestial. "One mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus."

It is my delightful work this morning to show you how beautifully for this work of arbitrament. You know very well that if two be at variance, the third party coming in must be on good terms with both the parties. If you and I are at variance, and a third party comes in to settle the difficulty, and he is my antagonist, I will reject him. If he be your antagonist you will reject him. The third party coming in for the work of mediation must be on good terms with both of us. Behold Christ's qualifications. God looks at Him and says, "My Son." We look at Him and say, "Elder Brother." He will look after God's rights, for He has filial affection. He will be sympathetic with us, for He is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. Heaven can trust Him with its holiness, its justice, its attributes, and knows that He will bring all the armies of the universe for help if it be necessary to keep its glory unsullied; while, on the other hand, we know that between manger and cross He will never forget our interests, and, if need be, to stop the swift rolling car of our destruction will throw His own life on the bloody track.

CHRIST IS QUALIFIED

THE CROSSBEAM OF THE TREE

of crucifixion was nailed to the upright beam at the centre. God's justice starts at one end of that crossbeam and advances toward the centre. Our necessity starts from the other end of that crossbeam and advances toward the centre, and they both meet in the heart of the Son of God. He has in His nature the God side, the man side. Oh wonderful conjunction!

Historians scoff at Louis Philippe because he was so merciful, but it was the grand characteristic of his nature, and he is to me one of the most lovable characters of history. He always felt when for some reason he could consistently pardon a man he had gained a victory, and one morning he said: "I gained seven men last night." In other words, he had found it possible to pardon seven men for their crimes. How many our Lord has gained I am not enough mathematician to calculate. You had better ask the ten thousand times ten thousand and the one hundred and forty and four thousand. Perhaps they can tell. So wonderfully qualified for this diplomacy between God and man is Christ Jesus. On good terms with both parties.

INTEGRITY NECESSARY.

But you know also, my friends, that in order to successful intervention between two estranged parties the mediator must be characterized by integrity. Most of us remember when Napoleon called a congress of nations, and some of the monarchs came to the congress, other governments sent their prime-ministers, and other governments flatly refused to come. Why? Because they looked upon Napoleon as an imperial villain. Integrity is absolutely necessary for arbitrators. And here is Christ's qualification of integrity. All heaven cried three times, "Holy, holy, holy!" Opulent spoilsmen, great authority sometimes makes them cruel, but all the wealth and all the power of heaven did not spoil Christ. On the other hand, all human hatred put Him under the microscope of hypercriticism. There was not a minute of His life that the detectives were not after Him. They saw where He went and when He went. It was the business of hundreds of men to find out something bad in Christ. Not one evil word, not one evil action could they report. All the charges were unsubstantiated. False witnesses blushed and staggered and fell under the weight of their lies. Purer than the lilies which illustrated His sermon. Cleaner than the Galilean wave which licked His feet. Brighter than the star that pointed down to His manger. Fairer than the heavens from which He came. He had an integrity which particularly qual Him for the work of a negotiator.

You also recognize the fact that in ord successful diplomacy between alienated par the go-between must be characterized by

WISDOM, TACT, AND DELICACY.

You sometimes have seen a very good ma in and try to settle a dispute, and he has t dered in the matter, he has made a drea failure, and if there were ten degrees of viol before, after his work there were a hun degrees of violence between the parties. T must be wisdom, tact, and delicacy fc mediator.

I do not think I put it too strongly wh say that my father never attempted to set dispute but he settled it. I remember ho would bring the two antagonists to our ho and I would hear conversation in an adjoi room, and there would be imprecation and talking, and it seemed as if the parties about to annihilate each other. Then t would be a quiet, and then I would hear father's voice in prayer, and then the would open and the two contestants would out arm in arm. He had wisdom, and he tact, and he had delicacy. Behold in Chris these attributes.

Wisdom! why, He knew all of God and knew all of men. From the highest summi the divine attributes clear down to the lo depths of human depravity He had explo everything. He knew what God would h He knew what men wanted. From the p ence of the throne, He knew its glory. Con into the presence of our shipwreck He knew ghastliness. Face to face with Jehovah, was not withered with the glance, and plun into the depth of our woe, He was not rupted with the abomination. Solomon wise in settling the controversy between the women about the child; but here is a w than Solomon, who makes a warring earth heaven embrace each other. Moses was wis giving the law; but here is a greater than Mo who by one act fulfils all its requirements. the wisdom of this Arbitrator!

Has He the tact necessary? Ask the fisher to whom He preached about the Gospel net, the farmers to whom He talked about the sc who went forth to sow, ask the womanly ho keeper to whom He talked about the yeast leavened the whole lump. And had He the cacy? Ask the sicknesses on which He put healing hand, ask the fair-browed child whom kissed on the forehead, ask the man who has unwrapped the shroud from his resuscit daughter. Never before was there, n since has there been, such wisdom, such t such delicacy for the glorious work of negc tion.

You recognize also the fact that in orde successful diplomacy there must be amid all obstacles. If you have ever tried it have found out that the toughest thing to d to settle a dispute. You go to one of the ties and you make a proposition. He s "Never, never!" You go to the other p and you propose a reconciliation. He says, will die first." You give up the attempt. a man with Christian perseverance and de mination comes and he keeps at it day after week after week, and month after month u he effects it. Oh, how much determination necessary, and how much perseverance to bri over the difference between these two part God and man!

God made a law; man put both feet o God established a government; man sece from it. God planted a garden; man uproc it. God sowed flowers and fruits; man so nettles and nightshade. God said, "B righteous cities;" they built Sodom. God s "Elevate righteous rulers;" they eleva Ahab. God warned and man defied. For thousand years man has fought God, resis God, despised God, attempted to drive Him the throne of the universe. God looks d o-day from heaven, and He sees hundreds of millions of polluted and sinful people.

On one side of this controversy between God nd man was everything that was right; on the ther side, everything that was wrong. Now, o you think that a few tears, a few drops of lood will put out this conflagration which sin as kindled? Is there some Grace Darling with boat strong enough to stand this storm and ave a drowning race? Is there enough timber n the two pieces of the cross to make a bridge or this awful gulf between God and man? Christ stopped not at the difficulty. All others ad declined the service, and He was not the ne to see the race plunged into the vortices and ake no effort for the rescue. He looked into he face of heaven, and He says: "Let the ter- or fly." All the thunderbolts of omnipotent rath struck Him. He faced the human race, nd said: "I am now ready to receive the hock of all earthly hatred," and all the rough ands of earthly brigandage smote Him on the eart. The Lamb of heaven clutched by the atamount of hell. Oh, He stopped for noth- ng. He persevered to the end. "One media- or between God and men, the man Christ esus."

You also recognize that in order to successful iplomacy it is necessary that the party coming n as an arbitrator feel the IMPORTANCE OF THE WORK.

You go to a man and you ask that he be recon- iled to an antagonist. He says no. You go to he other man in the controversy. He says no. You give it up and say, "Well, it doesn't make nuch difference anyhow." But suppose thou- ands of dollars are involved in the controversy, uppose the peace of the whole neighborhood, uppose the happiness of one of the parties is nvolved, then you feel the importance. Christ elt the importance of this arbitrament. He as in blood red earnest. He saw it would be n awful thing to have the human race perish.

To show that He appreciated the importance f the work you have but to see Him push hrough storm and darkness and mobocracy and nountain desolation and imperial anathema, ontending with the human race all armed gainst Him, not to destroy it, but to save it. o be buffeted for five or ten years—perhaps ome of you know what that is. But Christ's whole life on earth was one of being buffeted. The first chapter of His life, Herod's scouting party trying to murder the babe. The last chapter of His life, the Roman hammer striking he nail through the palm. Oh, what a jour- ney of mediation, beginning with a manger and ending with a cross! Was there ever such a self-sacrificing arbitrator?

Governor Sherman, of Iowa, a few days ago, showed me at Des Moines that had been struck in honor of Kate Shelly, the girl of fifteen, who at midnight sped over the broken bridge until she got to the telegraph office and announced that the bridge was down, and saved the midnight express train. A beau- tiful medal on obverse and reverse side. On one side a representation of the girl on the broken bridge; on the other side a representa- tion of the gratitude of the State of Iowa. The governor said to me: "She will be here in a few days, and in behalf of the Legislature of the State I will make this presentation." Very beautiful, very appropriate. But, O my soul, tell me in what mint of earth or heaven shall that medal be struck which shall on one side represent a Christ coming to save a ruined world and on the other side represent the grati- tude of a universe at the glorious achievement!

Some men have gone in humiliation and shame that they might afterward come to eleva- tion; but here is Christ coming down that oth- ers might rise, here is the gathering up the thorns into the brow that others may wear a flowering amaranth, here is the drinking of gall that others may take the elixir. Oh, what a mediator! The star of olden times ran across the heavens at the nativity and hung above the Saviour's head, but our world will after a while be the star that will run across the heavens and hang beneath the Saviour's feet. Christ came in the world's back door that we might enter heaven's front gate.

Now, you see there is

coming out of this, and that is, are you willing to accept the arbitration? You have seen many a mediation fail because while the mediator in the case was faithful and one party accepted the mediation, the other was stubborn and declined. Christ comes in to mediate. God to-day de- clares Himself willing to accept the mediation. You are the other party. Will you accept or will you decline? If you decline, then the war will go on and the weaker will go under. You all realize, my friends, that this adjustment is reasonable and right, and all that is asked of you is that in the depths of your soul you accept the arbitration. If you decline it, then all the thrones of heaven will cry out for your condem- nation. Then you decree hostility against the God that made you. There is no alternative.

Then the question is who is the stronger, you or the Lord Almighty? After a while the armistice will cease, and then eternal ages will jar with the conflict. Choose your own weapons. Wrap yourself in what armor you will, throw up what fortresses you will; but woe unto him that striveth with his Maker.

I am thrilled this morning through and through, body, mind, and soul at you in this arbitration. If I owned a bank and threw you a bunch of keys and told you to go in and help yourself it would be called a benefi- cence, a generosity positively reckless. But a grander offering is made to you. A whole cluster of the keys of God's mercy and of God's storehouse I throw you. Do you want par- don? Here is a key to unlock the door. Do you want consolation in your trouble? Here is a key to unlock the door. Do you want all the treasures of heaven? Here is a key to un- lock the door. O my Lord Jesus, what an offer for my soul and for the souls of all these people!

THE CAGLIOSTRO NECKLACE.

A jeweller in France resolved that he would make the richest necklace that the world had ever seen, and he sent forth his agents into all the earth, and they came back with all the most precious gems they could find. He put eight hundred diamonds in one necklace and in nine rows, the diamonds in crowns and crosses and lilies. On one bright day Louis XVI. flung this brilliant article around the neck of Marie Antoinette. But that diamond necklace was stolen; it was taken apart, it is lost forever.

Babbington Macaulay writes of it, Thomas Carlyle writes of it. It has been the wonder- ment of history, that diamond necklace. But I have to tell you to-day that the necklace which this Gospel proposes to throw over you to-day can never be taken apart, can never be stolen, can never be lost.

once and you wear it forever. The diamonds of it are the frozen tears of the Son of God. The deep red carnelian is the congealed sweat of Gethsemane. The woman who wears it is a queen. The man who wears it is an emperor. Brighter and brighter will the gems glow and flash until in the day when Christ shall make up His jewels. When all nations are strung to- gether in love and brightness, that will be the diamond necklace of the world.

How English Aristocrats Live is Described by Lady John Manners in the columns of The National Review. She draws a startling picture of the extravagant and luxurious habits of the upper classes, as they may be seen in the large country houses at the present time. Eat- ing, drinking, and smoking appear to absorb both time and money to a surprising extent. She says: First, there is the early cup of tea and slice of toast, served to all the ladies, and many of the gentlemen, before they leave their beds. A few of the gentlemen will prefer brandy and soda. At ten o'clock breakfast is announced, and from that time till near midnight there goes on a succession of meals, each partaking of the character of a dinner. Even at breakfast itself there will be four hot dishes, to say nothing of an infinite variety of cold meats and sweets, with claret on the sideboard. Luncheon is dinner in all but name, and even five o'clock tea is accom- panied by substantial accessories. After dinner properly so called, come liqueurs and tea, till the ladies ostensibly go to bed, after a little money has changed hands at poker or loo. Even the smoking-room, where brews of many kinds are prepared—effervescing waters, whis- key, brandy, claret, lemons in profusion must be at hand—is now no longer sacred to the gentle- men. It is rumored that the rustlings of tea- gowns have sometimes been heard in those hitherto inviolable retreats, especially if a billiard table is to be found there. What it costs to entertain company in such style as this one trembles to guess. Ten thousand dollars is occasionally spent on flowers for a single ball. She says, in another place, that men have been known to spend $25 in cigars for a single day's smoking. After this we are not surprised to read that it is not unusual for ladies who go out a good deal to spend $5000 a year on their dress; while many, whose fortunes cannot be considered large, spend $3000 a year. If Lady Manners were to come to this country she might find that, as in other matters, we are not behind the old country in this. The extrava- gance and wastefulness of the time is a crying evil against which Christian men and women of wealth and position ought to protest by voice and example. We are explicitly warned against these very sins which it was predicted would be prevalent in the last days (James 5 : 1–5).

A Church Examining Committee Received a rebuke from a candidate for Church member- ship in New England. The candidate was con- sidered somewhat below the average in mental capacity, but he was very anxious to join the Church. The Youth's Companion gives the following report of the examination: "Do you understand the doctrine of the trinity?" "No, I can't say I do." "Can you give the com- mittee a definition of regeneration?" "I don't think I can." "Can't you give us some opinion respecting God's decrees?" "I'm afraid not." "Well, then," said the minister, a little im- patiently, "what do you know?" Promptly came the answer, "I know that I'm a sinner, and I know that Christ died to save me. And I want to join the church to get more help from Christ and His people." There are many peo- ple who could answer all the questions satisfactorily to the examiners who do not possess the saving knowledge of this despised candidate. Like the blind man in the Gospel he knew the truth most important for him to know (John 9 : 25).

An Eye Turned to Stone was Removed by a skilful oculist, who showed it to a reporter on a Western journal. The ossified portion was as large as a silver dime and twice as thick. The patient told him that twenty-five years ago, while chopping in the woods in Jefferson County, Wis., he injured one of his eyes. It became inflamed, but after a year's time healed, remaining, however, totally blind. He was not troubled with it any more until a year or more ago, when it again became very painful, and felt as though there were a strong pressure behind it. The other eye, in sympathy with the injured member, began to fail also. The oculist removed the eye, and was astonished to find that petri- faction had set in, and the choroid had turned to stone. There are only two cases of the kind on record. But in spiritual matters we know of many to whom such a calamity appears to have happened. Not only such as the Apostle Paul writes of (Rom. 11 : 25), on whom blindness in part has fallen, but others who have hearts of stone alienated from the life of God because of the blindness of their hearts (Eph. 4 : 18).

THE PROPHETIC OUTLOOK IN CONNECTION WITH THE MAHDI.

By G. B. T.

Revival of Napoleonic France—The Reconstituted Roman Empire—Contraction of its Western Sections—The Casus Belli to Originate There—The Eastern Half—Similarly Divided—Egypt to be Prominent—The Cloudy Day—The Mahdi's Swift Cloud—Cause of Egypt's Trouble—Conquest of Egypt and Syria—Synchronous Western Movement.

WE are prophetically apprised of the fact that Napoleonic France, in all the dimensions of its former greatness, is to reappear at the "Time of the End," under the subsequent directorship of the seventh-eighth head of the revived Roman Empire. Mighty revolutions, both intestine and international, will work this astonishing result, in connection with the contraction of the western section of this temporarily defunct empire into exactly five kingdoms. We believe the casus belli of these mighty military proceedings will originate in the West of Europe, and that the consequences accruing therefrom will be localized and confined to that half of the ancient Roman Empire for the specific object, under divine Providence, of inaugurating the fulfilment of Daniel's symbolic prophecies, as to that half of this final empire eventuating in five distinct kingdoms.

But the eastern half is to be similarly divided; and I cannot but think that these revolutions which are destined to effect that division will spring from a separate and distinct origin of strife.

We read in the Prophet Ezekiel: "Son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord: Howl, ye, Woe worth the day! For the day is near, a cloudy day; it shall be the time of the heathen. And

THE SWORD SHALL COME UPON EGYPT."

It would seem by this prophecy that Egypt is singled out from all other nations as being the theatre of the inauguration of "the day of the Lord;" which, as I read, invariably means that day of judgment on an apostate world, which shall eventually end in the consummation of this dispensation and the commencement of the millennial reign of Christ and His saints on the earth.

If this be so, how soon may these predictions be verified! for we find that Egypt has already suffered from insurrection, conquest, and pestilence in quick succession. Is this, therefore, the beginning of "the day of the Lord," the "cloudy day," "the time of the heathen," when "the sword (first) shall come upon Egypt?" But let us revert to Isaiah's prophecy respecting the same people: "The burden of Egypt: Behold, the Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt; and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at His presence, and the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it. And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians; and they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbor, city against city, and kingdom against kingdom. And the spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof; and I will destroy the counsel thereof, and they shall seek to the idols, and to the charmers, and to them that have familiar spirits, and to wizards."

It is manifestly certain that this prophecy has never received but a typical fulfilment, and the prediction, that "the Lord will ride upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt," is of future fulfilment, if it is not being fulfilled at

THE PRESENT JUNCTURE!

Now, can it be that this figure of Scripture, that the "Lord rideth upon a swift cloud, and shall come into Egypt," is destined to have a special—yea, its specific—accomplishment in the armies of the Mahdi, the False Prophet of the Egyptian Soudan?

A cloud of men may be regarded as a very great multitude, which this False Prophet of the Soudan undoubtedly possesses. The careering of a cloud through the heavens finds no obstacle to hinder its even course. Now, the Mahdi has been prosperous hitherto, and his military gravitation is undoubtedly toward Egypt!

His victories (so decisively such) follow swiftly one after the other; and considering that, a few months since, this cloud did not appear much bigger than a man's hand on the political horizon, the idea of speed in the Mahdi's military growth is established.

Now, can we presume that the appearance of the Mahdi at Karosto or Assouan would have those effects on the Egyptians that are here prophesied, "and the idols of Egypt shall be moved at His presence?"

There may be mutually antagonistic principalities and powers even of hell, so that while a certain class of devils may infuriate and energize the established idol-devils of Egypt may "be moved at his presence," preferring their own hold on the worship of the Egyptians to surrendering that worship to a class of fanatical and aggressive devils distinct from themselves.

"And the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it." The repetitive successes of the False Prophet flash, like electric shocks, through the heart of the Egyptian people at the present day; and shall not the "heart of Egypt melt in the midst of it," when the sphere of the Mahdi's action shall be changed

FROM THE EGYPTIAN SOUDAN TO EGYPT PROPER?

"In that day shall Egypt be like unto a woman; and it shall be afraid and fear, because of the shaking of the hand of the Lord of hosts, which He shaketh over it."

"And I will set the Egyptians against the Egyptians." This would certainly be one of the issues of the invasion of Egyptian territory by the False Prophet. Many would prove loyal to law and order; but, on the other hand, many would revolt to the standard of the Mahdi. As a consequence, "they shall fight every one against his brother, and every one against his neighbor; city against city, and kingdom against kingdom." In times of civil strife this putting of brother against brother, and friend against friend, is an unavoidable sequence; and we know, by historical events, that in such crises as these certain cities remain true, while others turn traitorous, and are thus arrayed "city against city" to the augmented confusion of the unhappy country. By "kingdom (striving) against kingdom" in connection with by the Mahdi's forces, we perhaps are to understand that the False Prophet, at this time, will have consolidated the Egyptian Soudan into a separate kingdom, so that his invasion of Egypt proper will practically mean an international war, although the two kings will owe their crowns to the divided empire of the Egyptian territory. Thus, in that day "kingdom shall fight against kingdom."

"And the spirit of Egypt shall fail in the midst thereof." This is a repetition of the asseveration that "the heart of Egypt shall melt in the midst of it" with the superadded signification that the sorry stand made against the invincible arms of the invaders will signally "fail." "And I will destroy the counsel thereof." "The counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish." "They that uphold Egypt shall fall." "All her helpers shall be destroyed." All diplomatic or material assistance shall not prevail against the conquering career of the Mahdi. Foreign diplomatists shall be confounded. The Lord will destroy the counsel of diplomatists; Egypt's "upholders" shall "fall," and her "helpers" shall be "destroyed."

In this grave trouble "they (the Egyptians) shall seek to their idols, and to the charmers, and to them that have familiar spirits, and to wizards." The good Lord has let out, in His prophetic narrative, the causes of and they are these: "Their idols," their possession of "familiar spirits," their "charmers," and their "wizards." Mohammedan Egypt still cherishes a fondness for its own ancie devilish deities, and these infernal accompar ments at which, in ancient times, they were su conspicuous adepts. It may be that it is tho old-established devil-gods that will be "moved at the presence of the Mahdi's energizi demons.

Now, I think this "cloud" of fanatical rebe tallies with the events of unfulfilled prophe in respect to Egypt. To its fanatical operatio I look for and their speedy autonomy and independen as distinct and separate kingdoms.

I look for, as the issue of these passing even the speedy reappearance of the four-horn kin doms of the long-defunct Alexander's Mac donian Empire; and, according to the self-san prophetic Word, the appearance also of a fif kingdom, composed of the remaining territor which makes up conjointly with those fo kingdoms the eastern half of the soon-to-be-r vived Roman Empire.

And while those things in the East are caree ing to a speedy consummation, I anxiously a ticipate a synonymous and in the western half of that empire to eventua in a like issue—viz., the division of that ter tory into exactly five kingdoms. Hence t prophetic image will then have developed its t toes—the Beast will then have put forth its t horns; and we know the issue—the revelati of Antichrist, and the glorious appearing of o Lord Jesus Christ to destroy them that destr the earth.

May we be ready, waiting for His Coming ay, with the intense longing of a bride for h husband. May we, with the unfeigned lovi expectancy of His mystic bride, ever cry fro the depths of our inmost feelings, "Come, Lo Jesus, come; come quickly."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVA GELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND

Turned from a Sliding Path.—At a Rece meeting Mr. Ewing said: "A case of conside able interest was that of a man living most r spectably. A decent church-goer, but outsi the narrow path which leads to eternal lif not like some sinners, going noisily dow the broad sloping road to hell, but quietl smoothly, yet most surely sliding to everlasti woe. He was awakened in the first meeting his need of a personal Saviour, and was eager groping in the darkness of his own understan ing for the way of truth and righteousness. H could not find in his heart or mind what w not there, so he appealed to me for help, and a short space of time I was able to lead him the wicket gate, through which he entered a cast himself at the feet of Jesus."

A Porter's Deliverance from Drink.—"It four months since I gave myself to the Lor and gave up drinking. I met Jesus in one the evangelistic meetings, and have been kept H Him since then. Though I was a drinking ma yet I never have the least desire to taste no It is not that I cannot get it; on the contrar I can get as much as I like, for I am in a sto closely connected with the trade. They don deal in drink, but they supply the saloons wi glasses, and of course when I take out a hea load they ask, 'What are you for?' my repl 'I am not drinking,' settles it; they don't pre me further. Those who are here should con to Jesus, and He will keep them safe, and mak them happy."

A Backsliding Student's Sorrow.—Mr. Dew narrated the following: "Thirty years ago visited in the country a student lying on a sic bed, and what proved to be his death-bed. H was in blank despair. Truly, he had been co verted to Christ, but the temptations of colle life were too strong for him to stand witho help, and as he had neglected to fly to God f succor, he committed a great sin. It lay like load of lead upon his heart, so that he was dyi in sorrow and darkness. I quoted several cases mentioned in the Bible of great sinners being converted; but to each his reply was, 'It won't suit, he was unconverted; I sinned against light.' I did not know what his sin was, but at last I quoted the case of David, as told in II Samuel. 'Yes! that may suit me,' he said. It did suit him, and he found pardon, and died rejoicing in the Lord Jesus. No one is too bad for God to cure. No backslider need think 'I am lost,' for God will restore him if he confesses his sin and repents."

A Dying Man's Startling Reply.—"A Poor Roman Catholic lay dying; never before had he realized that there was a vast eternity to be spent by him. The priest called and administered 'extreme unction' as it is called, but it gave him no peace, his distress so wrought on his friends that one said, 'I'll attend to your children after you're gone.' Another said, 'I'll do the same for your wife.' Still he got no rest, and continued to grieve his friends by his cries and moaning. One inquired, 'You are not suffering much in body, and the priest has made your soul all right, what do you want? 'I want some one to go to hell for me!' was his strange and startling reply. The poor man, kept by the priest in ignorance of the Son of God, Jesus Christ, who bore the sin of the world on the cross, died in agony of soul for want of knowing that 'whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life.'"

Chains Knocked off a Captive.—Major Colquhoun related: "I visited a man one afternoon whose life had become a weary drudgery through drink. Formerly he held a good position in society, but was then down to the deeper depths, and, like a tired child, his only desire was to lie down and get rest. Many times has he appeared to be drawn near to Jesus, only to be swept away by the, to him, irresistible flood of temptation to which he was subject. Darkness falls upon him; no hope nor help comes to him. How did this happen to him? Because he was looking to his own feelings instead of to the Lord Jesus. I pointed him to the command in Acts 12: 7, 'Arise up quickly,' and to the result, namely, that the chains fell off at once. I am delighted to be able to add that he did arise, and that freedom and rest in Jesus are now his daily possession, and the theme of his unceasing song."

The Wages the Devil Pays.—A Man who has been rescued from a life of drunkenness recently gave cheerful testimony of what divine grace had done for him. He said: "I was at one time well known in this district as being a drunken waster, that is a man who is thoroughly done up through love of drink. My wife and children were miserable beings. Often my little girl begged me to go down on my knees to her mother and promise not to abuse them, but as often I refused to do it. We were in rags; I had neither shirt, trousers, coat, nor vest, but only some filthy bits of cloth to cover my nakedness, and that sometimes they didn't do. Now my home is comfortable and happy. Serving the devil brought me to rags, serving God has made me a new man in Christ Jesus, for few of my old companions would know me now. This change has taken place since my conversion. 'Trust in the Lord, and do good; so shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed'" (Psa. 37: 3).

Effect of a Mother's Prayers in a Theatre.—The Rev. S. Harding related an incident which occurred in 1858: "Down in the west of England there was a family the father and mother of which were devoted Christians. I do not know that I ever met with a woman who was so bright, loving, and tender as that mother. There were eight children, and it was a beautiful sight to see them all round the table with cheerful faces. I asked the mother, 'How is it that you never have any trouble with your children?' 'I have had trouble, but I took them to the Lord when they were born, and gave them into His care. Do you see that boy?' 'Yes.' 'He was a wild, wayward youth; he went with loose companions to theatres, music halls, and like places. One night as he was going out, I said, "Timothy, where are you going?" "Never you mind, mother." "Timothy, I will follow you." She did not mean to follow him in body, but in prayer. He knew what she meant, and pleaded, 'Don't, mother, please don't!' 'When you leave this house I will go to my room and remain there till you return.' The boy went to the theatre, but in the middle of the performance the Holy Spirit influenced him, and made him go home, where he found his mother on her knees praying for him. The old lady is now over eighty years of age; five of the sons are ministers, one son is an evangelist, and the two girls are ministers' wives. What a forcible illustration this case furnishes of the text, 'Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you'" (I Peter 5: 7).

RECRUITS FOR CHINA.

AT a meeting of the China Inland Mission, held on February 21st in London, five recruits for the work of the mission bade good-by to their friends and described the circumstances which had led to their leaving home and country to labor for Christ in China. The London Christian gives the following account of the proceedings:

"The first to present themselves before the audience were Mr. Windsor and Mr. Hughesdon. These two brothers, in succession, told how they had first been brought to the Saviour for their own salvation, and then had been led to devote themselves to His service in the high places of the field. They are both young and, of course, inexperienced in Christian work; but it was good to hear them tell of their simple and restful confidence in God, and to see that they are filled with a yearning desire to be used in scattering Gospel light among the benighted millions of China.

"Miss Fowles spoke very briefly. Her heart, she said, was too full to allow of the free use of her tongue. Waiving any recital of her personal experience, which might be told another time, she read the passage in Acts 13 which describes the setting apart of Saul and Barnabas for work in a new field. In choice and measured phrase she spoke of the need of Holy Ghost power and of true separation from the world, in order to success in the service of Christ, whether at home or abroad. 'I praise God,' she said, 'that on the very night He saved me it was my joy to lead one of my schoolfellows to Him. We are to begin at home, but we are not to stop there.' In closing her earnest exhortation she asked, as the brethren had done before her, that they should be remembered before God in prayer, that He in His great love and mercy would bestow on them all the grace and strength and patience needed to carry out His will.

"We wish we could afford the space to give without abbreviation the address that followed from Miss Whitchurch. Such a touching narrative of divine guidance, told with such unction and womanly grace, is not often heard on a public platform; small wonder that it deeply moved those who listened. We can only repeat it in the briefest outline:

"'It was some time last year that I felt especially doubtful whether I was in my right place—whether the Lord meant me to remain at home with my mother and my three sisters. I felt as though I were not doing as much for my Lord as I might do in another sphere. Yet I was afraid to stir without being sure that the Lord was guiding me. I knew His promise was there to all His children, "I will guide thee with mine eye." So I prayed daily, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? Make my way plain before my face."

"'Weeks passed on and I had no sign. In September last a friend in Salisbury wrote and told me that Dr. Barnardo and Mr. Hudson Taylor, among others, were going to speak at the conference convened there by Mr. Thwaites, and she invited me to be her guest during the conference. I was delighted to accept of the invitation. At one of the meetings I heard from Mr. Taylor, for the first time, of the work of the China Inland Mission. He told, as I had never heard it told before, of the great need of China, how there was but one missionary to a million of the people in that land. He put it very solemnly to each one of us as to whether we could not be easily spared. As I sat and listened a voice seemed to say to me, "Why cannot you go? You can be spared. Your mother has your three sisters with her, and your place can easily be filled up." The thought came with terrible power that it was

me. I must own that no one can be more astonished than myself that I am standing here, expecting to go to China. I had been to many missionary meetings and heard about foreign lands, but I never thought of being a missionary myself. I used to think and say, very lightly, I fear, that I was too selfish and too timid to be a missionary. I have a great natural dread of the sea; I should never think of going on it for pleasure. You may understand how terrible at first was the thought that God meant me to go to China. But I thank Him that He enabled me from the first to say, "If Thou art calling me to go, I know Thou wilt give me strength, and I am willing to go." I was enabled also to go home and talk calmly to my mother about it, and she said she did not dare to hinder me—she might be fighting against God. I feel I can go forth joyfully—

"ANYWHERE WITH JESUS."

"'He has been so good and so loving, and has revealed Himself so sweetly to me since I have been willing to go. However, the Lord tested me, and before Christmas it almost seemed as if I could not go after all. I came up to London hoping to be accepted, but the council did not think I was strong enough, and I went home disappointed. I looked to the Lord to be my healer as well as my guide. He has restored me so that I was able to do more work for Him last January than I had done for some time. He has also given me great joy in working and speaking for Him. Some of my friends think I am going beyond all bounds of propriety in standing up here to-night; but I cannot trouble about that. The Lord has helped me all along, and I cannot but put my trust in Him. Some of my friends say they do not quite approve of the China Inland Mission, because there is too much faith in it! The idea of any one trusting our dear heavenly Father too much! It is very wonderful to me.'

"More striking still, perhaps, was the story narrated by Miss Minchin, who, although well on in middle life, seems as enthusiastic and youthful in spirit as if she were still in her teens. She told how she had been privileged to labor for God and her fellows these many years past; how her coffee-room work at Moreton Hampstead had to be dropped because the brewer who owned the coffee-room caused it to revert to the degradation of a tap-room; how she had been laid aside by severe illness, and given up as a

by two doctors; how through the prayer of faith she had been marvellously raised up so that she could now hold five services on the Lord's Day, and be quite fresh at the end of them; how she had heard Mr. Hudson Taylor at the same Salisbury Conference as that referred to by Miss Whitchurch; and how she had been led, notwithstanding her mature age, to give herself to work among her sisters in China.

"To complete the interest of the evening's proceedings, Mr. Hudson Taylor recounted some of the Lord's wonderful dealings with the mission, especially during the past few years, in answering their prayers as to the supply of workers and of means to support them. His remarkable recital must have been strengthening to the faith of the friends who are going out, as well as stimulating to all the Christian hearts in the audience."

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Lasker Difficulty Appears to have been satisfactorily closed by the resolutions adopted by the House on March 19th. The committee to which were referred the resolutions it was proposed to adopt, and which were somewhat disrespectful to the German Chancellor, recommended that they be tabled and in their place advised the adoption of two resolutions which are in effect that the resolutions of January 9th were intended as a tribute of respect to the memory of an eminent foreign statesman who had died within the United States, and an expression of sympathy with the German people for whom he had been an honorable representative, and that the House having no official concern with the relations between the executive and legislative branches of the German Government, does not deem it requisite to its dignity to criticise the manner of the reception of the resolutions or the circumstances which prevented their reaching their destination after they had been communicated through the proper channels to the German Government. The resolutions suggested by the committee were passed by the House.

A Postal Telegraph System is Now under the consideration of Congress. The Postal Telegraph Company has submitted to a committee of the Senate a proposal to receive from the postal authorities in any one of the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, Peoria, Springfield, Ill., and St. Louis telegrams which it will transmit to the postal authorities in any other of those cities at the rate of twenty-five cents for twenty words and ten cents for every additional ten words, with lower rates for night messages. The company undertakes to extend its lines every year until they cover the whole Union, and to file bonds for the efficient discharge of its obligations. It proposes that the government shall furnish, without charge, to the telegraph company, a suitable room, or rooms, for the office, employés, instruments, batteries, and other appliances necessary for the transaction of its business under the contract, and shall also provide the said company with the necessary rights and facilities for connecting its lines with such postal telegraph offices. Also to provide telegram-stamps and stamped paper, to be sold as postage-stamps are now sold, of denominations corresponding with the several tariff rates. Upon every telegram delivered by authority of the government to the telegraph company the proper stamp for full prepayment, including delivery, shall be affixed by the sender of the message. The high price now charged by the companies and the conduct of the Western Union monopoly has led to the proposal being favorably regarded in the country, promising, as it does, an efficient service at a reasonable rate. If Congress accepts its offer and the company can fulfil its promises the change will be a very welcome one to the public.

Ex-Speaker Keifer has not been Vindicated by the committee appointed to investigate the removal of one of the stenographers of the House. The report adopted by the committee states that "at a late hour in the evening of March 3d, 1883, C. W. Tyson, one of the official stenographers to committees, ceased to be an official stenographer, and a few moments later Benjamin P. Gaines [Keifer's nephew] was appointed. This appointment was made by General Keifer, then Speaker of the House. Mr. Gaines testifies that he performed no service from the time of his appointment, March 3d, 1883, until after the organization of the committees of the House in December last. The committee has made an earnest effort to discover whether Tyson was 'turned out,' in order that Gaines might be appointed, or whether he resigned his place voluntarily or under compulsion. That Tyson did not retire without a struggle is fully shown by the testimony. His resignation was tendered because demanded by the Speaker, and was, in fact, a resignation under protest." It is difficult to see how the committee, in the face of the evidence, could have come to any other conclusion. The mystery is how a man capable of performing so despicable an action could have secured an election to Congress and have been placed in the chair by the Republican party. It may be that in neither case did decent men who voted for him know his character, but that excuse cannot be pleaded in future.

The Cutting Down of the Appropriations for the postal service meets with little approval in the country. The appropriation finally passed by the House last week retains at the present rate the salaries of postmasters in the nine large cities, but the House by a party vote rejected the amendment increasing by $400,000 the item for the support of the free delivery service. Mr. Horr moved to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report a bill in accordance with the estimates of the Postmaster-General. This amendment was rejected by a party vote, and the bill was passed by a party vote. While citizens of all parties are agreed that Congress is far too lavish and wasteful with the public funds, they have no sympathy with economy which cripples the most important service in the country and reduces the facilities of business men.

The Temperance Crusade in New Jersey Increases in intensity and success. Messrs. Mabee and English are holding meetings in Bloomfield, which are crowded and enthusiastic, and large numbers of pledges are being signed. Some of the signers are the very last men who were expected to become total abstainers. The movement in Plainfield has not justified the prediction of the liquor dealers that it would die out when the evangelists departed. Since the beginning of the temperance agitation there have been only four arrests made, and two liquor sellers have each discharged a bartender. The Reform Club now numbers 650 members, the majority of whom were not until recently total abstinence men. The names of fifty new members have been published, together with 200 more names to the general pledge roll, which now has nearly 2400 signers. Active measures are being taken to prevent the reissuing of licenses to the inns in the country about Plainfield. In Ramapo and Orangetown the temperance party have had an exciting struggle over the election of an excise commissioner. The rum-sellers exerted themselves and spent their money freely, but in spite of their efforts the temperance man was elected in each place. At Montclair two of the liquor dealers have joined the Reform Club and closed their shops. One of the proprietors said that she could not afford to lose her stock of liquors, and a member of the club purchased her entire supply of liquors and emptied it into the street, after which the place was closed and the owner enrolled on the pledge list. In the other shops custom has greatly fallen off. "We have not made one half our regular sales this week," said the bar-keeper of a large shop. "If this sort of thing doesn't stop before long, we may as well shut up."

The Rapid Increase in the Number of Victims of the opium habit has at length attracted the attention of Congress. Probably few people know the appalling extent to which the habit prevails. Thousands of business-men, physicians, lawyers, and an unknown number of ladies are slaves to the drug—some smoking it and others using it hypodermically. The importation of opium has increased from 85,075 pounds in 1881 to 298,152 pounds in the year ended June, 1883. A bill was introduced into the House last week, providing that the importation of opium, except aqueous extracts for medicinal use and tinctures, shall be prohibited, under penalties of fine and imprisonment, and that sellers or those who knowingly aid or abet its importation or sale shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5000 and imprisoned for a term not exceeding five years. Opium imported, sold, or offered for sale, shall be declared forfeited to the government and be destroyed. Severe penalties are provided for concealment of or connivance at violations of the act by government officials.

Protests against the Brutality of the Police in New York have been unusually numerous during the past few weeks. On the occasion of the St. Patrick's day procession a burly policeman was seen to push a young man back into the crowd of lookers-on, and the crowd being so dense that he could not force him back far enough he deliberately stamped on his feet time after time until the sufferer screamed with pain. Other charges of still more atrocious cruelty are being made, proving that a sweeping reform is urgently needed. A large number of the force are Irish ruffians, drunken and ferocious. As soon as they are clothed in uniform and armed with club and pistol they appear to think their twenty-five or thirty dollars a week is to be earned by assaulting peaceable citizens. Acts of brutality which make the blood boil are daily witnessed by people whose business takes them into the down-town districts.

The Proposal to Offer Rewards to Whaling vessels about to proceed to the Arctic, which may find and relieve the Greely party, is opposed by Secretaries Chandler and Lincoln. They think that the rewards might tempt them to undertake risks for which the vessels are not fitted and so lead to loss of life. It is now announced that the Bear will sail from New York by April 25th, the Thetis by May 1st, and the Alert by May 10th. They will proceed direct to St. John, Newfoundland. The Alert will be commanded by Commander George W. Coffin, who has signified his acceptance of that position. Commander Coffin is at present on duty at San Francisco as lighthouse inspector, but he will be detached from that duty on March 31st.

Young People's Revival Services are Being conducted every night in the Twelfth Street Reformed Church, Brooklyn. The Rev. Mr. Gulich, who has charge of them, has requested us to ask our readers to pray that the divine blessing may continue to be vouchsafed to the effort.

The Pocahontas Mine, the Scene of the Recent disaster, in which one hundred and fifty miners lost their lives, is being flooded. An effort was made on Saturday to descend into the mine to search for the bodies of the dead, but as the fire was found to be still burning the attempt was abandoned. Engines were then set to work to flood the workings. It was ascertained that two more lives were lost in the disaster than were previously reckoned. Two colored miners from another section had obtained permission to inspect the mines, and entered them with other men on that fatal morning, and were lost with the rest.

By the Death of Dr. Ezra Abbot, America loses one of her most learned Biblical scholars. He expired at Cambridge, Mass., on March 21st. Dr. Abbot had been connected with Harvard University for upward of twenty-eight years, first as Assistant Librarian and afterward as Professor of New Testament Criticism and Interpretation. The most prominent of his literary works were translations from the Greek and German. He also contributed numerous articles to Smith's Dictionary of the Bible. He was a member of the American Committee on the revision of the New Testament. A man of singular modesty and disinterestedness, he was but little known to the general public, but among scholars his profound learning won him the respect of all with whom he came in contact personally or through the press. He was in his sixty-fifth year, having been born in Jackson, Me., in 1819.

The Swedish Evangelical Pilgrim Congregation is making an effort to build a church in Brooklyn, N. Y. A large and increasing immigration from Sweden has been noted during the past few years, and Christian work among the immigrants has been actively pursued in an unostentatious way by Christian men of that nationality. There are now some five thousand Swedes in Brooklyn, and public services in their own language have been regularly held for their benefit. A church of one hundred members has been formed, of which the Rev. C. J. Lundquist is pastor. It is undenominational, but evangelical in character. Its meetings have hitherto been held in hired rooms; but, feeling that more good might be done if a church were built, the members have subscribed to a fund for the purpose. It now amounts to $2500, and the members now appeal to the Christian public for assistance in the effort. When we recollect how largely the national welfare is affected by the character of the immigrants who come to our shores from all lands, we realize the value of work of this character.

A Novel Advertising Scheme was Submitted recently to a firm of tobacco dealers by a man who, though grossly ignorant, styled himself "Professor." The following extract from his letter, in which the eccentricities of spelling are preserved, explains his project: "I take the liberty to write about a novel way of advertising, that is, to have all tobacco seals and stamps in your line of business tattooed on the person of a man that is now undergoing the proses of being tattooed from head to foot his back is left for this kind of advertising if you would like to have the lower half of his back for any seal or stamp or picture, you can have it for three hundred & fifty dollars the uper part is engaged. this man is to travel throughout the U. S. this man will be done in five weeks this work is the neetest best in this line of business if you would like a smaller place than that let me know as the back of his legs is not wholey finished yet it will be don in first class style this is the third man that I have tattooed all over." It is not known whether "the Professor" or the man operated upon was to have the $350, but it may be inferred that there would be some arrangement between them for sharing the money. The idea of a man so letting out his body to advertise tobacco is utterly repulsive, and shows how low some men will stoop to get money. Tatooing was strictly forbidden under the Mosaic law (Lev. 19 : 28), but there may be marks borne on the body of suffering for Christ which are eternally honorable. Such marks the Apostle Paul said were branded on his body (Gal. 6 : 17, Revised Version).

The Report of the Bible and Fruit Mission was presented at the annual meeting, held in Association Hall, New York, recently. It showed that 79,925 persons had been served with meals, of whom 7975 were sick in the hospital. In the lodging-house 6624 persons were given lodgings at twelve to fifteen cents a night. The building has a reading-room and baths, which are free. Sermons are delivered every evening in the chapel and twice on Sunday. During the year 7405 persons have attended the meetings, among whom there were 196 conversions; 32 men were given employment, and 12 are now saving money. The Rev. Dr Crosby, who presided at the meeting, said the mission was one of the most valuable and successful agents for the amelioration of the condition of the city. It began by looking after the sick in the hospitals, and it now looks after those who come from prison under the scorn of the community. There were 47 rum-holes put where they could be reached by discharged prisoners from Blackwell's Island. They were no sooner landed than they were snared in these dens of iniquity. Such institutions as the mission would strike a death-blow to the liquor dealers.

Two Litigants Locked in a Room Together made an amicable settlement of their difficulty. Dr. Miner, of Trenton, N. J., who was formerly a pastor at Springfield, Ill., relates that when Abraham Lincoln was practising law in that city a farmer went to him to secure his services in a lawsuit pending between himself and a neighbor. Lincoln said, "Now, if you go on with this, it will cost both of you your farms, and will entail an enmity that will last for generations, and perhaps lead to murder. The other man has just been here to engage me. Now I want you two to sit down in my office while I am gone to dinner, and talk it over and try to settle it. And to secure you from any interruption, I will lock the door." He did so, and he did not return all the afternoon. The two men finding themselves imprisoned burst out laughing, and being thus put in good humor came to a settlement before Mr. Lincoln returned. The example may be commended to the attention of Christians who appear to have forgotten that Christ explicitly pronounced a blessing on peacemakers (Matt. 5 : 9).

A Furious Fight with a Madman Occurred on a pier of the North River, New York, recently. Two men were loading a truck on the pier, when one of them, named Bird, noticed the other, whose name was Gillespie, acting in a strange manner. Bird saw that his companion had in his hand an open and bloody razor. Before he could do anything Gillespie, without saying a word, began hacking at his throat with it. Bird sprang upon him, and catching the arm in which he held the razor, attempted to wrest it from him. Gillespie, who was a large, powerful man, threw his friend from him for a moment, and then there was a desperate struggle between them for the possession of the weapon. The blood from Gillespie's wound made the floor slippery, and just as Bird had about succeeded in getting the razor, he fell and rolled off the truck to the ground. Bird's rolling off the truck probably saved his life, for the insane man was furious at his interference. As soon as he was free, Gillespie began hacking at his throat again, and finally severed his windpipe. He fell to the floor of the truck, and died in a very few moments. We can pity a man so demented that he would struggle with a friend who was trying to save him from death; but we cannot make the same excuse for men, presumably sane, who resist those who are seeking to save them from eternal death. Sometimes, too, men who profess to be Christians are rebellious under discipline, which God sends to recall their wandering footsteps from a path which leads to spiritual disaster (Psalm 119 : 67).

A WAITING GOD AND A WAITING PEOPLE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you, and therefore will He be exalted, that He may have mercy upon you: for the Lord is a God of judgment: blessed are all they that wait for Him."—Isaiah 30 : 18.

People who Believed in Self-Help—Salvation for the Patient—I. A Waiting God—His Wonderful Reason for Waiting—That They Might Discover Their Error—That They Might Learn Their Sinfulness—That Their Sin Might Sting Them—That They Might Pray—His Singular Patience—Continuance of Privileges—Increase of Agencies—Action after Waiting—A Final Success—II. A Waiting People—They Wait Expectantly—Believe in the Dark—What to Wait for.

The people were in a great hurry to be delivered from their enemies. The Assyrians had come up in great force, and were covering the land with their armies. They had already devastated the neighboring kingdom of Israel, and therefore the men of Judah were afraid that they would be swallowed up quick, even as dry stubble is devoured of the fire. The prophet bade the inhabitants of Jerusalem remain where they were; adding, "For thus saith the Lord God, the Holy One of Israel: In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." But they would not listen to the counsel of wisdom; they preferred to follow the suggestion of their fears, and to go down into Egypt for shelter.

They were impatient because they were unbelieving. They were slow to obey, but they were swift to rebel; hence the Lord cries to them by His prophet: "Woe to the rebellious children, that take counsel, but not of me." They sent their princes as ambassadors to Zoan to entreat aid from the Egyptian king, yea, they sent a great treasure upon camels as a bribe to Pharaoh to espouse their cause against Assyria. They would not rely upon their God, and so they looked to the land of the viper and the fiery flying serpent, and were stung with bitter disappointment; for vapor and emptiness were the help of Egypt. It seemed as if then was, "We will flee upon horses, we will ride upon the swift." Again and again he urged them to be quiet, saying, "Your strength is to sit still;" but they would not learn that rash haste is but ill-speed. They could not be quiet by reason of their fear and folly; but the Lord waited, and turned not from His long-enduring patience. In the words of our text He showed that if mortals could not wait, yet their Maker could: "Therefore will the Lord wait, that He may be gracious unto you;" and He assured them yet again that if they would learn to wait, they should find it their wisdom and happiness; for, "Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

Here is the subject of this morning's discourse. Certain of God's people are in trouble and distress, and they are eager for immediate rescue. They cannot wait God's time, nor exercise submission to His will. He will surely deliver them in due season; but till the hour cometh; like children, they snatch at unripe fruit. "To everything there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven;" but their one season is the present; they cannot, they will not wait. They must have their desire instantaneously fulfilled, or else they are ready to take wrong means of attaining it. If in poverty, they are in haste to be rich; and they shall not long be innocent. If under reproach, their heart ferments toward revenge. They would sooner rush under the guidance of Satan into some questionable policy, than in childlike simplicity trust in the Lord and do good. It must not be so with you, my brethren; you must learn a better way. I hope that the sermon of this morning may go some way, by God's Spirit, toward instructing you in the holy art of waiting for the Lord. "Those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth."

The text divides itself into two parts; first, it introduces us to a waiting God; and then, secondly, it speaks of a waiting people.

I. First, we have here

A WAITING GOD.

I shall not confine our illustration of this waiting on the part of God to the case of the men of Judah described in the text; but I shall come home to your own experience, and speak of how the Lord has waited, that He might be gracious to you. Let us behold His long-suffering toward ourselves. In so doing we shall not be leaving the Scripture, for the text as truly describes our own experience as that of the men of Isaiah's day.

The word of the Lord which is now to be considered opens first with a wonderful reason for waiting: "And therefore will the Lord wait." "Therefore"—mark the word! The Lord Jehovah does as He wills both in heaven and earth, and His ways are past finding out; but He never acts unreasonably; He does not tell us His reasons, but He has them; for He acts "according to the counsel of His will." God has His "therefores," and these are of the most forcible kind. The chapter contains a denunciation of the false confidences of the people, and because of these one might have concluded that the Lord would cast them off forever. If they will have Egypt to lean upon, let them lean on Egypt, till like a spear it pierces their side. God might well say, "Let them alone; they are given to their idols;" instead of which He cries, "Therefore will the Lord wait." He will let them see the result of their carnal confidences; He will allow them time in which to test and try Egypt, and see whether Egypt is not a boaster whose help is to no purpose.

Do you not remember when it was so with you? Perhaps you began your religious life with the great mistake of hoping to find salvation in your own goodness; you looked to your feelings, prayings, doings and professions for safety. You thought that must come from yourself, and so you sought to "work out your own salvation with fear and trembling," without remembering that "it is God that worketh in us to will and to do of His own good pleasure." You knew nothing of God's grace, you thought much of your own good works. So many prayers and tears, so many church-goings or chapel-goings, so much of sacraments, almsgivings, and the like; and this would make up a sweet-smelling sacrifice, acceptable to God. Blessed be the Lord who had great patience with you. He had told you plainly enough beforehand that by the works of the law there should no flesh be justified in His sight, and you ought not to have tried that forbidden way; but as you would try it He suffered you to run therein till a gulf opened before you. You worked out the plan of self-salvation, and the net result was bitter disappointment; for you saw that you could not keep the law, and you felt also that if you did keep it your obedience would make no recompense for the sins of the past.

I heard some time ago of a man who let out horses and carriages. A person wished to hire, and, having heard the price, he went round the little town to all other persons in that line of business to get something cheaper; but as he did not succeed, he returned to the first person and said he would hire his horse and carriage. "No," said the other, "I am not going to let you have it. I know why you have come to me; you have been round everywhere else, and if you could have saved a shilling you would not have come to me." I do not commend the tradesman, but I do not much wonder at his conduct. See how much more patience there is in God than in man. We refuse His free salvation, and go round by way of our own merits, and everywhere else, to try and find some other ground of confidence, and then at last, when everything has broken down, and to salvation through Jesus Christ; and yet we find the Lord lovingly waiting, graciously waiting—a God ready to pardon.

WE COME BACK TO GOD

Further, these people were rebels against God, and the Lord was waiting to let them fully manifest their rebellious spirit, and be made ashamed of it. The Lord allowed the people to show their rebellious character—to let all mankind know what kind of people God had to deal with, and that they might in after days have the higher admiration of His long-suffering and of His grace. I think the Lord permits many sinners to go to the full length of their tether in order that they may know in future what stuff they are made of, and may never trust in themselves. A strange "therefore" is God's "therefore"—"therefore will the Lord wait that He may be gracious."

The Lord would wait again for yet another reason, namely, to let them suffer somewhat of the effect of their sin. He permitted them to send their ambassadors to Egypt, that they might come back disappointed, and He allowed the Assyrians to devastate the land, that they might feel the pinch of famine, and learn that it is an evil and a bitter thing to forsake the living God. Perhaps some of us were left in the same way, and we shall never forget what we thus learned; we were allowed to go on in sin, and we did do so until we began to feel the result of it; and now we flee from it with horror. We put our hand into the fire until it was burned, and now we dread the fire.

Once more, I do not doubt that the Lord waited in this case to be gracious until the people should begin to pray, for that seems to be in this affair. The prophet says, "He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry; when He shall hear it, He will answer thee." The Lord is listening for the sinner's prayer. How is it that you have not prayed long before, O troubled spirit? Why have those lips been dumb for years? What, with all your sense of sin, and with a clear idea of the misery that will come of it, have you yet refused to pray? Then you may well wonder that the Lord should wait.

This leads us to notice, in the second place, the singular patience of God in that waiting. What does it mean when we are told that the Lord waiteth that He may have mercy upon us? It means that He kept back the sword of justice. It is inevitable that where there is evil, God shall be angered with it. It is not a matter of arbitrariness with Him, but it is inevitable that the Judge of all the earth should take vengeance upon evil and wrong. God must punish sin, this is one of the fixed and settled principles of His very existence. Here the attribute of long-suffering patience comes in and spares the guilty from time to time, giving space for repentance. Have not some of you been in positions where, if you had been killed, it would have seemed only according to the order of nature that you should be? Well, then, bless that God who waited, and held back the punishment that was due to you!

This patience of God signifies more, however, than delay in punishment; it means the continuance of privileges; for the Lord told these people that, although He might give them the bread of adversity and the water of affliction on account of their sins, yet He would not take away their teachers from them any more, they should still be instructed, and warned, and invited to come to Him. Has it not been so with some of us? We heard the Gospel when we were quite young, and we have continued to hear it till we are quite old, so patient is the Lord. It may be that I speak to some who have continued to hear that Gospel every Sabbath-day, and have determinedly refused it throughout a long life. Shall it continue to be so? Dare we always provoke the Lord? Still is hung out, and the silver trumpet knows no note but "Mercy, mercy, mercy!" Oh, that man would hear that note and turn unto the Lord!

So singular was God's patience that He even increased His holy agencies to lead the people to Himself. He says: "Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it." Do we not remember how when the public ministry seemed to miss us we began to be bestirred by an inward force more powerful than visible ministries? Conscience cried aloud and accused us from within doors. The voice of Jesus from without seemed echoed from within. Did we contend against even this? Alas! we did, for we seemed determined to destroy ourselves. Behold, what manner of patience the Lord has exercised toward us according to the abundance of His grace.

Nay, this is not all; for all this while God was passing by our rejections of Him, blotting out our sinful refusals, and insulting despisings of His goodness. You know how it would be even with your own child, if you were to say to him, "My child, I am ready to forgive you if you will confess your fault." If he would not acknowledge that he was wrong, but held out stubbornly, you might have considerable patience, but I question if that patience would last for days and weeks. Your rod would soon be spoken with. Men that have been very famous for bearing insults have at last been compelled in vindication of their own honor to put an end to the provocation. How grievously far have you and I carried our insults of God! Do I not speak to some who are carrying the provocation a long way even now? This cannot last always; men cannot always thrust their fingers into God's eyes at this rate. The wonder is that it has lasted so long.

I must now notice

which follows upon the waiting. After the Lord had displayed His patience to His people, He resolved to go further, and He proceeded to a most notable matter which is thus described: "Therefore will He be exalted, that He may have mercy upon you." You and I would have turned the text round the other way and said: "Therefore will He have mercy upon you, that He may be exalted;" that would be true, but it is not the truth here taught. The picture represents the Lord as it were as sitting still, and allowing His people through their sin to bring suffering upon themselves; but now, after long patience, He arouses Himself to action. Methinks I hear Him say, "They will not come to me, they refuse all my messengers, they plunge deeper and deeper into sin, now will I see what my grace can do!" He rises as one who means to put forth His power. He stands ready for action. And now, as if that were not enough, he says to himself, "I will be exalted. I will go up to my throne that I may have mercy upon them. I will manifest my power. I will take the ensigns of my dominion into my hand, and act as a sovereign."

It also bears this meaning. When a man is about to deal a heavy stroke he lifts up himself to give the blow; he exalts himself to bring down the scourge more heavily upon the shoulder. Even so the Lord seems to say, "I will put forth all my might, I will exercise all my skill, I will display all my attributes up to their greatest height, that I may have mercy upon these hardened, stiffnecked sinners—I will be exalted that I may have mercy upon them."

Oh, but this is a surpassingly glorious text! I remember thinking, "Surely, if God saves me, He will be a God indeed!" He did save me because He is a God indeed. Here is the proof of it: "Look unto me and be ye saved all ye ends of the earth; for I am God." Because He is God He saves those who look to Him. Somebody here says, "Well, truly, if the Lord were to crown His patience by bringing me to Himself I should think more of His glorious grace than ever I have done heretofore." Just so, and He means to make you think after that manner. Our Lord intends to make you stand at His feet weeping, as that woman did who had been a sinner, and who so loved Him that she washed His feet with tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head, because she had sinned much and much had been forgiven. Jesus loves to make converts like these. "Oh, magnify the Lord with me, and let us exalt His name together!" is a fit speech for a great sinner.

One thing more before I leave this waiting God, and that is, there is to all this waiting. When the waiting turns to a glorious transaction of grace upon the sinner's heart and conscience, then the time of love has come. Observe that it is written, "He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry." When God has waited for the soul, that soul is brought to wait on Him. God's patience is not in vain toward His chosen. When God deals with His redeemed He does not deal in vain. The Almighty is not defeated. That is implied in the nineteenth verse: "They shall weep no more"—then they did weep till He forgave. Their tears and prayers are flowing; for He declares, "He will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry."

Now also they listen eagerly to the Gospel; for they count it a privilege that "their teachers shall not be removed into a corner any more." They value their ministers, and look at them with careful love, as it is here written: "Thine eyes shall see thy teachers." Those whom they formerly despised they now esteem and delight in. They begin also to obey the voice of the Lord; for they hear the voice behind them saying, "This is the way." This great change comes to transgressors when God deals with them in His own effectual manner; then they mourn for sin, then they pray for mercy, then they listen with attentive ears to the message of love, and then they bow themselves down before the present God, and desire nothing so much as to be at peace with Him.

Meanwhile, one of the chief and most evident tokens of their change is their casting away of the sin they formerly loved. The love of God reigning in the heart makes a man hate his sin. God never forgives sin without making us forsake sin. When He casts our sins into the depths of the sea He causes us to do the same. When the Lord says to our sin, "Begone from my memory," we say to it, "Begone from my heart." Repentance, faith, holiness, zeal, all follow upon the effectual working of divine grace. Oh, that all of you were under its power.

II. Now learn the lesson of the whole subject. Under our second head we have

A WAITING PEOPLE—

"Blessed are all they that wait for Him."

God's waiting people wait upon God only. They are not trusting to the arm of flesh, nor looking to the changeable creature. They do not rely upon themselves, nor depend upon their own experiences, or their mental acquirements. Here is their song:

> "My spirit looks to God alone;
> My rock and refuge is His throne;
> In all my fears, in all my straits,
> My soul on His salvation waits."

Dear friends, you can judge whether you are the people of God or not by this: Can you say, "My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from Him?" "Trust ye in the Lord forever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength."

God's waiting people wait upon God expectantly. They are looking for everything from Him, for He is their all in all. They have had a great deal from God, and they expect more from Him. They are not waiting in despair, nor even in hesitation; they are waiting in hope, a joyous and assured hope of blessedness in reserve. They confidently expect to find their way in the Lord grow brighter and brighter, and still brighter, from the twilight of the morning to the shining of the perfect day. Oh, my brethren, let us wait and watch even as men look for the dawn, because they know that it will not fail them.

But, say you, What are they waiting for? I answer, God's people are waiting upon Him patiently for many things. Sometimes they wait for the tokens of His grace; they are believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and yet they may not for the moment enjoy the peace and comfort which are theirs by faith. If they had more faith their peace would at once be as a river; but it is well if they have faith enough to wait for that peace. At times faith may be very weak, and then it is well if it clings and abides in its place. A man may believe and be saved, and yet he may not be sure of his own salvation, nor discern the safety and blessedness of his condition in Christ Jesus.

O soul, if thou canst not get out of the dark,

BELIEVE IN THE DARK.

If thou hast light enough just to look to Christ by faith, though thou canst not perceive all His beauties and His glories, yet remember thou art bidden to look, and art saved by looking, however dim the light may be. If thou canst but look to the cross so as to trust wholly to the Lamb of God, He hath taken away thy sin. All the joy of the Lord, and all the peace and all the rest that come of faith do not come at once; but thou must wait for them.

Possibly you are looking back to your own past history, and sighing:

> "What peaceful hours I once enjoyed,
> How sweet their memory still!"

Those years which the locust hath eaten shall be restored to you; only be thou hopeful, trustful, and obedient. Lean heavily upon thy God. It is a poor faith which only believes as far as the eye can see. If thou canst not rejoice in the light of His countenance, yet rest in the shadow of His wings. Yes, we must be a waiting people, and assuredly we may not complain; for we caused the Lord to wait for us many a day. What patience He has had! Cannot we be patient?

Sometimes God's people have to wait for the fulfilment of His promises. Every promise will be kept, but not to-day nor to-morrow. God's word has its due season, and His times are the best times. We may also have to wait for answers to our prayers. Prayer will be heard, ay, it is heard the moment it is uttered; but it may not be answered just yet. Pray on! Wait on! Knock, and if the door be not opened, and if the door still be closed, knock again with greater earnestness than before. "Men ought always to pray, and not to faint." If thine importunity be wrought up to the pitch of enthusiasm, it shall be well with thee; for "the kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force."

Frequently we may have to wait for temporal blessings. It may not be safe for us to obtain the desire of our heart, because our heart is as yet too much occupied with the world and the things thereof. We may have to wait for deliverance from trouble, for as yet the furnace may not have accomplished its refining work. You may be ill, and you may pray God to make you well, but He may still allow His beloved to be sick; to you sickness may be healthier than health. You are very poor, and you would like to struggle out of abject penury. By all means struggle on; but do not murmur if you should not be successful; poverty may be a richer state for you than wealth. There may be somewhat in your character which cannot be perfected except by suffering and labor; and it is better that your character be perfected than your substance increased. None of us can come to the highest maturity without enduring the summer heat of trials.

Brother, wait cheerfully. If God sees fit to say, "Wait," do not thou be angry with Him. Why give way to

HURRY AND WORRY?

Oh, rest in the Lord. Your strength is to sit still. One of the most lovely flowers of the new creation is entire submission to the divine will; he who hath it is not far from heaven. Yet you will have to wait a little for glory which is yours by a covenant of salt. Do you not at times suffer a heavenly homesickness? Do you not grow weary of these wildernesses, and long for the mountains of spices and the gardens of the blessed? Do you not long for the wings of a dove? I am afraid you would not manage them if you had them; dove's wings would hardly suit this cumbrous clay.

It is not easy to long for heaven and yet to wait; yet we are better where we are than attempting to fly where the Lord has not called us. Wait; for there is yet more business to be done for your Master. Wouldst thou go to thy rest before thy day's work is fairly finished? Wait; for it is needful for others, if not for thyself. Wait and work on! How many years were wasted ere thou didst come into the vineyard! How little hast thou accomplished since! Wait! for the vision of glory is sure; as sure as though it were to-morrow, or to-day at this very hour.

> Heaven is nearing! How much further?
> Count the milestones one by one!
> No, no counting—only waiting
> Till the glory has begun.

THE SCENE OF THE DYNAMITE EXPLOSION IN LONDON ON FEB. 26.

THE dynamite outrage perpetrated at the railroad depot in London on February 26th was of a singularly despicable character, placing in peril the lives of inoffensive persons. On the next page is a sketch of the platform, showing the havoc worked in the offices by the explosion. It occurred at three minutes past one o'clock in the morning, a fact shown by the stoppage of three clocks at that time. The last trains had discharged their passengers at the station, and the night-duty men had entered upon their work of seeing to the gas and locking the doors, when a loud explosion shook the central part of the series of straggling buildings. The report was like that of artillery. This was followed by the crashing of the roof, the fall of glass in every direction, and cries of alarm in the neighborhood.

Several persons had narrow escapes. A switchman was crossing the cab inclosure when he was suddenly lifted into the air by the rush of wind that followed the detonation, and thrown to the ground. A sergeant of police on duty near the station was hurled into a doorway. One of the few remaining hansoms in the cab inclosure was upset by the current of air from the cloak-room. A man named William Fulford, employed by the railway company to attend to the gas, was endeavoring to put out a gas jet after the explosion, when he fell from the ladder and sustained serious injury to the head. Another employé, Karl Kaltan, a signalman, also received injuries on the back of his neck by the fall of a piece of timber.

The darkness was speedily dispelled by fire from the broken gas-pipes, which threatened to complete the work of destruction. Fortunately, however, it is one of the duties of the night men to have fire hose screwed on to the mains in readiness for any outbreak; and these played upon the flames and kept them in check until the arrival of the Fire Brigade, who speedily extinguished the conflagration.

At daylight the throngs of people who crowded the stations could witness in the roofless offices the principal effects of the explosion.

The London Railroad Depot at Victoria, Shattered by Dynamite, Feb. 26.

The offices were about fifty feet high, and had a glass and slate roof. The property destroyed included a waiting-room, a booking-office, and a luggage depository office (generally called a cloak-room), covering in all a space of about forty-five feet square.

From the outside of the station could be seen through the windowless gaps in the outer wall an extraordinary mingling of beams, bratticing, matchboarding, and lath and plaster, all of it twisted, broken, torn, and a great deal of it burnt. The roof had been lifted up and had fallen in upon the wreck below, covering the shapeless mass of wreckage with white dust and broken glass.

The scene of the explosion covers an area about sixty-five feet in width by one hundred feet in depth.

It was evidently the work of Irish-Americans and was only one of a series of similar explosions which they intended should occur simultaneously in several stations in and about London. But happily the other plots failed, owing to the clumsiness of the plotters.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER.

Over a Hundred Offers of Marriage have been made to the young lady who recently won the chief prize in the French lottery, worth $20,000. The winner is a fresh-looking peasant girl of eighteen, named Daire. Although much elated by her unexpected good fortune, her principal pleasure seems still to be in the knowledge that she will be able to give a handsome dowry to her elder sister. Since the news of her winning the prize has been circulated, Mlle. Daire has received no less than one hundred and six proposals of marriage, the greater number of these being from people who have never seen her face. Many of the applicants send their photographs, and state that they will devote their whole lives to the task of making the winner happy. No answer has been sent to any of them. Mlle. Daire doubtless regards with contempt men who would pledge a life's devotion to a woman they never saw, merely because she had drawn a prize in a lottery. The mercenary character of their offer is too obvious. Far otherwise is it with Christians who joyfully exclaim, "whom not having seen we love" (1 Peter 1 : 8).

A Button in a Lady's Ear was Recently Removed by a skilful aurist in New York, who states that every day he receives several applications from persons suffering from deafness caused by such obstructions. The lady in question was twenty-three years of age, and during the past fourteen years she was so deaf that she could scarcely hear words spoken through a speaking trumpet. The aurist examined her ear and, much to the lady's suprise, he found in it a round brass button which he extracted. When it was removed the lady crouched in a corner of the room in abject terror, exclaiming, "What is that awful noise?" "It was nothing but a wagon rumbling by," says the aurist, "but I instantly saw what the trouble was. Her hearing had become normal when I removed that button, and she was frightened and bewildered at the jumble of confusing sounds. The ticking of the clock, chirping of the canary, or dripping of water distressed her, and the rustle of her own silk dress made her start with fear. I sent one of the assistants home with her in a carriage, and he said that the clatter in the street so distracted her that he was compelled to hold her in her seat." About a week afterward she returned, and told him that she had recalled the circumstances of the button. When a child she went to church with her grandmother, and during the service amused herself by inserting and withdrawing the button in her ear; but until its discovery she had forgotten all about it. Her gratitude for her restored hearing was unbounded. The circumstances of this case are peculiar; but those who are led by Satan, when in church, to stop their ears in other ways from hearing unpalatable truths are by no means few. Christ spoke of this class of person (Matt. 13 : 15).

MAJOR GODDARD AND THE GERMAN EVANGELIST.

At a testimony meeting at New Cross, the scene of Messrs. Moody and Sankey's labors, the following testimony was given by Major Goddard, an officer in the army: "Amid the élite of Indian military life, I was a wanderer for nine years. During that period I never once darkened a place of worship. I was a great blasphemer, and perhaps one of the worst men in the garrison, until poor old Samuel Hebich, a German missionary of the Basle Missionary Society, pierced my heart, and brought me to the sight of the error of my ways.

"This good old missionary, who was beloved in the garrison, determined to convert me to Christ, and when I was told of his determination I said, 'Catch Goddard getting converted.' One day, after being on parade, and very tired, I came home to tea, and noticed Hebich with a Christian officer, Colonel Gompertz, enjoying a social cup. Hebich said, 'I see you've been repairing your house; what about the house above?' I answered sharply, 'What's that to do with you? Look here! you come and see me to-morrow.' Hebich said, 'I will, for I love you.' I said, 'I don't reciprocate the attachment, I assure you;' and turning to Gompertz, I said, 'Never mind that fellow; come and have a shot.' I was very fond of shooting then, and used to spend a great deal of time in killing tigers.

"The next day Gompertz being away, Hebich came, much against my inclination, and was questioning about my religion and my God, when, like Naaman, I got angry, and said, 'Hebich, I am an Englishman!' He asked with a good deal of feeling, 'Who is your God?' I repeated my former answer, 'I am an Englishman!' He said, 'The heathens have a god; are you worse than they?' My answer seemed to cut him up, for I angrily said, 'Go to h— with you!' He went away only to come again and trouble me. On this occasion, however, I was more complacent, and inclined somewhat to listen to him. He again asked, 'Who is your God?' and said, 'Have you got a prayer-book?' I answered in the affirmative, and brought it covered with dust, for I hadn't used it for years. He took it, and turning to the Litany, read, 'By Thine agony and bloody sweat; by Thy cross and passion; by Thy precious death and burial; by Thy glorious resurrection and ascension, and by the coming of the Holy Ghost,

GOOD LORD, DELIVER US.'

"I then and there saw it all. The cross, passion, resurrection, and ascension all came to me, as with one fell swoop my burdens were carried away. I cannot tell you of the joy that filled poor Hebich's heart that day. I immediately dispensed with my gun and my pack of hounds, for I shot no more tigers. On the following evening I was invited to a dinner-party, and on going to the house at Fort Madras, I saw the hostess, and said to her,

'I WAS CONVERTED LAST NIGHT.'

She said, 'O major!' and bolted clean out of the room. It was the last dinner-party I ever attended. I told an officer that I'd got sight of 'the scarlet line' and was converted to Christ. His reply was, 'Don't you be so sure about it.' Another said I had got softening of the brain, but I retorted, 'I have got softening of the heart!' Since then my brother has been converted. I received a letter from him after father's death, in which he said he had lost all his friends on earth, and by this loss he had found a dearer one in heaven.

"I was addressing an audience some time afterward, and my son happened to be in the hall. Without knowing the effect it would have, I cried out, 'Break your pitcher and see the light.' At the close of the meeting a lady came and shook me heartily by the hand, saying, 'Major, I congratulate you — your son is converted.' I sought him, and he told me he had broken his pitcher and was in the full blaze of day. And now around our hearth we chat of the souls we are daily bringing to Christ. who has honored us by making us useful in His service.

Old Hal's Last Rescue.

THE BETSY SHANKLIN.

THE Betsy Shanklin has done good service in her time, so has good Henry Smart, familiarly called "Old Hal," her worthy owner. In storm, flood, peril, or danger, there were none more willing or able to help than he. Old Hal lived on the eastern coast, and was, at the time I made his acquaintance, off service as a disabled seaman, having received a gunshot wound in the leg during the war. For hours Hal could hold you spellbound while recounting the hairbreadth escapes, that his voice would quiver, and in his eye the tear-drop stand, and his heart give one great convulsive sob.

Time, with her hand, had silvered his locks and furrowed his cheek and brow, but his heart was brave and his hand strong to save. With his earnings and pension he purchased a little boat, which he named the Betsy Shanklin, in memory of the love of his youth. To look at the hardy, bluff old seaman, one could scarcely believe him the hero of romance; but Hal, with tender pathos, could tell a story of love and devotion, equalling any recorded. Death had robbed him of the idol of his heart, leaving a vacancy which he had been unable to fill.

"'Tis thirty years ago and ten weeks I laid her in the grave—the day we was to ha' been married, and hard 'twas at first, very hard; but the lines of a little hymn as I picked up one day have consoled me wonderful like; perhaps you would like to hear me say 'em, sir? they be as beautiful as ever you heard."

"Yes, Hal, I should," I answered, for I felt a deep interest in the old tar.

His voice was shaky with emotion, as he said:

"And when with my glorified vision at last,
The walls of that 'City' I see;
Will any one then, at the beautiful gate,
Be waiting and watching for me?"

"My Betsy will be there, and I promised to meet her; but sometimes I'm a-feared she'll get tired a-waiting, it seems so long; and at night I lie awake and think on her, and wonder how long it will be afore I can tell her I ha' been true to her all these long years."

Then, with reverence, he unfolded a piece of dirty paper, and showed me the lines he had repeated. Having only the one verse, I offered to get him the others, which delighted the old man more than any other thing I could have given him. And when I told him I knew a gentleman who was intimately acquainted with the writer (who was a lady), he was overjoyed, and begged I would convey to her his appreciation of "her beautiful words."

"I guess she never thought they would fall into the hands of a bluff old salt like me; but they have encouraged and cheered me many and many a time when I have felt lone in heart, cos I know my Betsy will be waiting at the beautiful gate for me. Were it not for that one thought of the meeting, and my home above, life would not be worth living.

A year or two later, being in the same locality, I sought my old friend the pensioner. But I learned that I should never see him again in this world. One of his acquaintances, a boatman like himself, took me to see his grave in a quiet cemetery. The old man had gone to the beautiful gate, where he expected to find his Betsy awaiting him. The old boatman told me the story of his death as we stood by the grave.

Old Hal was walking on the cliffs one moonlight night at the close of a day's severe labor, when he saw, standing on a strip of a sand-bank, the figure of a woman. She was evidently in a state of agonized distress. She had walked to that spot, obviously without knowing anything of the coast. Some stranger probably, for a native would have known that the incoming tide would cut off all chance of escape.

Hal knew that the moments were precious, and he called to her from the cliffs to let her know that she was observed. Then the old man ran as fast as his legs could carry him to the spot where his boat was hauled up for the night. With the strength that only comes to men in a moment of supreme crisis, Hal pushed and dragged the boat into the water, and pulled with all his might fo the sand-bank, where the woman still stood, anxiously awaiting succor. He took her aboard and pulled again for the shore.

He had saved her life, but as he stepped from the boat the old man staggered and fell. The woman he had saved was alarmed, and called aloud for help; and when none came ran to a cottage at a distance, where she saw a light. Hal was lifted and carried within, and friendly hands tended him. But his work was done; the desperate exertion of that hour had told too heavily on his aged frame. His work was done. He died murmuring "The beautiful gate—waiting—and watching."

At the head of the grave stands a beautiful marble headstone, erected at the cost of the grateful lady whose life he saved at the cost of his own. On it are carved a record of his name and age, and underneath the words, "He saved others, himself he could not save." Thinking as I gazed on those words of their original application, I thanked God, as thousands upon thousands have done, that He who gave His life on the cross a ransom for others did not shrink from His pain and sorrow, but, having given Himself for them was faithful unto death. "He saved others, Himself He could not save."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Shock.

ROSE'S voice died away in sobs, and her tears came in torrents now, while John Morley, distressed and bewildered, could only soothe her, as he would have soothed a child, till the first hysterical paroxysm had passed over, and he could place her in the old easy-chair. She was very quiet and subdued during the rest of the day, and remained in the gloomy room with her husband, smiling faintly whenever she caught his anxious eye; but at other times regarding his grave face, and his hair streaked with gray, with an expression of mingled pity and dread.

It was only in the evening, when Hester's bedtime came, that she quitted her husband's presence to go up-stairs to Hester's room; not to help her to undress, for the child had been long accustomed to do everything for herself, but to sit watching her, and waiting to kiss her when she was in bed. When Hester knelt down to pray, Rose bowed her head, and clasped her hands, as if joining in the child's inaudible petitions; a sign of grace which would have caused the heart of her husband to throb for joy. She laid her head down upon Hester's pillow with her lips close to her ear, after having put out the light, and spoke to her in the darkness.

"Little Hetty," she said, "would you rather live with good people, or with people you love dearly, dearly?"

Hester answered deliberately, after pausing to consider the question:

"I don't think I should love any but good people," she said.

"But you love me," pursued Rose, "and I'm not good. Would you rather have me as I am, or a very good mamma, as good as Miss Waldron?"

"Oh, but you are good," persisted Hester; "and I'd rather live with you ten times better than Miss Waldron, however good she is. But if you're not quite, quite good yet, you've only to ask God."

"I have asked Him," sobbed Rose, "and I'm more wicked than ever. Oh, Hetty! if you had promised to live with somebody you didn't love, and there came afterward some one you did love with all your heart, and wanted you to live with them, what would you do, little Hetty?"

Rose's cheek was crimson in the darkness, and her eye was burning, while Hester was silent again for a few minutes, coming to a careful judgment upon the case put before her.

"I should be very, very sorry," she answered at last; "but if I'd promised, I would keep my promise."

John Morley's second wife said no more to her little stepdaughter; but she gave her a kiss as tender as her own mother could have given. Only had there been a light in the room, Hester would have seen a face wan as death, and blue eyes filled with terror, bending over her; and she would not have fallen asleep so peacefully as she did, with pleasant dreams of her new mother!

A few days after this singular conduct on the part of Rose Morley, she received a letter, informing her that a distant relative, residing a long way from Little Aston, was upon the point of death, and wished to see her once more. John Morley opposed no obstacle to the fulfilment of this desire, and gave his wife every assistance in his power.

Her arrangements for her absence were very peculiar. She gathered together every small possession of her own, every little trace of her dwelling there, scattered up and down the habitation, and locked them up in the drawing-room, which, as we know, had been renovated and furnished expressly for her own use. In this way there was no vestige left of her late presence in the home, except an ominous and most mournful void.

When John Morley entered his chamber for the first time after her departure, he started, with a vague and sudden fright, at its emptiness; and his eyes sought in vain for some token of his young wife. There was the same sense of dreary chilliness as when all the mementoes of Hester's mother had been cleared away from the place which was to know her no more. Throughout the whole house it was the same; there was no hint left that Rose had ever been one of its inmates; except that an ever-growing gloom of absence and abandonment seemed to hang over every apartment.

In his undefined uneasiness he thought of comforting himself with a glance at the gay, bright room, which was all hers; but the door did not yield to his touch. It was locked and the key taken away. The servant, who had some secret suspicions of her own, stole to the door, after her master had left it, and put her eye to the key-hole. There was no ray of light in the room, though it was full day; it followed therefore, as a natural inference, that Mrs. John Morley had closed the shutters, and drawn the thick curtain, before she carried away the key, to insure no intrusion into her room during her absence.

She had set out early in the morning; and the day, long and dull, dragged heavily past, both for John Morley and Hester. From time to time her husband traced her journey, saying: "Now she is at such a place;" "At this hour she is waiting at such a station." As evening drew on he sat down to write his first letter to her; a tender yet stately letter, with none of the unmeaning expressions which a man of another stamp might have used. It was an epistle fit for publication, choice and elegant in its phrases; but it was no other than the transcript of his own orderly and elevated mind.

Being also a religious man, writing to his wife, who would read the letter at the death-bed of a fellow-mortal, he added some thoughts, solemn, earnest, and devout, which surely could not fail to touch the heart of hearts, even of a giddy and careless girl. And his Rose was not that, he said to himself, with a quick and rare moisture of the eyes, as he recalled her kneeling at his side only a few days ago, with her humble confession of unworthiness; and from the very depths of his soul there went up a fresh cry to God, one of thousands, that He would turn the heart of his wife toward Himself.

He directed the cover of his letter with a sort of pride in the characters which ran from his pen, "Mrs. John Morley." She bore his name, and belonged to him. The old glow came back as when in former days he had written the same name, though to another person. His wife! Wherever she went, or whoever admired her, she was still Mrs. John Morley. Good man as he was, he felt as much pride in her attractions as a more worldly husband would have done. It was not at all less sweet to him to think of her gaining homage and favor by her beauty and winsome ways. While he was writing to her the house did not seem quite so empty; there was as it were an affirmation that she had been there, and would be there again in a few days. There was a fine pleasure in having to indite one of his letters to her; and above all in addressing it to Mrs. John Morley. The man had a whole world of unconscious egotism in him.

He was called away abruptly from this agreeable duty by the intrusion of some country-folk, who had come to ask his counsel concerning some question which perplexed them. It was no unusual occurrence with him. Next to the rector, who also was a bookish man, and often condescended to enter his shop, though there was a church bookseller living in the Square, John Morley was reckoned the wisest man to be met with for ten miles round the town, whether in questions of law, physic, or religion. He was, moreover, more courteous than a doctor, less crafty than a lawyer, and more liberal than a priest. Whatever might be the vexed topic of the day it was necessary to discuss it with the well-read bookseller, and to see what new light he could throw upon it. It was a homage palatable to John Morley, even when paid to him by gaping rustics. But to-day, even while he listened, and advised, and adjudged, there was a calm sweet under-current of thought, following his young wife in the progress of her day's journey.

When the hour came for closing the shop, it brought also the time appointed for attending a week-night service at his chapel. He posted his letter on the way, with a silent blessing in his heart upon her who should open it. An unusual fervor was kindled in his spirit. He saw, close at hand, the answer to his many prayers. Rose would come back to him, from the solemn death-bed she was gone to witness, changed just as he would wish her to be changed, not in sweetness of temper, nor even in buoyancy of spirits, but weaned from the world, and purged from earthly tastes and longings. He almost regarded this death as being expressly ordained for the conversion of his wife. Wrapped up in the vivid realization of the scene now being enacted before her eyes, the words of the old preacher fell unheeded upon his ears, and when the hour's service was ended he awoke from his reverie with a start of surprise.

Mr. Waldron joined him on his way home, and having some subject of church discipline to discuss, in which they were both interested, he entered the house with him. A tacit and cool intimacy, rather closer than a mere acquaintanceship, had sprung up between them of late, which both would probably have been slow to admit.

John Morley on the one hand, a scholarly, studious man, whose whole life had been given to dipping into varied studies; and David Waldron, on the other, a hard-headed, parliamentary debater, caring little for general literature, but living his public life for the sole purpose of protecting and advancing the interests of his denomination. Sometimes the latter picked up thoughts and arguments from John Morley, which told well in his own brief but weighty utterances in the House of Commons. So Mr. Waldron sat down familiarly upon the bookseller's hearth, and foot to foot and elbow to elbow discussed with him the questions which interested him most.

The two men were so utterly absorbed in their conversation that neither of them heard a gentle rap, which was repeated two or three times, before the door was pushed open, and Hester appeared on the threshold. The little girl had been undressed, but she had put on her frock over her nightgown, and slipped her bare feet into her shoes. She stood still in the doorway of her father's room, holding a letter in her hand. It was a more extraordinary apparition in the eyes of John Morley than of Mr. Waldron.

"What is the matter, Hester?" asked her father hurriedly.

"Come in, Hetty," said Mr. Waldron; "come here, and speak to me. Why, I've had a little girl of my own, so you need not be frightened at me."

Hester advanced into the room, and shook hands with the great man; and then she went on to her father's side with the letter she was carrying.

"Father," she said, "I was just getting into bed when I found this letter on the pillow, and a slip of paper with it to tell me to give it to nobody but you. So I thought I'd better bring it down-stairs to you at once."

It was directed to him in his wife's handwriting, but for an instant his mind was full of the argument with which he had been about to reply to Mr. Waldron. The child lingered at his side, with her eyes fastened upon the letter, waiting for him to open it; but not until he had finished his reasoning, and brought it to a triumphant climax, did he rise from his chair and take the letter to the lamp to read it.

"Hester," said Mr. Waldron, by way of improving the occasion, and speaking a word in season, "do you ever forget to say your prayers before you go to bed?"

"No," answered Hester, with a look of surprise, "never. Do you, Mr. Waldron?"

It is possible that he did. At any rate he did not reply with the same promptitude that Hester had done, and he answered only by another question.

"What have you prayed for to-night?" he asked.

"I asked God to-night," answered Hester, "to be good to all very wicked people, and change their hearts—robbers, you know, and everybody who is very wicked. I used to wish that God would make Satan good. But I know better now."

The color mantled the child's earnest face, as she gazed pensively, and somewhat mournfully, into the fire. She had pushed back her hair behind her small white ears, and stood motionless, with her arms drooping, and her head bent in an attitude of dejection and melancholy, which touched even Mr. Waldron's blunt nature. He was searching for something to say which should chase the gloom from her childish face; when all at once, without sound or sign beforehand, John Morley fell heavily to the ground.

It was as if some mighty invisible hand had struck him down with a blow. He had fallen backward, and lay apparently lifeless upon the floor, grasping tightly in his fingers the letter which he had been reading. His face, always pale, had lost all that looked like life, and from under his half-closed eyelids the glazed eyes showed themselves without lustre or consciousness. In an instant Hester was on her knees beside him—neither helpless nor frightened, as other children might have been, but with the sad self-possession of a woman. She raised her father's head, and placed under it her little arm, looking up pitifully into Mr. Waldron's face.

"The servant!" cried Mr. Waldron, running to the door; "we must send for the doctor, Hester."

"There is nobody in the house but me," she answered, "unless Lawson is up-stairs in the top room. Martha is gone out this evening."

"What can I do?" he exclaimed, running back again, and stooping over the lifeless man; "I cannot leave you alone. Is it a fit of any kind, Hester?"

"I don't know," she said, "but please put your arm here, while I look if Lawson is up-tairs." He did as she bade him, and she darted swiftly out of the room. Mr. Waldron's eyes strayed from the pallid face resting upon his arm to the half-unfolded letter still griped firmly in John Morley's stiffened hand. He had neither wish nor intention to read it; but three or four words caught his eye unawares, which sent the blood out of his shrewd, hard face, and set his calm, honest heart beating heavily, like the blows of a sledge hammer. He drew toward him a cushion and hassock, and rested John Morley's insensible head against them; while with some difficulty he loosened the closed fingers and released the letter. In his turn he carried it to the lamp, and held it with a shaking hand to the light.

PAUL'S THIRD MISSIONARY JOURNEY.

S. S. Lesson for April 6, Acts 18 : 23–28; 19 : 1–7. Golden Text, Prov. 27 : 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Learners to Become Leaders—A Mistake about Organization—Must Never Supplant the Spirit—The Two Guardians of the Infant Church—Entrance of Apollos—His Scriptural Knowledge—God Uses Imperfect Instruments—Help Better than Reproof—Apollos at Work in Achaia—Typical Disciples—Paul's Fuller Teaching—Why the Church Lacks Power.

Paul left at Ephesus his two fellow-laborers, Aquila and Priscilla. It was the mind of the Spirit in those early times, and without doubt it is the mind of the Spirit still, that those who leave learned much of the Holy Ghost, either by His direct teaching or by His power and testimony in other Christians, should in their turn become leaders of others.

WHERE WE MISTAKE

is in putting organization in the place of the direction of the Holy Spirit. Organization is better than selfish indifference to the eternal interests of precious souls redeemed by the blood of Christ; but, after all, it is man doing the best he can, and can never be a substitute for the direct guidance of our God; for His pillar of cloud by day, and of fire by night. God made Paul a missionary; God sent him to the house of Aquila and Priscilla; God made them like-minded with him, and made them give up business-prospects, home life, and all earthly advantages that they might have the glorious privilege of living to win heathen Jews and heathen Gentiles to the Lord.

While these two souls were fathering and mothering the tiny church at Ephesus, a new teacher appeared in the synagogue. He was an Alexandrian Jew, bearing the Greek name Apollos. He was eloquent and "mighty in the Scriptures," and this latter qualification seems to have been somewhat uncommon in our Lord's time. He said, indeed, "Ye search the Scriptures" (John 5 : 39, R. V.); but He rebuked the Pharisees, saying, "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, neither the power of God" (Matt. 22 : 29). And again we read of the disciples themselves, "As yet they knew not the Scripture, that He must rise again from the dead" (John 20 : 9). Apollos was not only a deep Bible student, but also "fervent in the Spirit." What he did know of God had taken entire possession of him; out of the abundance of his heart the mouth spoke; and though he knew only the baptism of John, he took good care that all with whom he came in contact should profit by his knowledge; he taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John. "Repentance toward God;" this was the sum total of his preaching, but God owned it, for it was real as far as it went. Blessed be God, He does not wait until His instruments are perfect. A little girl, who died when she was five years old, was so full of the love of Jesus that she used to ask every one who came to the house,

"DO YOU LOVE JESUS?"

It was a little ministry, but God used it in the conversion of several, an infidel among the number.

Some say, "Never preach repentance that is not the Gospel;" some say, "Never preach without laying a sound foundation of repentance." Which is the truth? Micaiah has it, "As the Lord liveth, unto me, that will I speak" (1 Kings 22 : 14). If the Lord sends us with a message of repentance, as He sent John the Baptist, nothing else which we say will answer in its stead. If He sends us to tell of the depth of His grace, that, and that only, is the message which He will honor. It took many Levites to carry the ark of the testimony; it takes many of God's children to bear now before the world "the ark of the covenant of the Lord," the blessed fulness of His truth.

WHAT THE LORD SAITH

When Aquila and Priscilla heard this ardent young preacher they did not begin to blame him for what he did not know, but "they took him unto them, and expounded unto him the way of God more perfectly." Thank God, he was willing to be taught; the right spirit was there, and every bit of truth which God gave him became a power, because it was quickened by the Holy Ghost. What numbers of believers there are who know all the doctrines about salvation, sanctification, healing, and yet they make no real step forward! Why is this? They want the Holy Ghost; they have never so given themselves up to be possessed by the Holy Ghost as to be filled with Him, to be led by Him, to walk in Him. The missionary spirit which had led the good couple from Corinth to Ephesus now possessed Apollos to pass into Achaia, and getting letters of recommendation from the brethren, apparently unsolicited, he, on his arrival, "helped them much which had believed through grace; for he mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures that Jesus was Christ." In many instances we may believe those who were angered by Paul's testimony, because they were stirred out of their spiritual death-sleep and made wretchedly uncomfortable, were ready to receive the same truth when God sent it by Apollos. So it is always; God will send one worker to break up the ground, and the first storm of opposition and persecution breaks out against him. Little seems to be done, but God has, by his means, prepared the way for others. Let us be willing to be ploughs, harrows, sowers, or reapers, so that our loving Lord only works out His purpose by us. We work for His gain, not ours; His glory, not our own.

"While Apollos was at Corinth, Paul having passed through the upper coasts [of Asia Minor] came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples (probably disciples of Apollos, before he learned the fulness of Christ's redemption), he said unto them, Have ye since ye believed (or believing)? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." This is practically the condition of most believers. They have passed through a certain conversion, have abandoned some sins, and have a sense of pardon, but there has never been a sense of complete powerlessness and an abandonment of themselves to the Holy Ghost to be His temple, His instrument, altogether at His disposal. Such children of God always manage their own prayers, fight their own battles with the enemy, bear their own burdens, carry their own responsibility; and God comes in only as a Helper when they find themselves failing. Such are the children of God who do not believe it is possible to be kept from sinning; such think that God helps those who help themselves, but the self-help is No. 1, and the help of God comes No. 2. In reality, God has a second place with them, and thus it takes very little temptation to effect a conquest and to make them fall. And they, measuring God by their own experience, imagine that He has purposed this perpetual failure in order to keep them humble. Alas! alas! it is because they have not definitely received the Holy Ghost to take entire possession of them. True, some receive the Holy Ghost in His fulness at the time of their conversion, but they are not many; some receive Him later, more or less consciously; but wherever there is a definite abdication of self-rule, self-care, self-help, and a definite reception of the Holy Ghost He comes in and takes possession. His rule, His power, His strength, takes the place of theirs, and the result is necessarily constant victory; the only failure results from any return to the old state of things—self-rule, self-care, self-help.

Paul asked of these Ephesian converts, "Unto what then were ye baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism." Then Paul explained that the baptism of repentance was not to be rested in. John led men to a present break with sin and a looking forward to salvation in the future. But now "the grace of God which bringeth to all men" (Tit. 2 : 11), and, thank God, full salvation is a glorious present reality. When these converts heard that Jesus the Christ had come, had suffered, had taken away sins by the sacrifice of Himself, had risen again for their justification, had sent down the Holy Ghost to dwell in the hearts of His people, then "they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus. And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Ghost came on them; and they spake with tongues and prophesied." When a man is full of the Holy Ghost he does not need to think whether he can speak or whether he cannot, for he speaks as the Spirit gives him utterance, he has become the dwelling-place, the private property of the Holy Ghost, but he is a living, conscious, willing, consenting temple and instrument, not a mere machine, giving place to the Holy Ghost by a constant recognition of His presence in him.

WHY POWER IS LACKING.

There is no doubt that the want of grace and the want of power in the Church of Christ is caused by a lack of definitely receiving the Holy Ghost as an indwelling Divine Person. Some think we ought to be satisfied with the fruits of the Spirit, and not to seek after the gifts of the Spirit, but we see no warrant in the Word of God to divide the gifts from the fruits, the power from the graces. The same apostle who teaches us that "the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance" (Gal. 5 : 22), tells us to "covet earnestly the best gifts" and to "desire spiritual gifts" (1 Cor. 12 : 31; 14 : 1). And these he has thus enumerated: "To one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing (Gr.) by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues; but all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as He will" (1 Cor. 12 : 8–11). Where the graces of the Spirit are most manifest, there the powers of the Spirit are most manifest also. Paul's power in healing and speaking with tongues did not hinder him from being the exponent of love (1 Cor. 13), and one of the most precious exemplifications of it. And it is strikingly so in those Christians who are most filled with the Spirit; power and grace, gifts and fruits appear together.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Absence of Reliable Intelligence from Khartoum produces uneasiness respecting General Gordon's safety. Since the telegraph wires were cut, only vague and contradictory rumors have been received. He is hemmed in by the Arabs, whose hostility proves that his mission is in many respects a failure. The latest news of his position received last week was contained in a despatch sent by the correspondent of the London Times to that journal. It is dated March 14th, and states that six thousand of the enemy were encamped opposite the palace in Khartoum where General Gordon resides, and they fire on people leaving the city. General Gordon intended attacking them on the 16th. He was expecting that a British force was on its way to relieve him. No force for the purpose had, however, been despatched at the close of last week. The disquiet respecting him is increased by the fact that if he had been successful in his attack on the Arabs on March 16th he would, in all probability, have sent a despatch to Berber, which lies between Khartoum and Suakim, whence it would have been telegraphed to England.

Canon Wilberforce has Made Public a Communication he received from General Gordon before his departure to the Soudan, which in the present circumstances is of deep interest. Just before General Gordon started he sent to a prayer-meeting over which the Canon was presiding, asking for the prayers of those assembled. He said in his letter: "I would rather have the prayers of that little company gathered in your house to-day than I would have the wealth of the Soudan placed at my disposal. Pray for me that I may have humility and the guidance of God, and that all spirit of murmuring may be rebuked in me."

A New Cause for Disquietude Threatening disturbance for England in her Indian provinces has appeared. Gemal-ed-Din, an Afghan chief, is editing an anti-English paper printed in Paris, to be circulated in Moslem countries. He claims to be descended from the Prophet Mohammed. He professes undying enmity to England. After the Sepoy revolt of 1857, in which helpless women and children were butchered by the cowardly troops and in which Gemal-ed-Din took part, he went to Constantinople, but was expelled from there for claiming to be a descendant of Mohammed. He thereupon betook himself to Cairo, where Cherif Pacha gave him a chair of philosophy at the university. He was subsequently arrested for sedition and sent to India. Bales of his paper are now at Constantinople ready for distribution throughout the East.

The English Premier is Suffering from Serious illness, the result of a neglected cold acting on a system lowered by late hours in the House of Commons, by anxiety and worry. It has developed a painful affection of the throat, involving a nearly total loss of voice. Mr. Smalley telegraphs that he continued transacting business by writing, till under his physician's advice he left London for a watering place on the southern coast. Since then he has relinquished nearly everything. The accounts published of his health indicate that there has been little or no improvement. Private reports admit that it will be impossible for him to be present in the House of Commons this week to take charge of the Reform Bill, and that a project for a journey to the south of France is seriously considered by the family. His colleagues are opposed to it, unless it is imperative, recollecting that his last absence nearly ended in his resignation.

The Indemnity France Demands of China is a sum equivalent to three hundred million dollars, and she threatens to occupy Chinese territory until it is paid. It is based on the plea that by aiding and encouraging Tonquin to resist the French forces, she made an expensive expedition necessary. It is stated that the Viceroy of China is submitting a basis of peace to the English and American Ministers at Pekin and asking them to mediate. General Millot, commander of the French land forces in Tonquin, has been instructed to advance as far as he considers advisable. The occupation of Langson, Kaobang and Laokai is thought to be necessary in order to provide for the security of Tonquin. Those towns are the three towns of Tonquin nearest to China, and with their possession the French conquest of Tonquin will be complete.

A New Programme is Issued by the Disaffected societies of Russia. It is published in a new journal called Free Speech. It summons the youth of Russia to oppose the despotic form of government, and says: "The Russian state machine is rapidly decaying. Discontent is increasing among all classes. Revolutionary ideas are spreading everywhere, even in the army. The day of victory is approaching." The paper strongly deprecates terrorism, and favors a union of all branches of socialists who, it says, should pursue the desired end by moral energy, not by brute force.

A Significant Menace was Uttered by Mr. Parnell last week in the House of Commons. He said the Irish people would be fools if they paid taxes to enforce the coercion act. The suggestion is ominous, because it points to the commencement of an agitation as serious as the refusal to pay rent did some time ago. Mr. Parnell's remark was made known throughout Ireland, and was received with hearty approval. The corporations of Limerick and Cork lead the way in opposing the tax. Limerick declines to submit to a mandamus directing the payment of the extra police quartered there by the former magistrate, Mr. Clifford Lloyd, and Cork refuses money to Captain Plunkett's re-enforcements.

An International League against Dynamiters is advocated by the German press. The National Gazette says: "The Powers are preparing to combat the anarchist plague with all their means and energies. The question of political asylum is to be put to trial, and no anarchist will be allowed to claim political immunity if he has attacked life or property." Germany has expressed its willingness to join the other Powers in measures providing for the extradition of anarchists.

The Pernicious Physical Effects of Gambling is the subject of an article in the British Medical Journal. Physicians trace to gambling dyspepsia, sleeplessness, nervousness, heart disease, and paralysis and apoplexy. Even the mild forms of gambling in which so many hard-worked men are accustomed to find what they call amusement after their day's toil do not afford real relaxation. They only maintain, under a thin disguise, the same kind of cerebral activity that has been demanded during long hours in the office or counting-house. "The time seems to have arrived," says the journal in conclusion, "when, from no puritanical prejudices, but with a firm scientific conviction of the mischief that accrues from it, betting should be put down, being attacked first in its fashionable strongholds—on the turf and the card-table—and ultimately, if need be, in its humbler resorts."

The Arrival in Australia of Mr. R. T. Booth, the American temperance orator, whose mission in England has been so marvellously successful, was the occasion of a perfect ovation. It was intended that a friendly demonstration should be made as soon as the Orient reached the port of Adelaide, but as the ship came in unexpectedly during the night, this interesting portion of the programme was omitted. Some of the leading temperance townsmen, however, gave a hearty reception to Mr. Booth and his companion, Mr. T. W. Glover. The former was so favorably impressed that he promised to include Adelaide, contrary to previous intention, within the field of his mission. The people of Adelaide, in their turn, were equally pleased with the graceful compliment to their city when Mr. Booth spoke of it as having delighted him, and as "One of the prettiest, cleanest, and best laid-out cities he had ever seen." Replying to the inquiries of reporters, Mr. Booth stated that his health had been wonderfully recruited by the voyage, which he had enjoyed amazingly. He could not stay in Australia more than a year. A few days later, in the Town Hall, Melbourne, an enthusiastic reception was accorded to the Blue Ribbon leader and Mr. Glover by an assembly of three thousand persons. A short visit to Tasmania for rest was to precede the opening of the contemplated mission in Melbourne.

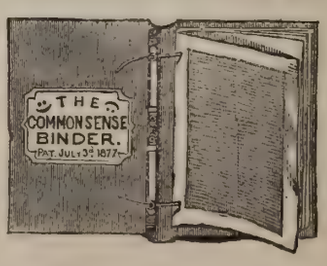
Mr. George Muller, the Venerable Founder of the Orphan Homes at Ashley Down, Bristol, who, with his wife, is evangelizing in the East, was expected to reach Calcutta on January 11th, and to address various gatherings of Christians during his stay in the city.

Vol. VI. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1883, with complete index. Price $3, including postage: ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for March may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price six cents, including postage. This number contains the following articles: "The World and its Prince," by Dr. Henry Meymott; "Thoughts on Revelation," by Mrs. Fielder, Abergavenny; "That Blessed Hope," by H. M. Barnett, B.A.; "The Rapture of Saints;" "The Soudan and Holy Scripture," by Rev. T. J. Malyon, LL.B.; "The Prophetic Outlook in Connection with the Recent Successes of the Mahdi;" "The Second Advent and its Glorious Epiphany," by Rev. W. Frith; Passing Events viewed from a prophetic standpoint, etc., etc.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.



NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

In sketching the remarkable career of one whom God has signally honored during a comparatively short period, by making him the instrument of many conversions, we desire to lay special emphasis on a point which will make itself evident in the course of the narrative. There are hundreds, nay thousands, of men, and we happen to know that some of them are readers of The Christian Herald, who have fallen under the power of the rum-curse. They long with an inexpressible longing for deliverance. They loathe and despise their weakness, but good resolutions, signing the pledge, and other means of reformation have been tried in vain. They are helpless in the hands of their craving as puppets in the hands of a man. We have frequently pointed out the only sure way of emancipation. Only by full trust and dependence upon Christ's power is there hope. We now present an illustration of what that power can effect. Mr. Oakes is a living proof of the efficacy of Christ's salvation and of His readiness to save all those who put their trust in Him.

Edward William Oakes was born in Westmeath, Ireland, on June 20th, 1853. His father occupied an honored and responsible position in the county, as he held the offices of clerk of the district courts, the agency of a large estate, and the secretaryship of Lady Belvidere's Orphan Institution, which is a useful philanthropic agency of some note in Ireland. Mr. Oakes destined his son William to the profession of a land surveyor, knowing that with his opportunities it might be made highly remunerative. Mrs. Oakes, however, cherished other views for her son. Her piety was of a singularly deep and earnest character, and her disposition was most serene and lovable. By teaching, by example, and by prayer she tried to lead her boy to Christ, and her most intense desire was that he might know the truth for himself and afterward preach it to others.

The boy obtained the rudiments of education in his native place, but it became necessary to give him more advanced and special training. Just at this time, he being then about fourteen, a property fell by inheritance into the possession of the Oakes family. Like many of the events the world calls blessings, this inheritance led to bitter sorrow. Upon the property was a grog-shop, where a brisk trade was done. Mrs. Oakes besought her husband to rid himself of that place. On her knees and with many tears she warned him that God's blessing would never rest upon the traffic, and entreated him not to mix himself up in it. Mr. Oakes considered the matter from a worldly standpoint, and, so viewed, the advantages of retaining the grog-shop were undeniable. It was profitable; his elder son could manage it; it was near Culverstown Endowed School, an educational institution of some repute in Ireland, and William, his younger son, could board with his brother and enjoy the advantages of the school, and be under his brother's supervision at the same time. These were clear advantages connected with the project, but they were as nothing in the eyes of the Christian wife and mother, compared with the responsibility of running a dram-shop, and the risk involved to her sons. But the worldly view prevailed, and the arrangement indicated was made.

William removed to his brother's new residence, and commenced his attendance at the school. He had a room in the house allotted to him, and was strictly forbidden to enter the dram-shop. One day, however, as he sat at his studies his ear caught the sound of music. That sound always stirred his soul. The boy had a passion for it, and Satan used that love to lead him into temptation. The music was in the dram-shop, and William, watching his brother safely off the premises on some temporary business, closed his books and descended to the place, where a group of country youths were dancing to the accompaniment of an itinerant violinist. That was the first of many stolen visits to the forbidden spot. He was a fair performer on the flute, and that accomplishment always secured him a welcome from the customers. Many an evening when his relatives thought he was in bed, he was playing the flute in the saloon and drinking his glass with the others. These performances at length came to the ears of his brother, who immediately wrote home advising that William should be sent for. That step was promptly taken, and the boy left the scene of his precocious dissipation. For some time he remained at home, and, under his loving mother's entreaties and his father's expostulations, he promised amendment.

The educational difficulty, however, remained to be solved. In order to fit him for his profession William was again sent away from home—this time to an educational institution near Dublin, famous for its advantages to aspirants to the profession he had chosen. There he studied hard, but he neglected no opportunity for indulgence in dissipation. He succeeded, however, in passing his examination, and obtaining his diploma. It was intended that he should enter into partnership with his father; but before going home he went to Dublin to purchase a set of instruments. An excursion without a carouse would have seemed to him a wasted opportunity, and accordingly when the time for returning to college arrived young Oakes was in the exhilarated stage of intoxication. On the way, occurred one of his many narrow

ESCAPES FROM DEATH.

He lighted a cigar as he started, and flung the match behind him. It fell among the straw with which in Ireland the vehicles are carpeted, and in a short time the vehicle was in flames, the affrighted horse was rushing madly along in frenzied terror, and Oakes was lying prostrate and stunned in the road. Providentially no bones were broken, and he managed to get safely back to college.

The partnership arrangement failed. The young man's ideas of business and of his own importance did not suit his father, and eventually it was found better for both parties that William should leave home. He obtained an excellent position as superintendent of a large factory in the neighborhood, and there his abilities secured him the respect and confidence of the proprietors. But after business hours his time was spent in scenes of gayety, and on one occasion, having spent the previous night at a ball, his employer found him asleep in sheer weariness at his post. Oakes was thereupon advised to seek a position of less responsibility. Taking the hint he sought and obtained another situation. Before entering, however, on his new duties, he received from God of the peril of the life he was leading. He determined to pay a visit to his home, and his father sent a vehicle to convey him over the eight-mile journey. On the way he met some friends with whom he stayed to drink. Time slipped away, and it was late before he resumed his journey. In his excited state he put the spirited young horse to the top of his speed, to make up for the delay. Some object seen in the moonlight frightened the animal, and he shied; the vehicle was overturned, and Oakes was thrown violently to the ground. A crowd gathered around, but no one carried him into their house. He was known to be a Protestant, and was believed to be dying. Under those circumstances the Roman Catholic villagers had not the courage to offer him shelter, for, according to their superstitious belief, the ghost of a Protestant always haunts the place in which he died. The news, however, was carried to his parents, who made all haste to the scene of the disaster, providentially arriving just in time to prevent their son's head being crushed by a reckless passer-by. He was taken home, and his mother tenderly nursed him back to life, and tried by all means she could think of, to lead him to repentance and reformation.

His new situation and two others which succeeded it, led to no satisfactory results. Young Oakes was known everywhere as a young man of good abilities and sterling integrity, but unreliable because of his dissipated habits. Now his longing to burst the bonds in which Satan held him filled his heart, and it was with horror that he found himself powerless to reform. In his dismay he went home, knowing that his mother's influence was the most potent force his heart acknowledged. His arrival there was opportune. His father was on a bed of sickness, which, after a few weeks, terminated fatally.

A PATHETIC SCENE

was witnessed shortly before he passed away from earth. The sick man was told that he must die. Then he sent for his son. As the young man entered the room his father stretched out his hand, and said, "My son, I have something I must say to you before I die. There is a sorrow in my heart as I lie here. I have tried to be a good husband and a good father, but I allowed myself to use and allowed my family to use strong drink. If I could wipe the consciousness of that out of my heart I could die happily." Then with a dying man's earnestness he besought his wayward son to give him a solemn promise that he would never again touch intoxicating liquor as long as he lived. But the son knew his own weakness too well to make such a promise. He promised, however, that he would try to abstain. That promise was kept so long as his father lived, but the struggle was fierce and bitter.

Mr. Oakes was only a few weeks over his twenty-first year when his father died. But his position was one worldly men might envy. He succeeded to all his father's offices. Those that were in the gift of private persons he obtained largely through their respect for his father, and the appointment under government, for which he applied, was given him on his passing creditably an examination. He was, therefore, at the age of twenty-one already a prosperous man and a man of some importance in the county. But bright as the prospect was, none knew better than the young man himself that it was precarious. Unaided by the power of the Saviour how could he fight the battle with the love of liquor which devoured him?

For a time, regard for his widowed mother, and care for his own reputation held him in check. Eighteen months passed by, and during that time he had not fallen. At the end of that time, having occasion to visit Dublin, and being away from restraining influences, he indulged in a wild debauch. Before he had quite recovered, and while he was utterly reckless, a recruiting sergeant saw him. Struck by his soldierly bearing and his stalwart figure the sergeant pressed his acquaintance upon him, and at last induced him to enlist. He took and was despatched to the headquarters in London. It would be difficult to imagine a more miserable young man than Mr. Oakes was that morning, when slowly "sobering up" he realized what he had done. He was alone in the compartment of an English railway carriage, and he sat and wept as he thought of his mother. After a time the thought of God entered his mind, and he knelt down and prayed. He besought Him to rescue him from the consequences of his rash act, and vowed that if he was delivered he would abandon his evil courses.

Arrived in London he presented himself before the colonel of the regiment, who questioned him bout his home and his reasons for enlisting. he officer was a man of sense and feeling, and aving heard his account of the circumstances e was moved to pity. In his rough commisera- ion he said, "God pity the mother who reared ou," and handing him a railroad pass to Ireland e sent him away with the advice to amend. od had heard that prayer in the railroad car- age, and Mr. Oakes thankfully stood in the reets of London a free man. He returned ome and resumed his duties, keeping his es- pade a secret from every one. Six months nger he struggled on, battling day by day with s enemy. At last his life became intolerable, nd he determined to begin it anew among new enes in the New World. Quietly but quickly e balanced all his accounts, put everything in der, and, saying farewell to no one, he

SAILED FOR AMERICA.

On the voyage he had leisure to think, and his houghts were stimulated by one of the worst orms in the memory of the sailors. Even they egan to lose hope during the three days that llowed of hurricane, rain, thunder and light- ng. The fourth day was Sunday, and morn- g was ushered in by sunlight and calm. The hange was marvellous, and the agitated passen- er, who had felt during the tempest that God's engeance was pursuing him, ascended from his abin with a relieved heart.

He landed in Boston, Mass., April 6th, 1876, nd at once sought employment. Unhappily he only situation offered him was the manage- ent of a liquor saloon at Charleston, on the utskirts of Boston. It was the worst employ- ent he could have had. There he fell again nder the power of his besetting sin, and soon alized that there was no hope for him in such urroundings. He therefore left Boston for New ork. There he was more fortunate. A well- nown grocery firm gave him employment.

One night he was sauntering along when he und himself in the midst of a crowd. He had o object in his walk, so he listlessly followed in he current, and was soon within a large building acked to the doors. What was this? he asked imself. He soon learned. He was in the Hip- odrome, and Moody and Sankey were holding meeting. The preliminary exercises, and Mr. loody's sermon passed over without producing ny marked impression on him. But a few mo- ents later he was startled. Mr. Sankey was nging, "Watching and Waiting." He knew hat some one was watching and waiting and raying for him. There and then he resolved to o home, and the very next day engaged a pas- age on an outgoing steamer.

Ten days later, at two o'clock in the morning, e stood outside his mother's door a returned rodigal, looking up at the light that burned in er chamber. He was received with joy and adness, and his mother's free forgiveness made im resolve that by no act of his should she ver be wounded again. With a clearer per- eption than his own, the mother sought to lead im to the Source of real strength, but without vail. Even his repeated failures had not con- inced him that in himself there was no power.

His former places being filled up he com- enced a search for employment. It was a veary work. In Dublin, in Liverpool, and in London he tried and failed. Finally he drifted nto dissipation again, and once more he accepted "the Queen's shilling," and entered a regiment of the Life Guards. There for the first time he vas subject to strict control. He had lived a life of unrestrained impulse, and this new experience of dull, unvarying routine galled him. He re- isted and evaded duty whenever he could. He vas reprimanded, and finally for a breach of dis- cipline was placed in confinement. There he had leisure to think. His thoughts went to his mother and thence to his mother's God. At ast he prayed, owning his sin and his weakness, and vowing that if God would deliver him he would consecrate his life to His service. To his ntense surprise when he was released from confinement he received his discharge from the army. No reason was assigned for such a step; he was simply informed that Her Majesty had no further occasion for his services. Once more, as he thought, his prayer had been answered, and he went home solemnized and re- pentant.

One day during his sojourn under his mother's roof he thought he would consult his old minister about his spiritual condition. The minister knew him well and was well acquainted with his dissipated character. As Mr. Oakes entered his yard he was repulsed. "Go away," said the minister, "you are

That was a shock which seemed to thrill the young man to his inmost soul. For the first time he realized that there could be a stage in a man's spiritual condition beyond which hope died. As a sick man feels a shock as he hears a physician say, "I can do nothing for you," so this young man shuddered as his old pastor said, "You are out of my depth." He was agitated and alarmed, but in the midst of his tremor a voice within him, or above him, said, "You are not yet out of Christ's depth." He returned home, but could not rest. Early the next morning, before any of the family had risen, Mr. Oakes knocked at his mother's door, and told her he must go away again. A restless, unsatisfied power held him in his grasp, and was driving him whither he knew not. The poor distressed mother forbore to plead with him, but tenderly kissing him, she said, "God protect my loved boy, my poor boy."

He hurried away, crossed to Liverpool, and there took the first outgoing steamer, which happened to be bound for Quebec. Thence he travelled to Toronto, Buffalo, Syracuse, and finally was led in July, 1879, to New York City. There he again found employment; but before entering upon it he was loitering about, when he noticed a tent at the corner of Broadway and Forty-third Street, and thinking it was a circus he strolled in. There he saw a congregation of sober, quiet-looking people singing hymns. He sat down and listened. The music tranquillized him, and after the singing he listened to an earnest sermon by the Rev. George J. Mingins on the value of the soul. So earnest was the preacher and so profoundly did he appear to be impressed with the preciousness of a single soul that the despairing young man determined tell him his experience. "Perhaps," he said, "I am not yet out of this man's depth."

At the close of the meeting Oakes approached Dr. Mingins with the words, "Can Jesus save me?" "Yes, my son," said Dr. Mingins, "He can." "Do you think He will?" was the next anxious question. "Yes, He will," was the reply. Then came out the secret of his trouble. "Before I go two blocks from this," said the young man, "I shall want to drink." "No," said Dr. Mingins, "if you are saved you won't want to drink at all." Then calling a gentleman in the room, he said: "This is the man to talk to you." Dr. Mingins knew what he was doing, for he introduced to the rum-bound victim Mr. Charles A. Bunting, a man on whose head hundreds of reclaimed men have called down blessings from heaven. Mr. Bunting sat down by the anxious man and talked and prayed with him. "Do you want to be saved?" he asked. "Yes," said the hopeless man. "Well, if you want to be saved you can be and I know it," said Mr. Bunting. "I have tried everything," said the weary man, "and it's all of no use. I have a mother praying for me now." "You have not tried Christ, yet," said the faithful pleader. "I shall pray for you."

Mr. Oakes left the tent unsatisfied. He knew the power of the bonds which held him, and he could not believe readily that any power could emancipate him. But the truth had effected an entrance, for on going down-town to his usual haunts of dissipation, he found that they had lost their power to dull the voice of his conscience. The following day and the next, the impression made seemed to be deepened. He was restless and miserable. In sheer wretchedness and with much hesitation and inward conflict he made his way to Mr. Bunting's house. There in Mr. Bunting's study he spent an hour of earnest conversation and prayer. At its close he accepted a cordial invitation to stay a few days and rest and think. He soon discovered that the place in which he was was, not a private dwelling. He asked an attendant what it was, and learned that it was of which Mr. Bunting is manager. The conflict of the next few days was an agonizing one. Into the despairing man's soul no ray of hope or light seemed to penetrate. One day—it was August 17th, 1879, the birthday of his soul—almost in a moment he passed out of the darkness into the bright light of Gospel day. He was sitting on a seat in Central Park absorbed in thought, meditating on his many falls and failures and of the opportunity now open to him. In his excitement he exclaimed, "I will not leave this seat until I get light!" He sat there clinging to the seat, with his hands clenched and his teeth set in mental agony. He was in a paroxysm of spiritual anguish, so violent that it seemed as if his soul would be torn in pieces. In the fiercest moment of the conflict a scene rose upon his mental vision. It had none of the elements of an actual vision, but it was a scene recalled, evolved out of the conversation and prayers of the last few days. It was the sight of Calvary, of the Saviour dying in agony to purchase deliverance for the captives of sin and Satan. This poor captive dwelt on the scene with emotion. He seemed to see on the face of the dying God a look of tender compassion for him and even to hear a sigh of sympathy. Instantly he realized that it was for him that Christ died, as for others, and then the words, "It is finished," floated to his mental ear. "Glory to God!" he exclaimed aloud, "I am saved! I can trust Him; I will trust Him!" and rising to his feet he went his way rejoicing.

FIRSTFRUITS

That night he went to the tent and told his story. He was so full of it that silence seemed impossible. It seemed to him that if he held his peace the very stones of the street would cry out. He spoke out of a full heart, and that very night God gave him fruit, for several present impressed with the wonderful narrative cried out, "I too will trust Him." He asked for work, any work that would bring glory to God and help to men such as he had been. An opportunity occurred about this time of his going into business on his own account, but the proposal was not entertained. It seemed to him that the deliverance he had experienced called upon him for a complete consecration of his life. His friends, too, who had witnessed the effect of his first address, were desirous that he should, at least for a time, engage in Christian work. He therefore gladly accepted the invitation of Dr. Mingins to assist him in his evangelistic work. He spoke regularly in the Grand Union Hall, and God blessed his labors. The story of his sin and his deliverance affected many despairing souls, and the Holy Spirit used it for their conversion. He accompanied Dr. Mingins to the Union Tabernacle Church in Thirty-fourth Street, and assisted him in gathering a large congregation from the masses. While there, he organized the Workman's Christian Union, a band of working-men whom he led in Christian work, chiefly in preaching the Gospel on the streets, an effort much blessed of God.

While laboring with Dr. Mingins there, Mr. Oakes took another step on the road of permanent restoration. He became acquainted, in the course of his evangelistic work, with the family of Dr. William Burns in Forty-third Street, and was introduced to that gentleman's eldest daughter. She, Mr. Oakes found, was a lady whose earnest piety and profound commiseration for the sinful and the fallen, eminently fitted her to be the companion of a man whose life was consecrated to the work of Christ in the world. He was so happy as to win her love, and on October 13th, 1880, they were married. Mr. Oakes speaks with deep gratitude of the efficient help Mrs. Oakes has since rendered him in the inquiry-room and in other ways.

The signal manner in which God had blessed the labors of Mr. Oakes was to him and to his friends the best proof of his call to the work of

THE MINISTRY.

He therefore, while contining his evangelistic labors, took a partial course in the Union Theological Seminary that he might be better qualified for useful labor.

In October, 1881, Mr. Oakes appeared before a meeting of the directors and friends of the Christian Home, and told the story of his rescue through the divine blessing on that noble institution and its manager, Mr. Bunting. The late Mr. W. E. Dodge, who presided, was deeply affected, and showed much interest in the young man. The acquaintance so commenced was continued, and Mr. Dodge from that time until his death was a real and valuable friend to Mr. Oakes. Since his death Mrs. Dodge and all the family have been warm personal friends of Mr. Oakes, showing him much kindness and Christian love.

Through the kindness of Mr. Dodge and other friends Mr. Oakes had the happiness in April, 1882, of paying a VISIT TO HIS MOTHER.

It would be impossible to describe the joy of the good l ady in welcoming to her heart as from the grave the son for whom she had prayed and agonized through so many weary years. She had the satisfaction also of seeing the answer to the prayers she offered in his childhood, for she was one of a congregation which crowded the village meeting-house to listen to the preacher whom they remembered as a dissipated youth, and she watered his words with tears of joy. After a few weeks spent among home scenes, preaching in the First Presbyterian Church, Coleraine, Antrim County, and other places, Mr. Oakes bade his mother farewell and returned to America.

In October, 1882, Mr. Oakes commenced the work which has made him famous in New York City. At of the Young Men's Christian Association a series of meetings were held almost unprecedented for their success. Only those who have wandered down that noted thoroughfare at night can realize the characters which would be gathered in that room. It was with such men, some of them adepts in crime and steeped in vice, that the story Mr. Oakes had to tell would be most useful, and they listened to a man who could tell them by experience of the power of the Saviour to save to the uttermost.

After a year's work there, fruitful in blessing, Mr. Oakes decided to accept an invitation tendered to him to a sphere of labor in the West. The committee of the Bowery Branch recognized the leading of Providence in the loss of their successful worker, and testified the respect and gratitude they felt, by presenting him with a handsome testimonial and bidding him God-speed in his new sphere. The following day, November 4th, 1883, Mr. Oakes was publicly ordained in Calvary Baptist Church, and immediately set out for his Western work.

IN COLORADO.

As we have previously stated in our news columns, Mr. Oakes is now the pastor of the First Baptist Church in Pueblo, Col. The church is a new and commodious building and in the centre of a district affording large opportunities for Christian usefulness. He recently returned to New York to solicit aid for the completion of the edifice. Mr. Oakes had done too much work in this city to appeal in vain in such a case. The required assistance was cordially and promptly given, and he returned to Pueblo with the amount in his pocket. We and his many friends in this section most earnestly pray that God will continue to bless his labors in the West with even a more abundant blessing than in this city.

RULERS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, March 30, 1884.

"When the righteous are in authority the people rejoice; but when the wicked beareth rule, the people mourn."—Proverbs 29 : 2.

"Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child, and thy princes eat in the morning."—Eccl. 10 : 16.

The Virtue of Rulers the Gauge of the Nation—The Scroll of Public Wickedness—I. Incompetency for Office—Tariff Bunglers—II. Intemperance—Congressional Lemonade—Two Victims—Drunkenness in the Saddle and on the Bench—III. Bribery—The Way to Push a Bill Through—The too Powerful Millionaires—Trouble Ahead—The Bonus in the War—The Two Loathsome Political Carcases—Things to be Done—The Weak to Abstain from Office—Duty at the Ballot-box—Evangelize the People—Individual Responsibility.

Leopold, the son of Victoria, dead, is now being honored by eulogiums all over the world because of his unselfishness and his high moral character, and a contrast is being drawn which implies that other European princes are not of the same characteristics. Most certainly in our own land there are many in high position in state and nation of whom such sweet and honorable things might not be said, either in obituary or epitaphal commemoration. The scenes of riot and scandal in some of the legislatures of this country, and the grave charges made against men in high places at Washington make it appropriate that I speak to you about what ought to be the high moral character of those who are in authority that we may be more intelligent in our prayers and more intelligent in our suffrages.

The morals of a nation seldom rise higher than the virtue of the rulers. Henry VIII. makes impurity popular and national. William Wilberforce gives moral tone to a whole empire.

and epauletted makes crime respectable and brings it to canonization. Malarias arise from the swamp and float upward, but moral distempers descend from the mountain to the plain. The slums only disgust men with the bestiality of crime, but dissolute French court or corrupt congressional delegation puts a premium upon iniquity. Many of the sins of the world are only royal exiles. They had a throne once, but they have been turned out, and they come down now to be entertained by the humble and the insignificant.

There is not a land on earth which has so many moral men in authority as this land. There is not a session of legislature, or Congress, or cabinet but in it are thoroughly Christian men, men whose hands would consume a bribe, whose cheek has never been flushed with intoxication, whose tongue has never been smitten of blasphemy or stung of a lie; men whose speeches in behalf of the right and against the wrong remind us of the old Scotch Covenanters, and the defiant challenge of Martin Luther, and the red lightning of Micah and Habakkuk. These times are not half as bad as the times that are gone. I judge so from the fact that Aaron Burr, a man stuffed with iniquity until he could hold no more, the debaucher of the debauched, was a member of the Legislature, then Attorney-General, then a Senator of the United States, then Vice-President, and then at last coming within one vote of the highest position in this nation. I judge it from the fact that more than half a century ago the Governor of this State disbanded the Legislature of New York because it was too corrupt to sit in council.

There is a tendency in our time to extol the past to the disadvantage of the present, and I suppose that sixty years from now there may be persons who will represent some of us as angels, although now things are so unpromising. But the iniquity of the past is no excuse for the public wickedness of to-day, and so I unroll the scroll in the presence of this assemblage. Those who are in editorial chairs and in pulpits may not hold back the truth. King David must be made to feel the reproof of Nathan, and Felix must tremble before Paul, and we may not wa with muffled feet lest we wake up some big s ner. If we keep back the truth, what will do in the day when the Lord rises up in juc ment and we are tried not only for what we ha said, but for what we have declined to say?

I. In unrolling the scroll of public wicke ness, I first find

INCOMPETENCY FOR OFFICE.

If a man struggle for an official position f which he has no qualification, and win th position, he commits a crime against God a against society. It is no sin for me to be ign rant of medical science; but if ignorant of me cal science I set myself up among professior men and trifle with the lives of people, then t charlatanism becomes positive knavery. It no sin for me to be ignorant of machinery; b if knowing nothing about it I attempt to take steamer across to Southampton and throu darkness and storm I hold the lives of hundre of passengers, then all who are slain by th shipwreck may hold me accountable. But wh shall I say of those who attempt to doctor o institutions without qualification and who a tempt to engineer our political affairs across t rough and stormy sea, having no qualification

We had at one time in the Congress of t United States men who put one tariff upon li seed oil and another tariff upon flaxseed oil, n knowing they were the same thing. We ha had men in our legislatures who knew n whether to vote aye or no until they had se the wink of the leader. Polished civilians a quainted with all our institutions run over in stampede for office by men who have not t first qualification. And so there have be school commissioners sometimes nominated grog-shops and hurrahed for by the rabble, t men elected not able to read their own commi sions. And judges of courts who have giv sentence to criminals in such inaccuracy phraseology that the criminal at the bar h been more amused at the stupidity of the ben than alarmed at the prospect of his own punis ment. I arraign incompetency for office as o of the great crimes of this day in public places

II. I unroll still further the scroll of publ wickedness, and I come to

INTEMPERANCE.

There has been a great improvement in th direction. The senators who were more cel brated for their drunkenness than for the statesmanship are dead or compelled to stay home. You and I very well remember th there went from the State of New York at o time, and from the State of Deleware, a fro the State of Illinois, and from other States m who were notorious everywhere as inebriate That day is past. The grog-shop under t national Capitol to which our rulers used to to get inspiration before they spoke upon t great moral and financial and commercial i terests of the country, has been disbanded; b I am told even now under the national Capit there are places where our rulers can get son very strong lemonade. But there has been a va improvement. At one time I went to Washin ton, to the door of the House of Represent tives, and sent in my card to an old friend. had not seen him for many years, and the la time I saw him he was conspicuous for his i tegrity and uprightness; but that day when I came out to greet me he was staggering drunk

The temptation to intemperance in publ places is simply terrific. How often there ha been men in public places who have disgrace the nation. Of the men who were prominent political circles twenty-five or thirty years ag how few died respectable deaths. Those wh died of delirium tremens or kindred diseas were in the majority. The doctor fixed up t case very well, and in his report of it said it w gout, or it was rheumatism, or it was obstru tion of the liver, or it was exhaustion fro patriotic services; but God knew and we a knew it was whiskey! That which smote t villain in the dark alley smote down the gre orator and the great legislator. The one yo rapped in a rough cloth, and pushed into a ugh coffin, and carried out in a box wagon, and t him down into a pauper's grave without a ayer or a benediction. Around the other athered the pomp of the land; and lordly men alked with uncovered heads beside the hearse ssing with plumes on the way to a grave to be lorned with a white marble shaft, all four sides overed with eulogium. The one man was killed logwood rum at two cents a glass, the other a beverage three dollars a bottle. I write oth their epitaphs. I write the one epitaph ith my lead-pencil on the shingle over the auper's grave; I write the other epitaph with isel, cutting on the white marble of the sena- r: "Slain by strong drink."

You know as well as I that again and again ssipation has been no hinderance to office in is country. Did we not at one time have a ecretary of the United States carried home ead drunk? Did we not have a Vice-President vorn in so intoxicated the whole land hid its ead in shame? Have we not in other times id men in the Congress of the nation by day aking pleas in behalf of the interests of the ountry, and by night illustrating what Solomon id, "He goeth after her straightway as an ox the slaughter and as a fool to the correction f the stocks, until a dart strikes through his ver." Judges and jurors and attorneys some- mes trying important causes by day, and by ight carousing together in iniquity.

What was it that defeated the armies some mes in the last war? Drunkenness in the sad- le. What mean those graves on the heights of redericksburg? As you go to Richmond you e them. Drunkenness in the saddle. So gain and again in the courts we have had dem- nstration of the fact that impurity walks under he chandeliers of the mansion and drowses on amask upholstery. Iniquity permitted to run nchallenged if it only be affluent. Stand back nd let this libertine ride past in his five-thou- and-dollar equipage, but clutch by the neck hat poor sinner who transgresses on a small cale, and fetch him up to the police court, and ive him a ride in the city van. Down with mall villainy! Hurrah for grand iniquity!

If you have not noticed that intemperance is ne of the crimes in public place to-day, you ave not been to Albany, and you have not been to Harrisburg, and you have not been to Trenton, and you have not been to Washington. The whole land cries out against the iniquity. But the two political parties are silent lest they ose votes, and many of the newspapers are silent lest they lose subscribers, and many of the pulpits are silent because there are offenders in the pews. Meanwhile God's indignation gathers like the flashings around a threatening cloud just before the swoop of a tornado. The whole land cries out to be delivered. The nation sweats great drops of blood. It is crucified, not between two thieves, but between a thousand, while nations pass by wagging their heads, and saying: "Aha! aha!"

II. I unroll the scroll of public iniquity, and I come to —bribery by money, bribery by proffered office. Do not charge it upon American institutions. It is a sin we got from the other side the water. Francis Bacon, the thinker of his century, Francis Bacon, of whom it was said when men heard him speak they were only fearful that he would stop, Francis Bacon, with all his castles and all his emoluments, destroyed by bribery, fined $200,000, or what is equal to our $200,000, and hurled into London Tower, and his only excuse was he said all his predecessors had done the same thing. Lord Chancellor Macclesfield destroyed by bribery. Lord Chancellor Waterbury destroyed by bribery. Benedict Arnold selling the fort in the Highlands for $31,575. For this sin Georgy betrayed Hungary, and Ahithophel forsook David, and Judas kissed Christ. And it is abroad in our land.

You know in many of the legislatures of this country it has been impossible to get a bill through unless it had financial consideration. The question has been asked softly, sometimes very softly asked in regard to a bill, "Is there any money in it?" and the lobbies of the legislatures and the National Capitol have been crowded with railroad men and manufacturers and contractors, and the iniquity has become so great that sometimes reformers and philanthropists have been laughed out of Harrisburg and Albany and Trenton and Washington because they came empty-handed. "You vote for this bill and I'll vote for that bill." "You favor that monopoly of a moneyed institution and I'll favor the other monopoly for another institution." And here is a bill that it is going to be very hard to get through the Legislature, and you will call some friends together at a midnight banquet, and while they are intoxicated you will have them promise to vote your way.

Here are $5000 for prudent distribution in this direction and here are $1000 for prudent distribution in that direction. Now, we are within four votes of having enough. You give $5000 to that intelligent member from Westchester and you give $2000 to that stupid member from Ulster, and now we are within two votes of having it. Give $500 to this member who will be sick and stay at home and $300 to this member who will go to see his great-aunt languishing in her last sickness. Now the day has come for the passing of the bill. The Speaker's gavel strikes. "Senators, are you ready for the question? All in favor of voting away these thousands or millions of dollars will say 'aye.'" "Aye, aye, aye, aye!" "The ayes have it."

Some of the finest houses on Brooklyn Heights, and Brooklyn Hill, and on Beacon Street, and on Madison Square, and on Rittenhouse Square were built out of money paid for votes in legislatures. Five hundred small wheels in political machinery with cogs reaching into one great centre wheel, and that wheel has a tire of railroad iron and a crank to it on which Satan puts his hand and turns the centre wheel, and that turns the five hundred other wheels of political machinery. While in this country it is becoming harder and harder for the great mass of the people to get a living, there are too many men in this country who have their two millions and their ten millions and their twenty millions, and carry the legislators in one pocket and the Congress of the United States in the other. And there is

TROUBLE AHEAD.

Revolution. I pray God it may be peaceful revolution and at the ballot-box. The time must come in this country when men shall be sent into public position who cannot be purchased. I do not want the union of Church and State, but I declare that if the Church of God does not show itself in favor of the great mass of the people as well as in favor of the Lord, the time will come when the Church as an institution will be extinct, and Christ will go down again to the beach, and choose twelve plain, honest fishermen to come up into the apostleship of a new dispensation of righteousness manward and Godward.

You know that bribery is cursing this land. The evil started with its greatest power during the last war, when men said, "Now you give me this contract above every other applicant, and you shall have ten per cent of all I make by it. You pass these broken-down cavalry horses as good, and you shall have $5000 as a bonus." "Bonus" is the word. And so they sent down to your fathers and brothers and sons rice that was worm-eaten, and bread that was mouldy, and meat that was rank, and blankets that were shoddy, and cavalry horses that stumbled in the charge, and tents that sifted the rain into exhausted faces. But it was all right. They got the bonus.

I never so much believed in a Republican form of government as I do to-day, for the simple reason that any other style of government would have been consumed long ago. There have been swindles enacted in this nation within the last thirty years enough to swamp three monarchies. The Democratic party filled its cup of iniquity before it went out of power before the war. Then the Republican party came along, and its opportunities through the contracts were greater, and so it filled its cup of iniquity a little sooner, and there they lie to-day, the Democratic party and the Republican party, side by side, great loathsome carcasses of iniquity, each one worse than the other. Tens of thousands of good citizens in all the parties; but you know as well as I do that party organization in this country is utterly, utterly corrupt.

Now, if there were nothing for you and for me to do in this matter I would not present this subject. There are several THINGS FOR US TO DO.

First, stand aloof from all political office unless you have your moral principles thoroughly settled. Do not go into this blaze of temptation unless you are fireproof. Hundreds of respectable men have been destroyed for this life and the life to come because they had not moral principle to stand office. You go into some office of authority without moral principle, and before you get through you will lie, and you will swear, and you will gamble, and you will steal. You say that is not complimentary. Well, I always was clumsy at compliments.

Another thing for you to do is to be faithful at the ballot-box. Do not stand on your dignity and say, "I'll not go where the rabble are." If need be, put on your old clothes and just push yourself through amid the unwashed, and vote. Vote for men who love God and hate rum. You cannot say, you ought not to say, "I have nothing to do with this matter." Then you will insult the graves of your fathers who died for the establishment of the government and you will insult the graves of your children who may live to feel the results of your negligence.

Another thing for you to do: evangelize the people. Get the hearts of the people right, and they will vote right. That woman who this afternoon in Sunday-school teaches six boys how to be Christians will do more for the future of this country than the man who writes the finest essay about the Federal Constitution. I know there are a great many good people who think that God ought to be recognized in the Constitution, and they are making a move in that direction. I am most anxious that God shall be in the hearts of the people. Get their hearts right, and then they will vote right.

If there be fifty million people in this country, then at least a fifty millionth part of the responsibility rests on you. What we want is a great revival of religion reaching from sea to sea, and it is going to come. A newspaper gentleman asked me in St. Louis a few weeks ago what I thought of revivals. I said I thought so much of them I never put my faith in anything else. We want thousands in a day, hundreds of thousands in a day, nations in a day. Get all the people evangelized, brought under Christianized influences. These great evils that we now so much deplore will be banished from the land.

And remember, my friends, that we are at last to be judged, not as nations, but as individuals—in that day when empires and republics shall alike go down and we shall have to give account for ourselves, for what we have done and for what we have neglected to do—in that day when the earth itself will be a heap of ashes scattered in the blast of the nostrils of the Lord God Almighty. God save the commonwealth of New York! God save the United States of America!

THE OCCUPATIONS, ETC.

A new pamphlet of Dr. Talmage's Sermons, under the above title, is now ready. Among the twenty-six sermons it contains, are those to Lawyers, Doctors, Merchants, Clerks, Commercial Travellers, The Theatrical Profession, and Telegraph Operators. Also Sermons on Business Life, The East Wind, Silver Wings, The Pouting Son, The Ferry-boat of the Jordan, etc. It may be obtained, postage paid, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office for thirty cents.

NO MILLENNIUM UNTIL JESUS COMES.

A Bible Study by E. P. Marvin.

Truth is always more beneficial in its influence than error. The truth concerning the order of the Advent and the millennium can only be ascertained certainly by the Word of God. If we find difficulties in the pre-millennial doctrine, we should remember that the post-millennial doctrine also has its difficulties, and we only ask those who believe us to be in error to pursue the method of Dr. Charles Hodge, viz., "The only legitimate method of controverting a doctrine which purports to be founded on sacred Scripture is the exegetical."

If the Church is to convert the world and usher in the millennium, why is it not clearly and prominently revealed in the New Testament?

We hear this now iterated and reiterated at missionary meetings, and we are told that mission work is absolutely and hopelessly paralyzed without this motive of successful conquest.

Mark also, there were special occasions for revealing this if true. When Christ gave the great commission (Mark 16 : 16). When Peter wrote to cheer and comfort the dispersed and suffering saints (I and II Peter). When Paul corrected the mistake of the Thessalonians, that the "day of the Lord was present," why did he not tell them, as a certain theological professor told us, "Set your hearts to rest, for the Lord will not come for at least a thousand years?"

Where then does the New Testament promise a millennium before Jesus comes? That this is impossible may be seen by the following summary.

1. His coming and the establishment of the kingdom are contemporaneous. The kingdom comes with the King (Acts 3 : 20–21 ; II Tim. 4 : 1 ; Luke 19 : 12, 15).

2. Antichrist, whose career all believe will be pre-millennial, will be alive at His coming and destroyed by Him (II Thess. 2 : 8).

3. God's purpose through this dispensation is witness bearing and outcalling, and history has fulfilled it (Matt. 24 : 14 ; Acts 1 : 8 ; Acts 15 : 14–17).

4. The spiritual exaltation and extension of the Church, as now constituted, with elders and deacons, does not constitute a kingdom, as prophesied (Luke 1 : 32, 33 ; Isa. 32 : 1 ; Rev. 20 : 4).

5. Prophecy declares that the Church will remain in an imperfect and humiliating condition until Christ comes. A mixed multitude. The drag net and the Virgins (Matt. 13 : 47 ; Matt. 25 : 1–13. Also I Tim. 4 : 1 ; II Tim. 3 : 1–8 ; Matt. 7 : 22, 23 ; Luke 18 : 1–8). The "Israel within Israel" despised, persecuted, and suffering till the end of the dispensation (Mark 10 : 30 ; John 15 : 18–20 ; John 16 : 33 ; II Tim. 3 : 12).

6. The predicted condition of the Jew and Gentile world forbids any millennium till Jesus comes (Luke 21 : 24 ; Rom. 11 : 25–27 ; Matt. 24 : 21 ; Matt. 22 : 1–14 ; Luke 19 : 27 ; Luke 17 : 26–30). Times of Noah and Lot a mirror (Matt. 13 : 3). Tares and wheat together (I John 5 : 19 ; Rom. 12 : 2 ; II Thess. 2 : 7–12). The world continues under Satan, and we come out from it as a ruin.

7. Finally, as we are repeatedly commanded to watch, not for the millennium, but for the Lord's coming, no one can certainly place a thousand years or even the tick of a clock between us and that glorious event. Watching involves expectancy and liability of instant occurrence (Matt. 24 : 42–48 ; Matt. 25 : 13 ; Mark 13 : 35–37 ; Luke 12 : 35–46 ; Rev. 16 : 15 ; Rev. 22 20).

What are we to think of professing Christians who treat these solemn and repeated injunctions with indifference, or who tell us that they see no interest or importance in the subject?

The Westminster Confession of Faith, the Savoy Confession, and most of the other symbols of the ancient and modern Church teach the imminence of the Lord's coming. Must we not conclude then by the word of the Lord that there can be no millennium until Jesus comes?

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

No Stool for Satan to Sit On.—At a Recent meeting an evangelist said: "An aged Christian woman was asked, 'Are you never troubled by the devil, that you are always so cheerful?' 'Oh, yes, he often comes to the door, but I never bid him come in, nor give him a stool to sit on.' A great many people not only bid the devil come in, but make him very comfortable. They do not even put him to the trouble of roaring, but simply permit him to stand by with folded arms, looking on while they do his work with all their might and main."

A Song that Couldn't be Sung.—Mr. Reid said: "I was brought into contact with a young person when Messrs. Moody and Sankey were here, ten years ago. She got a ticket for the workers' meeting, though she got it in a wrong way, and had no right to it; yet the Holy Spirit met her while we sang 'Jesus loves me, and'—there she stopped; she could not sing, I know I love Him.' Do you know how long it took her to finish that line? Just three days and three nights. Coming down the street about her usual business the everlasting light broke in through the mist of unbelief which surrounded her heart and mind. She has been living a happy, useful Christian life to this moment."

An "Ancient Mariner," as he Calls Himself, thus spoke: "I have led a long and evil life at sea; in fact, the usual life of many sailors, one of steady dissipation. To enter into the coarse details of such a life would not be edifying; indeed, it would be a sin against God to do so. I will simply say that I got alarmed at my own wickedness, and became a temperance man and a church member, and was a very nice white-washed hypocrite, but not a bit better in the eyes of God than when I revelled openly in sin. I went to a meeting in a tent one day where the Gospel was being preached. Mr. Scroggie was preaching, and there and then I was raised by the Holy Spirit to a sense of my awful position in the eyes of God. There I met Jesus, and threw myself on Him for salvation, and found it, and blessed be His dear name, have ever since been running over with it."

A Church-member Made a Christian.—At a recent meeting Mr. Jack related: "One Friday night I addressed a meeting at Govan, and after the meeting I had the privilege of speaking to a most intelligent workingman, who is a member of a Christian church in the locality. He was a very strict church-goer, but had no Christ in his life. A fellow-workman had fixed upon him as a suitable subject for conversion, and worked and prayed and spoke till he was successful in getting him to attend this particular meeting. The result of his disinterested and untiring labors did not end there, for the Holy Ghost roused the man to a vivid sense of his sins, and caused him to seek Jesus as his Saviour. You should have seen the glow on his face as he decided for Christ, and gave up relying on his churchism. It is not the Church that saves, but only Christ, who is the Church's Rock and Head."

When the Old Man's Prayers were Answered.—Mr. Miller recently impressed upon Christians the necessity of watching for an answer to their prayers, and of being in a state of joyous expectancy while so doing, and he related the following striking incident in a minister's experience: "The minister was visiting a good old man, one of Zion's pilgrims, who had been long on the way, and asked, 'I suppose you have many a record of God's answer to your prayers?' Very hesitatingly the old man replied, 'No, I can't say that I have.' 'Then what is the use of your prayers? Had you not better give them up?' 'Oh, no, I can't do that.' There was quite an alarmed expression on his face as he said this. He had never watched for an answer to his prayers, but he felt that he could not get on without praying. On the minister's next visit, he noticed that the old man's face was quite changed, in fact, he was like another man. Without waiting for h visitor's greeting, he exclaimed, 'Oh! I hav had all my prayers answered at once. I neve had to wait for the answers coming. On thinl ing over what you said, I began to remembe God's faithfulness as incident after incident i my life came rushing back upon me. My hea was filled with a new sense of trust, and love i and toward God.'"

Ruined on the Race-Course.—Mr. Oatts said "Quite recently a fine gentlemanly young ma called at my office. I knew something abou him, because his brother had spoken about hin to me a short time before. As arranged, th young man was waiting for me at the end of th noon prayer-meeting. After the usual greetings he said, 'I suppose you know all about me?' 'I know some of it,' I answered. Then he tol me the melancholy story of his ruin. He wa in England on business, and when in a bank depositing some money, he heard about some races which were going on in the district. Never having been at a race before, his curiosity was aroused, and he determined to see them. He went, and took a great interest in all that was going on. Soon some men gathered round, who took a still greater interest in him, and induced him to make some bets. At first they allowed him to win, but presently he began to lose. Next day he returned to the race-course, and betted away a sum worth $2000, not his own, which he had drawn from the bank. He finished his story with, 'Here I am, character gone, money thrown away, and my business lost.' Truly, the way of transgressors is hard. It is hoped, however, that he has begun a new life in Christ."

A Soldier Enlists Under a New Flag.—At a recent meeting a man in military uniform said: "I went into a little religious meeting one night in the East Indies. My nerves were all shaking from the effects of strong drink. It happened that the minister was speaking on the power of God to save men from the grasp of alcohol. 'That suits me,' I thought. But when those who desired freedom were invited to remain for conversation, the devil tempted me to leave, saying, 'There are your comrades who will laugh and say, "He is turning a blue light,"' as they call Christians in the army; but I resisted the devil, and remained. The minister asked me, 'Do you want to be a Christian?' 'Yes,' I answered, 'if it's true that God can keep me from strong drink.' 'Yes, it is true; I can easily prove it; but the best way is to try God yourself.' I did so, there, where I sat, and felt immediate deliverance from its thraldom, though my breath was rank with its fumes. I went to the barracks, where I knelt before my cot with my brain in a tumult for fear of my comrades' jeers. I knew nothing what I said in my prayer, but Jesus knew what I meant, and amid the jests and scornful laughter of my roommates, He gave me grace to bear all joyfully for His dear sake, and since that night He has used me as an instrument to win souls for God."

Crossing a Dangerous Bridge in the Dark.—"One dark night a gentleman was going to his house, and being pressed for time, he took an unfrequented by-path by which he had to cross a narrow, dangerous bridge, in which there were gaps, caused by planks being removed. If he had fallen through any of these openings, he would have been dashed to atoms in the depths below. The night being dark, and being in a hurry, the gentleman could not see, and had no time to think, but ran over the bridge. The next morning he told his friends the route he had taken on the previous night; they were much surprised at his strange escape from death and so roused his curiosity by their exclamations of wonder and thankfulness, that he went down to see the place he had crossed the night before. When he saw it, he got sick and fainted at the dreadful danger he had run in the dark. We are reminded by this incident of the haste to secure money at any cost, by means of which thousands are daily putting their own souls and the souls of others in deadly peril. What will their feelings be when the feverish desire is burned out, and they look calmly upon the danger they ran of losing their souls?"

JOB'S SICKNESS.

By Mrs. M. Baxter.*

A Battle-Ground—Satan's Knowledge of Human Frailty—His Reliance on the Effects of Sickness—Job's Battle with Man—Attempts Self-Justification—His Oscillation between Faith and Self-Righteousness—Vehement Repudiation of his Friends' Theories—Elihu's Reproof and Vindication of God—God Purging Job of Self-Conceit—The Prince Becomes a Penitent.

It is God's testimony of Job that he was "a perfect and an upright man, one that feared God, and eschewed evil" (Job 1 : 8). Thus his friends made a great mistake in supposing that his afflictions and his sickness were sent to punish sin in him. They had very little light upon the heart of God, and His purposes of love, and, at any cost to poor Job, they attempted so to explain his case as to make it square with their theories.

Job is the only man whose patience God mentions in His Word, "Ye have heard of the patience of Job" (James 5 : 11). As long as his afflictions were external he never once murmured or questioned the right of God to recall what He had given. When his oxen, asses, sheep, camels, servants, and even his sons and daughters were taken away from him in a single day, and he was left childless and penniless, he only fell down and worshipped his God who had permitted it, saying, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Job knew nothing of the malice of Satan, who was working against him; he was quite unaware how he was being made between God and Satan; but, like an unquestioning child, he saw only his Father's hand. "In all this Job sinned not nor charged God foolishly."

The Lord Himself bears witness to Job's integrity, and that to the very adversary who was seeking to overthrow him, and, by this means, to gain a victory over God. "And Satan answered, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth Thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse Thee to Thy face." Satan knows enough of human nature to be aware how sickness opens the door to all kinds of temptations; how when there is neither strength to think nor pray, the suggestion that the Lord has forsaken gets such power; how when every nerve is one agony of pain and neither light nor sound can be tolerated, it is utterly impossible to think of anything else but the suffering. Satan knows that when nothing else can crush, sickness can. But he went too far when he attributed sickness to God, as though He were the Author of it, "Put forth Thine hand now," for God disowns the imputation, turning it back upon him, "Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life," thus allowing Satan to go only the length of his tether. Even when "smitten with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown," and even when tempted by his wife to "curse God, and die," Job's eye was still on God, and he answered, "What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? [Ignorant that all evil is from Satan.] In all this did not Job sin with his lips?"

awaited him; his three friends came "to mourn with him and to comfort him:" it was all that man could do—God's work is to save and to heal. But these friends, what would they think of God's dealings with him? While alone with God he had no difficulty; he knew there was no shadow between; but sickness was always looked upon in his days as the result of sin; in our days men regard it as a kind of saintship. Job's friends said nothing, but it is very probable that their looks said a great deal. It was not until his friends came that Job's eye was off God; pressure of suffering and the consciousness of not being able to explain to others the dealings of God, which he could not himself understand, were too much for him; and he fell into the snare of impatience, and cursed his day (chap. 3).

He was morbidly conscious of his own righteousness, and it was like death to him to have it doubted. Then it was that the hitherto unspoken feelings of his friends were expressed, "Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. . . . But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. . . . Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off?" (Chap. 4 : 3-7.) Again, "I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause" (chap. 5 : 8), as though Job had not done so! Poor Job! he had taken all else from God, but these undeserved imputations from Eliphaz, afterward repeated by him (chap. 15 : 32), and strengthened by those of Bildad and Zophar (chap. 8, 11, 18, 20), stirred and goaded him in his physically weak state, and he began to undertake his defence.

It was hard work to endure such suffering of body and, at the same time, to

by self-justification, while the hand of God seemed to be against him. He most touchingly entreats for real light upon his case—"Teach me, and I will hold my tongue; cause me to understand wherein I have erred" (chap. 6 : 24). Once he owns his sin of cursing his day (chap. 7 : 20, 21), but, at the same time, manifests a spirit of asperity, and reproaches God, for he was sore from the wounds of his friends at the very time.

While he was occupied in proving to his friends that he was innocent, and in repudiating their unkind and unjust charges, it is striking how, at first, all his speeches, though he began them as addressed to man, end in words spoken to God (chap. 7 : 12-21; 9 : 27; 10; 13 : 20; 14). It is only at last when he becomes exasperated that he gives up speaking to God. There was one thing, however, that from first to last he would not give up; he clung to it as to his very life; it was his own righteousness, his consciousness of not being smitten with sickness as a punishment, as his friends supposed. He calls himself "the just, upright man," and clings to a righteous self, to perfection in the flesh, and not in God (chap. 12 : 4). The battle seemed nearly won, when he says, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him;" yet he spoils it again in adding, "but I will maintain mine own ways before Him. . . . Behold, now, I have ordered my cause, I know that I shall be justified." "Till I die, I will not remove mine integrity from me. My righteousness I hold fast, and will not let it go: my heart shall not reproach me so long as I live" (27 : 5, 6).

SPIRITUAL OSCILLATION.

But there was the same alternation between faith, self-righteousness, and self-pity, which so many of us have known in seasons of pressing trial, until by the power of the Holy Ghost we have been enabled to get over on to God's side of the trial and of ourselves. One moment Job says, "I know that my Redeemer liveth" (chap. 19 : 25-27), and another, "God hath delivered me to the ungodly, and turned me over into the hands of the wicked. I was at ease, and He hath broken me asunder; He hath also taken me by my neck, and shaken me to pieces, and set me up for His mark. . . . Not for any injustice in mine hands; also my prayer is pure" (chap. 16 : 11-17).

At last Job came to the end of himself; his arguments against God and man had only got him into trouble. He closes with of his righteousness, and declares of God, "As a prince would I go near unto Him" (chap. 31 : 37). Then he retires from the battle-field, sore in mind and body, and in this state he says, "The words of Job are ended." Then it was that God had an instrument ready. He sent Elihu to act as a daysman, and speak to him on God's behalf. He first shows Job that, in his intense desire to justify himself, he had brought God in guilty (chap. 33 : 9, 10); that he had failed to listen to God, and thus the purpose of his sickness had not been accomplished, and so his healing and deliverance were retarded (chap. 33 : 14-28). He says of Job that he "multiplieth his words against God" (chap. 34 : 37), and teaches in the whole of that chapter that the place of the creature is one of unquestioning obedience. "Surely it is meet to be said unto God, I have borne chastisement, I will not offend any more; that which I see not, teach Thou me; if I have done iniquity, I will do no more." That which was meet to do, Job had not done; but, forgetting his place as the creature, he had taken upon him to judge and to reproach his Creator. His three friends, while they knew there must be something wrong somewhere, and exasperated him: they "had found no answer, yet had condemned Job" (chap. 32 : 3).

HIT UPON THE WRONG THING,

Oh, how much this want of loyalty to God lies at the root of protracted sickness, depression, and many other trials! Oh, how much there is of mistrust of God, when things do not turn out as they have been expected, when prayer is not answered just as we have supposed and planned, when healing does not come as we have looked for it, or as some one else has expected it for us! Oh, how easily Satan persuades us that this time God did fail us—this time He was unfaithful! Elihu had just hit the mark; Job knew it, and he was now still enough in soul to hear the voice of God.

Why did not God reveal His love, and just melt poor, crushed Job with its tenderness? Job was a perfect man—a man whose whole purpose of life was God, and thus every wrong step of his must be retraced. It was in his relation as a creature to God that Job had failed; he had forgotten to keep his true place, and thus God speaks to him of His greatness and power, not of His love, and thus applies what He has said, "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct Him? He that reproveth God, let him answer it." Job took his place at once; he was no longer at a loss to know his way, "Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer Thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth." Job was conquered.

But the Lord continues until every bit of Job's conceit in himself is at an end, and he cries, "I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth Thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." Job was fully broken; but a penitent; as dead to good self as he must have been to bad self before God could call him "a perfect and an upright man." And now God can let out His heart of love; He turns to Job's friends, his "miserable comforters" (chap. 16 : 2), and gives utterance to the truth, which must have startled them, that Job, in all his deep humiliation, and even in his bitterness of spirit, was, after all, nearer God than they, and they could not be accepted, save through his intercession. Oh, the tenderness of the love of God! No words, no assurances of love could have so won Job's heart as this little token of God's confidence. He could afford to forgive his friends if, through his intercession God would forgive them; his relations with God were re-established; his soreness with his friends was gone. God turned his captivity; no more boils; his acquaintances came about him; children sprang up around him; all he had lost was doubled over to him, and his latter end was better than the beginning.

NO MORE A PRINCE,

* From Thy Healer, the new periodical, edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, issued in London twice a month. It contains articles on God's dealings with soul and body, and describes the work at Bethshan and other institutions in Europe devoted to faith-healing. May be had from The Christian Herald office, price five cents, postage paid to any address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President Sent a Message to Congress on Wednesday urging the appropriation of funds for the completion of the unfinished monitors and other naval purposes. The President said: "I am unwilling to see the gradual reconstruction of our naval cruisers, now happily begun in conformity with modern requirements, delayed one full year for any unsubstantial reason. Whatever conditions Congress may see fit to impose, in order to secure judicious designs and honest and economical construction, will be acceptable to me; but to relinquish or postpone the policy already deliberately declared will be, in my judgment, an act of national imprudence." There is no doubt that the reconstruction of the navy is urgently needed, for in spite of the vast sums appropriated in former years, we have still no navy worthy of the name. Nevertheless there are reasons well understood why Congress is reluctant to make the appropriation. The President evidently appreciates those reasons, as he promises in advance to accept any conditions Congress may impose, to secure honesty. It is strange that so astute a man did not foresee this difficulty when constructing his cabinet.

Of the Nine Schemes for Disposing of the trade dollar nuisance, that proposed by Mr. Dowd has been unanimously reported by the committee on coinage. It provides that until June 1st, 1886, trade dollars shall be received at their face value in payment of all dues to the United States, and shall not be again paid out. Holders of trade dollars on the presentation of the coin to any Treasurer or Assistant Treasurer will receive in exchange, dollar for dollar, standard silver dollars of the United States. The trade dollars received in any national depository are to be recoined into standard dollars. The trade dollars are to be regarded and treated, when received at the mints, as silver bullion, and their bullion value shall be deducted from the amount of bullion required to be purchased and coined by the act of February 28th, 1878. The last clause of the bill is important, because it will diminish the expense now going on, by recoining the trade dollars instead of purchasing silver bullion. Mr. Bland and his friends will, however, try to have that clause omitted.

The Senate has Decided, in Spite of the Secretaries of War and the Navy, to offer a reward of $25,000 to any private person who shall discover and rescue any members of the Greely party. The bill authorizing payment was passed on Friday and sent to the House. The Senate, in deference to the opinions expressed by the secretaries, inserted a clause barring claims for damages which might be incurred in searching for the party. If the House passes the bill its action will be popular in the country. The people are anxious that Lieutenant Greely and his companions should be rescued, and do not care who performs the duty so that it be done with all speed.

Distressing Narratives of Property Destroyed and lives lost come from the Mississippi Valley, which is now, it is stated, "a vast inland sea." The broken levees have caused an inundation which has ruined plantations, drowned live stock, swept away houses and barns, and destroyed many lives. A telegram from New Orleans states that the break in the levee opposite College Point is one hundred feet wide and ten feet deep. The Scott Levee near Bayou Sara has been swept away. All the streams west of Richmond, Va., are swollen, the James having risen ten feet. At Columbia, fifty miles above that city, the waters have risen twenty-three feet and continue rising. Despatches from Louisiana prove that the distress is great. The telegrams indicate that the swelling waters will soon cover other parishes. There is suffering among men and beasts. Many of the planters have not the means to feed either their plantation hands or their stock. All the despatches urge prompt relief. Generals Beauregard and Ogden and Mayor Behan, of New Orleans, have telegraphed that relief committees are being rapidly organized for the distribution of supplies purchased out of the $125,000 appropriated by Congress for the Ohio floods, which was not required there, and has now been applied to the relief of the Mississippi sufferers. Homes all through the submerged region have been abandoned, and whites and blacks are huddled together on the upper floors of cotton-gin houses. Secretary Lincoln has directed General Beckwith to despatch a boat loaded with provisions from St. Louis for the destitute on the Lower Mississippi, probably needed from Vicksburg down.

The Fatal Riots which Disturbed Cincinnati last week appear to have originated in the indignation naturally excited by the verdict of a jury. A man who was clearly guilty of a brutal and cowardly murder, who had, in fact, confessed his guilt, was tried before a jury which found him guilty of manslaughter only. The judge and the spectators denounced the shameful miscarriage of justice, and a public meeting was called to protest against it. The meeting was held on Friday last; it was called by reputable citizens, and a committee was appointed to promote legislation which would tend to prevent a recurrence of such verdicts. Some wild and lawless persons, present at the meeting, determined to take the law into their own hands, and in the excitement of the time a mob was quickly gathered, which was believed to number ten thousand persons. They went direct to the jail, and battered in the door. They were resisted by the police, who used their pistols, but fired over the heads of the crowd, to scare them. The jail contained twenty murderers, but the man specially sought had been quietly removed. On Saturday morning the excitement increased, and the militia were called out. They succeeded in clearing the rioters out of the jail, but they remained outside in menacing attitude. Four men were killed and about twenty wounded in that conflict. The resistance exasperated the mob, who raided the gunsmiths' stores for arms and ammunition. The police and the soldiers prepared for another attack on Saturday night. They erected a barricade, and trained a Gatling gun into position. Indiscriminate firing on both sides took place as night closed in, and shortly after ten o'clock the militia charged the mob, killing many persons. Their fire was returned, and when they went back to the jail the mob followed and closed around it. The rioters succeeded in setting fire to the Court-House, which contains a valuable law library and records of great importance. The engines summoned to extinguish the flames were not allowed to approach, and the Court-House in which the obnoxious verdict was given was soon burning from basement to dome. Attempts were also made to burn the jail, but they were unsuccessful. On Sunday the rioting was renewed. The rioters having gained possession of the roofs of houses near the court-house, fired from there on the troops. Eventually, as soldiers came in from Columbus, Cleveland, and other cities, order was partially restored, and on Monday morning the police were again in control of the city. It was then hoped that the riot was at an end.

Over Fifteen Hundred Murders were Committed in the United States last year. So says a statistician writing in the current number of The Century. He also states that the total number of legal executions during the same period was ninety-three. It is thus clear that the bulk of the murderers escape their just punishment. Some of them escape by evading detection, others by bribing juries, and others again by the clemency of the governors. The result has been a growing contempt for justice, which in Cincinnati has taken the form of attempting to perform duties which rightfully belong only to the authorities. The disorder and bloodshed which have resulted are deplorable. The mob appears to have lost sight of the original cause of the trouble, and to be eager for new excesses. The affair ought to lead to a reform of judicial methods. It is also a startling evidence of the power and number of the lawless persons in our great cities. Our preachers and evangelists have evidently much work to do in inculcating integrity among the classes from which jurymen are chosen, and in teaching generally respect for law and order.

A Cyclone, the Most Disastrous Known in that section of the country, swept through Kentucky, Ohio, Virginia, North and South Carolina, and Upper Georgia on March 25th. Reports of buildings overturned, bridges swept away, trees uprooted, and a sad loss of life are sent from various places in those states. At Newton, N. C., two persons are reported killed and fourteen badly injured; at Lenoir, N. C., six ladies and a whole family were killed. The College for Ladies at Gainesville, Ga., was blown down, but the students escaped.

Copiah County, Mississippi, Recently the scene of the fatal election outrage, is reported to be on the eve of prohibition. One of its citizens writes to a New York journal: "After a struggle of years, including a recent canvass of the whole county by the advocates of the temperance cause, the act prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors has passed both houses of the Legislature, and only awaits the signature of the Governor to become a law, which no doubt will be given in due time." No better way of purifying the moral and social atmosphere of the county could be adopted. It is a pity prohibition was not in operation there last November.

The Biography of Mr. E. W. Oakes, Published this week in The Christian Herald, occupies a larger space than is usually devoted to that department. We have given it intentionally, not only on account of its thrilling interest, but because its narration we believe likely to be blessed by God to the benefit of souls. Many people in New York who have heard Mr. Oakes relate incidents from it have been encouraged to seek the same unfailing remedy for the same affliction. We trust our subscribers will make it known in quarters where it is likely to be useful.

The Refusal, by the Presbyterian Hospital of Philadelphia, of a gift of $2500, the proceeds of a charity ball, recently mentioned in these columns, has not been a loss to the society's funds. A resident of Bucks County has sent to the trustees a check for $3000 with the explanation that $2500 is in lieu of the money which the hospital declined, and the remaining $500 is a premium for adhering to principle. He requests that the entire amount be added to the principal of the permanent fund of the hospital, to the end that principal and principle may go together.

Liquor Dealers in Kansas who Try to Resist the prohibition law appear to run considerable risk. One of them has cause to regret his action. On March 21st a man opened a saloon in Canton, Kansas, in defiance of the law. The following Monday he got into a row with one of his drunken customers, and was shot by the constable. The women of the place raided his saloon on Tuesday and poured his liquors into the street, in the presence of an applauding crowd.

The Rev. E. Payson Hammond's Labors in Western New York have been blessed in a remarkable degree. The editor of a local paper says: "The largest congregations that have ever assembled in Hammondsport on any occasion have listened to Mr. Hammond's preaching, and many with tearful eyes. This is altogether the most extensive and vital religious movement this vicinity has experienced for a generation, and it seems not yet to have reached its height." Another editor says of the services in his town: "The work has been the one absorbing theme of conversation, not only in the village, but on the hills, in the valley, and in every direction. Delegations have been present on different occasions from Bath, Wayne, Pulteney, Prattsburg, Mitchellville, and, in fact, from every quarter for miles around."

The Recently Discovered Ancient Manuscript now translated and published under the title of "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles," is generally accepted by the critics and scholars as a genuine document. It is attributed to the second century of the Christian era, a period about which comparatively little is known. The manuscript was found by Bryennios, Bishop of Serrae, in the library of the Convent of the Holy Sepulchre in Constantinople, the former inmates of which were employed as transcribers of sacred documents. The manuscript contained the epistles of Clement to the Corinthians. Its chief value consists in the light it sheds on the doctrine and teaching of the leaders of that early time in the Christian Church. The following extract shows their views as to the coming of the Lord: "These signs of the truth will appear: First, the sign that the heaven opens; then the sign of the trumpet blast, and third, the resurrection of the dead, yet not of all, but, as is said, 'The Lord will come, and all the saints with Him.'" It may be inferred from this that they held the belief that the impenitent dead would not rise at the same time as the dead in Christ.

The Era of Dynamite was Proclaimed at Two meetings held in New York on Sunday, March 23d. One of them was to celebrate the birth of the French Commune, the other the killing of Cavendish and Burke in Ireland. Herr Most, who was one of the speakers, said: "Their fight was not for themselves, but for all mankind. Labor has carried the fight to other countries. One day it is heard in St. Petersburg, in the report of an exploding bomb thrown at the Czar; the next, in the dismay created in an English town by dynamite; the next, in the knife-thrust at power in Dublin or in Vienna. If tyranny does not like the blood-red flag, then it will have a chance to try how it likes the black flag of death." Another speaker said that parliaments, kings, and emperors represented old ideas that the Commune did away with. The Commune made the first social revolution of the century, and its work would go on. The struggle was not political, but altogether social. No power could stop its onward progress. Still another speaker, quoting passages from the writings of Moses, attempted to prove that dynamite warfare is in harmony with the Bible, and urged his hearers to read their Bibles more carefully. It was strange advice to give at a dynamite meeting, but it was advice those present sadly needed. If they follow it there will be less need for precautions. Those who read their Bibles carefully will have no share in dynamite plots.

The Petitions Circulated by the Ohio Woman's Christian Temperance Union, on the defeat of the second amendment last fall, have received 117,946 signatures, of which 62,000 are those of ladies. The petitions, which were sent to all parts of the State, ask for a resubmission of the amendment in the fall of 1885, which is the earliest date the Constitution will allow.

The New York Sunday-School Association requests us to call attention to a meeting to be held on April 7th, at eight o'clock, in the De Witt Memorial Church, on Rivington Street near Cannon. Its object is to promote mission work and to interest in that sphere of labor Sunday-school superintendents, officers, and teachers. The list of speakers and the programme of the meeting issued, promise a most interesting and stimulating meeting, which we hope will be blessed of God in attracting new laborers to this important field.

The Worth of a Building in Georgia is placed on a sliding scale by its owner. A newspaper, published in that State, avers that it knows of a piece of property which is worth $6000, but says when the owner of it wishes to get it insured he values it at $8000; when his neighbor wishes to buy it he values it at $10,000; when he gives it in for taxes he values it at $4000. It is remarkable that men who pride themselves on their integrity regard such conduct as justifiable. Nevertheless, it bears a dangerous resemblance to the system of having divers weights and divers measures, both of which, we are assured, are an abomination to the Lord (Prov. 20 : 10).

An Engineer's Prophetic Dream is Described in the Durham (N. C.) Reporter. It says: "Engineer Cox, of the Western Road, had the following dream two nights before he was killed: Thursday night he was sleeping in a room at the hotel in Salisbury with several companions, and during the night they were awakened by hearing him shouting, 'For God's sake, help me!' His companions jumped up and asked him what was the matter. 'I dreamed,' he replied, 'that my engine turned over and caught me under it.' Saturday morning his dream was fulfilled." If the engineer had been as firm a believer in dreams as some people are, he would have been deterred from performing his duties. The many natural causes there are to account for peculiar dreams justify people in disregarding them. The same excuse cannot, however, be made for men who live in sin in spite of the divine warnings that its inevitable end is death eternal (Luke 16 : 31).

Retribution for Signing a Saloon Keeper's petition befell a woman who appeared recently as plaintiff in the courts. She sued a saloon keeper under the Civil Damage Act for injuries suffered by her husband when intoxicated. Defendant's lawyer in cross-examination compelled her to admit the curious fact that she herself had signed the petition by which the saloon man had obtained his license. Very naturally this was urged as a reason why she should not obtain damages, but the court took the opposite view, and held that the signing of the petition did not authorize the saloon keeper to sell or give intoxicants to her husband or any other person in violation of the statute. Nevertheless, though she did not lose her case, she occupied a very anomalous position, and she probably did not recover as much as she lost through her husband's injuries. She had an opportunity of learning the nature of the traffic which she assisted to extend in the community (Hab. 2 : 15).

BEFORE DAYBREAK WITH CHRIST.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And in the morning, rising up a great while before day, he went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed. And Simon and they that were with him followed after him. And when they had found him, they said unto him, All men seek for thee. And he said unto them, Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also: for therefore came I forth. And he preached in their synagogues throughout all Galilee, and cast out devils."—Mark. 1 : 35–39.

A WONDERFUL day was closed and crowned by a wonderful evening. Capernaum had been exalted to heaven that day, for deeds worthy of heaven had been wrought in her. Within the synagogue the power and authority of the new Teacher had been seen; but at the close of the Sabbath, when the people felt more free to lay their sick before Him, His divine majesty was glorified of all in the open streets of the little town. Galilee had never before seen such a day of preaching or such an eventide of healing. "At even, when the sun did set, they brought unto Him all that were diseased, and them that were possessed with devils. And all the city was gathered together at the door. And He healed many that were sick of divers diseases, and cast out many devils." Surely this day was worthy to take a front rank among "the days of the Son of man."

A WONDERFUL EVENING!

Did not they think it so who had long grown to their beds, but suddenly found themselves walking, and leaping, and praising God? Those must have thought it so who beheld their pining relatives restored to health and vigor. Even devils must have felt it to be so, as they fled pell-mell into the deep. Assuredly the people of the city must have been greatly excited; on the house-tops, in the market, and in every lane and alley, the one theme of talk must have been the new Rabbi, His strange teaching, and His unrivalled miracles. After our Lord's sermon in the synagogue He held an inquiry-meeting in the street—He had no other assembly-room. There He led them to look to Him and obtain healing; and as this went on, crowds of persons were present confessing what the Lord had done for them. One might be content to die after being present at such a scene.

Do you not think that the wonderful evening was followed by

AN EQUALLY WONDERFUL MORNING?

That Sunday morning, as we now call the first day of the week, was it not equally notable? Remember the grand excitement of the day and its long eventide, and then observe the hallowed devotion of the coming dawn. The Preacher and Miracle-worker had been wrought up to a high pitch, and we should not have wondered had He needed lengthened rest; but instead thereof we read, "Rising up a great while before day, He went out, and departed into a solitary place, and there prayed."

Jesus has taken such necessary sleep as He desired, and He wakes. It is still dark, and all the inmates of the house are asleep. He very quietly and noiselessly steals out of the chamber, and finds His way into the street; and you see Him go along alone till He has quitted the narrow roadway, and reached the open fields. The gloaming of the morning has hardly come; the dawn is scarcely gray. It is "a great while before daylight," and the darkness hangs all around with its friendly veil. But He knows His way; He had been adown those streets healing the sick; and out in the open He is at home, for He is acquainted with solitude, and the lines upon the face of sleeping nature are familiar to Him. He turns to the most solitary hill-side. Yonder is a hollow; He who enters that recess is quite out of sight. Jesus has passed into that hidden place, and there, in the darkness, He kneels; He cries; He supplicates; He speaks with God;

HE PRAYS.

Is this His rest after a toilsome day? Is this His preparation for coming labor? It is even so. That early morning of prayer explains the evening of power. As man He had not possessed that wonderful power over human minds if He had not perpetually communed with God. And now that His day's work is done, and the marvellous evening is over, all is not ended—a life-work still remains before Him, and therefore He must pray. He feels a needs-be that there should be more marvellous evenings—that there should be further displays of power, and therefore the Great Worker draws nigh again to the source of strength, that He may afresh gird up His loins for that which lies before Him.

Dear friends, there is always a connection, even if we do not see it, between that great crowd on Sunday, and the pleadings of the saints; a most intimate connection between the flocking converts of the ministry and those secret prayers which follow and precede it. There is such a connection that the two cannot be parted. God will not send great blessings in the way of open conversion if secret prayer be neglected. Let the preacher or the church forbear to pray, and God will forbear to bless. Ay, and after conversions, unless there be again special prayer presented by the Lord's servants, much that looked like blessing may turn out to have been but the semblance of it, and future blessing may be withheld. If I could impress my heart on every syllable, and baptize every word with my tears, I could not too earnestly entreat you to be above all things earnest in prayer.

I delight to think of our Lord as praying before He did a great thing; it was His custom so to do. Perhaps the early morning prayer of our text preceded the Sermon on the Mount. I am not quite sure about that fact, though certain of the writers of Harmonies are assured of it; but I am quite certain that this special supplication followed an evening of miracles; and it seems to teach us that when God is with us, we should have more anxiety than ever to keep Him with us.

Now, we shall look at four points of our Saviour's character as we see them in these few verses. Let us hear the melody of four of those golden bells which adorn the garments of our great High Priest. First, we are caused to observe—Prayer by Him intensely esteemed; secondly, popularity weighed in the balances and lightly valued; thirdly, practical duty followed out, for when they said, "All men seek for thee," He said to them, "Let us go into the next towns that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth." The fourth point is well worthy of attention. Here it is, preaching always to the forefront with Him. Whatever He does not do, He does preach; and, though He works miracles such as casting out devils, He evidently regards all bodily cures as subsidiary to His main work. "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth." We shall put the four things altogether, and see how the prayer and the preaching hang upon one another, and how the despising of popularity is fitly conjoined with the intense purpose to carry out His life-work.

I. First, then, let us think a little about our Lord in with the Father: prayer—how intensely it was esteemed by Him! He rose up that week-day morning early, and retired to a solitary place to pray, to teach us not to keep our religiousness for Sabbath days, or retain our prayerfulness for one day of the week. Many Jews in Christ's day said, "We have been to synagogue;" and when going to synagogue was over their religion was over too. At this day we are surrounded by persons whose godliness is circumscribed within the four walls of their synagogue, their church, their tabernacle, or whatever else they like to call it. Religion means to many the observance of certain ceremonials at stated times. They put on different clothes, and tread another floor, and then their religion begins. Do they put on different garments on the Sabbath because they are different men, or because they wish to be thought so? There is such a thing as a Sunday religion, and he that has it will be lost. The religion which only lives in our religious assemblies, how can it serve our turn? Shall we be in the meetings all the week? Shall we die in the place of worship? In all probability we shall die in our beds at home, and therefore we need a household godliness. Prayer on Sunday is well enough, but better far is the supplication which continually waits upon God. Our Master gives us a good example here. It was not upon the Sabbath morning that He woke so early; it was on the first day of the week, not yet rendered sacred by His resurrection, that our Lord quitted His couch, and wended His way through the shadows to find a place for fellowship with the Father.

You observe that in His prayer He desired very much to be alone; He was anxious that His prayer might not be seen of men. Woe unto that man whose devotion is observed by everybody, and who never offers a secret supplication. Secret prayer is the soul of prayer, the seal of prayer, the strength of prayer. If you do not pray alone, you do not pray at all. I care not whether you pray in the street, or in the church, or in the barrack-room, or in the cathedral; but your heart must speak with God in secret, or you have not prayed. "Thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." The less prayer is observed on earth, the more it is observed in heaven. That which is carefully concealed from men is seen of the Father.

I suppose, too, that our Lord loved to be alone that He might pray aloud. It is not necessary to pray with the voice; it is sometimes highly undesirable that you should pray aloud; but yet, as a rule, you will find it greatly advantageous to yourself to use your voice as well as your mind in prayer. I speak what I have often proved. I am accustomed to pray without uttering a single sound; but I find a relief and a stimulus in occasionally "crying aloud." In a lone spot where I shall not be heard, I find it an intense delight to pour out my heart aloud, using words and exclamations whereby the spirit expresses itself with freedom and force. I think that the Saviour, who was intensely human, felt much rest in the unrestrained pouring out of His heart and soul before His Father. I commend to you who would attain to high communion with the Eternal that, as often as you can, you get so far afield as to be able to pray aloud, and use the unrestrained voice in prayer. It is not essential; but it is often helpful.

Certainly, our Lord Jesus Christ rose up early and went alone in the dark to pray, because He loved to put prayer first of all. He would go nowhere till He had prayed. He would attempt nothing till He had prayed. He would not cast out a devil, He would not preach a sermon, He would work no cure, however necessary, however profitable, until first of all He had drawn near to God. Take thou good heed unto thyself, my brother, that thou follow the same rule.

DAMNABLE PERFECTION.

One said to me the other day what I have sometimes read, but I was especially shocked to hear it; she said, "I am so conformed to the mind and will of God that I do not need to pray." I answered in sad surprise, "I pray God open your eyes to see the delusion under which you are laboring, for the holy Lord Jesus Christ abounded in prayer notwithstanding His absolute perfection." That kind of perfection which leads a man to think that he does not need to pray is damnable. I will use no calmer word. I believe that the doctrine of perfection, as it is frequently taught in these fanatical days, will be the ruin of many a soul that holds it. Could you cease to pray you would cease to live spiritually. It is the very breath of your nostrils if you be a child of God; as to your being so perfect as to need no more prayer and watchfulness, you lie unto your own soul, as surely as you live. Instead of believing in your perfection, I pray God deliver you from so terrible a delusion. If you were perfect you would still need to pray. Nay, you would pray more than ever, and your life, like that of Jesus, would be steeped and saturated in prayer. Our Lord, because He was perfect, longed perpetually to draw nigh unto God.

"Oh," says one, "I live in the spirit of prayer, and therefore I do not need times and seasons for prayer." And do you think that Christ did not live in the spirit of prayer? Yet He must needs have His to pray. Do not fall under the injurious notion, that because your spirit cries to God in prayer all day long, therefore there must not be some season for more immediately coming into God's presence; if you do thus imagine, I am afraid that it will prove a snare to your feet. We had better preserve the very bones of prayer, the posture, time, and place, rather than let it all ooze away into an impalpable mental condition. God keep us prayerful. He will do so if He makes us like His dear Son.

"Oh," say you, "but my prayers are so often disturbed!" I know it. The devil is sure to send somebody to knock at the door when you want to be quiet in prayer. Your Lord can sympathize with you in that, for Simon and they that were with him followed after Him, and disturbed the solitude which He had sought with so much care. Simon was always to the front, and sometimes mischievously so; and here he is leading the way in disturbing his Master; do not wonder if Satan finds a Simon to worry you. But as your Lord knows what it is to be disturbed, He can help you to bear up under disturbances, He can cheer you when these interruptions distress you, and He can aid you to renew your pleadings when the chain of your prayer has been broken.

I regret that I can say no more on that point, because my time has fled.

II. Only just a word or two, in the second place, upon by the Saviour.

POPULARITY PROPERLY WEIGHED

The disturbance that came to the Saviour's prayer arose out of the desire of His disciples to tell Him that everybody was after Him; and, according to Luke's account in his fourth chapter, the people of the town were close on the heels of the disciples, to pray Him not to go away, but to stop and be their Prophet, and heal their sick.

Our Lord's popularity was of the best kind: it had not been gained by any arts or tricks, nor by pandering to their pride, nor by yielding to their prejudices. He had preached nothing but the truth, and He had wrought no miracle among them for the mere sake of display, but only for their good. Yet He did not care for the best of popularity. He did not think it worth the having for its own sake, and therefore He shunned it to the utmost. His popularity could be used, and He did use it; for when the people came together He preached the Gospel to them; but applause had no charms for Him. He knew what poor stuff it is—of what gas it is made. He knew how uncertain it is—how like the wind it will veer round in no time. He knew that it might prove dangerous; and it did prove dangerous, for they sought by and by to make Him a king.

Even His disciples would, if they could, have turned Him from His spiritual purpose. Poor hearts! They wished to see Him honored, but they did not know that honor from men would have brought no honor to Him. When they told our Lord, "All men seek for thee," He did not take notice of it; but proposed to go elsewhere and preach the Gospel. O dear friends, if ever you succeed in Christ's kingdom, bless God for your spiritual success, but do not think much of the approbation which follows upon it. I have seen men whom God has greatly blessed, who have been highly honored by their brethren, and yet they have been cast down, and have therefore been made to lie low in their own esteem. On the other hand, I have observed others whose usefulness in the Church has not appeared to anybody but themselves, and yet they have been so tall that they almost needed St. Paul's Cathedral to stand upright in; their self-esteem has been ten times taller than the esteem of their wiser brethren.

Let us prefer to be found among the useful and lowly rather than among the self-conceited and useless. God will not greatly bless us if we grow great. We may soon become too big to be used to win souls.

A LADY'S PRAYERS.

Though not in the Saviour's case, yet in ours, there is a close connection between our prayers and our being kept humble before the Lord. It is remarkable how kindly our neighbors watch over our vineyards in that respect. They are all in a fraternal flutter for fear we should grow vain; it is very good of them, but we do not wish them to rob themselves for our advantage. "Ah, sir," said a good lady to me one day, "I pray for you every day that you may be kept humble!" She was a wonderfully fine-looking woman, and splendidly dressed, and therefore I replied, "Thank you much; but you remind me of a failure in my duty. I have never prayed for you that you might be kept humble." "Dear sir," she cried, "there is no need for such prayers, for I am not tempted to be proud." How proud she was to have attained to such a delusion! When anybody says, "I am not tempted to be proud," shrewd common-sense suggests that it is time to make up, lest the enemy get a fatal advantage over the vain spirit. When there is much prayer, abundant prayer, and drawing near to God, then the greatest success can be borne without risk. Prayer ballasts the ship, and so when God fills the sails with a prosperous wind the vessel is not overborne.

III. Notice, thirdly, how our Lord put aside all the dangers of popularity by setting before us followed out. They said, "All men seek for thee." I think that most of us would have replied, "Well, then, let us go down and talk to them." But Jesus cries, "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also." Instead of desiring honor, He shuns it; yea, He leaves no space for it, for He occupies each hour with a new labor. He will break up new soil: old harvests only serve to fill the basket for new seed-sowings. He will go to encounter other trials as soon as the first are overcome. When He enters a place for the first time, there is opposition, and Jesus is eager to face it. For Him there remained no love of ease, no resting upon laurels already won. His nobly impatient spirit cries, "We have done something for Capernaum; let us seek fresh fields and pastures new."

He will also enlist assistance, and rouse others to share in the Holy War. How condescendingly the Master puts it! He says, "Let us go." "O divine Master, all men seek for Thee." And the answer is, "Let us go into the next towns." He lifted His poor disciples into the us with Himself. Because they are through the rest of life to be associated with Him in His holy work, He takes care that in the first flush of His success they shall be brought to the front in connection with Himself. They will feel how unworthy they are to be in such high fellowship; they will admire His condescension in putting them there; and they will be the more ready to go on with Him, taking their full part in evangelizing the other villages and towns.

Our Lord is thinking of the whole business; it is all before His mind's eye, what He is to do personally, and what He is to do through each one of them. His purblind disciples cry, "All men seek thee; stay in Capernaum;" but He thinks of the myriads who do not seek Him, but need Him more than those who do. Let His zeal for the unseeking multitudes inflame our hearts, and let us in enthusiastic chorus sing concerning the lost sheep:

"O come, let us go and find them!
In the paths of death they roam;
At the close of the day 'twill be sweet to say,
'I have brought some lost one home.'"

Jesus seemed to say, "Come you with me, and I will lead the way, for therefore am I sent, that all over Galilee and Judea I may wander after wandering souls, and give them health of body and salvation of spirit." You know what the general said when one of his officers rode up and cried, "Sir, we have taken a standard." "Take another," cried he. Another officer salutes him, and exclaims, "Sir, we have taken two guns." "Take two more," was the sole reply. This way lies the reward of holy service: you have done much, you shall do more. Have you won a soul? Win another. Did you bring fifty to Christ? Bring fifty more. If you have been faithful in little, you shall be intrusted with much. What is all we have accomplished compared with the necessities of this immeasurable city, compared with the needs of our nation, compared with the desolated condition of the world? Brethren, in the hour of success resolve on wider labor. Go forward. Press on. Go to other cities. Attempt other methods of service; for therefore came you forth from God.

IV. Now I must close—compelled to do so by the incessant ticking of the clock—when I have noticed how the Lord Jesus Christ in all things makes us see for He says, "Let us go into the next towns, that I may preach there also; for therefore came I forth." It is refreshing to hear preaching spoken of without a sneer. "The Pulpit is a worn-out piece of furniture," so they say. Printers have quite annihilated preachers; the few of us who survive may as well go home to our beds. Well, I am not going to speak of any excellence in preachers, or stand up for my brethren as though we were the wisest of all men. Suppose I confess that we are a set of fools? This is nothing remarkable; we always have been so. But it remains still written in Scripture, "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Such is our folly that we are fools enough to go on preaching after our critics have decided that we belong to the dead past. Notwithstanding all that the wise men tell us about our day being over, we shall keep to our marching orders, "Go ye into all the world, and preach!" We are glad that the people should read, and much of what they read which is best worth reading was first heard from the pulpit. We know of no rivalry between the Word printed and the Word preached; it is often the self-same thing. But I reckon that the most of you who have been converted to God will say that it was not what you read, but what you heard which was used of the Holy Ghost for your conversion. When heart speaks to heart with accents of emotion, it is somehow different from the paper. Some brethren read their sermons, and I do not condemn them, but I know that the most of people feel a kind of chill creeping over them as they hear the leaves rustle. It may be a prejudice, but I know that nine out of ten are numbed by the foolscap and the reading; I confess I feel the influence myself; a read sermon usually freezes me to the marrow, or else makes me fidget upon my seat.

I leave that point, because I want to say this much more; it is the praying man that is the right preaching man, and if any of you long to do good to your fellow-men, you must begin on your knees. You cannot have power with man for God until first you have power with God for man. Solitary prayer was the equipment for the Prince of preachers when He came forth among the crowds; it is the best equipment for you also. In solitary vigil buckle on the armor of light.

THE PRAYERLESS.

As for you here present who never pray, what will become of you? As for you who, instead of preaching, do not care to hear preaching, what can become of you? If the Lord Jesus Christ went out to pray so early in the morning, do you know what He was praying for? Why, for the salvation of sinners like you, that you might be saved. His cries and tears were for those who neither plead nor weep for themselves. When Jesus stood up to preach, what had He on His mind but the salvation of sinners like you? Shall He think of you, and will you not think of Him? Oh, look to Him! See how He loves sinners! Now that He has been dead and buried, and has risen again, and gone into His glory, He still lives to save sinners! Look to Him! Trust Him! To-night, seek Him in solitary prayer, and He will meet with you. To-morrow morning rise up early, "a great while before day," if you have no other means of being alone, and cry to Him for mercy, and He will set heaven's gate open before you, and answer you even as His Father answered Him.

The Lord bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it; and for its weekly circulation of more than 250,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

THE extraordinary man whose portrait appears on page 220, is at the present time the most prominent personage in the world. By his personal prestige alone he has succeeded in precipitating a sanguinary war and disturbing the political status of the strongest ministry of the greatest power in Europe. As we recently gave a sketch of the Mahdi's life and career, we need do no more now than reproduce the barest outline.

He was born, according to some authorities, at Dongola, and according to others on an island called Aba, about 150 miles above Khartoum, on the White Nile. By some accounts he is said to have wrought at the trade of a carpenter, but subsequently became a dervish, and led a life of seclusion and poverty.

About fifteen months ago a new century began according to the Mohammedan Calendar. It was just at this time that the Soudan prophet emerged from his seclusion, and proclaimed himself as the expected Mahdi. Before this he had only pretended to be a holy man. Now, however, that he gave utterance to the most lofty pretensions, his followers increased largely, and he was universally HAILED AS THE COMING MAN.

His military successes at Gadir, over Yussif Pasha, and the conquest of Obeid established his fame, while his victory over Hicks Pasha's army of 10,000 men last November seemed to justify the foremost of his assumed attributes—namely, that of a great and resistless conqueror. But whether the defeat of his trusty lieutenant, Osman Digna, on February 29th, will have the effect of presenting his pretensions in another light to his devotees and adherents, events only can determine. The Imam Mahdi is expected by Mohammedans to be a "guide," or "director," or "precursor" of the Day of Judgment. A Mahommedan prophecy predicted that great portents of heaven and earth would appear with him. His followers prove their devotion to his cause by fighting like tigers on his behalf.

MR. WINSLOW'S MALICE.

"You are a horrid mean thing; but I'll get even with you." The words floated from a nicely trimmed lawn where some children had been at play, but where two of them were now quarrelling, through an open French window. Near the window a stately old lady past three-score and ten sat fanning herself and looking dreamily out. Half an hour later rain was falling, and four children, driven in from their play, were clustered around the old lady's chair begging for a story from grandmamma.

"A fairy tale, grandma," said the youngest.

"If there really were good and wicked fairies, as some people believe," began the old lady, "you might have thought that a very wicked fairy, indeed, controlled a gentleman I knew well once. He was a very hard vindictive man. We lived near his grounds—your grandpapa and I—when we were first married. Grandma's hair was not white then as it is now, and your grandpapa, whom you never saw, was a tall, straight young man, with hair as black as jet. He had been very intimate with Mr. Winslow—the hard cruel man I spoke of—once. They had been almost like brothers, and it was at Mr. Winslow's desire that your grandpa built his house so near to him. Mr. Winslow could not do enough to show his regard and friendship. He had a road cut through his woods to the high road from our house, so that your grandpapa might save an hour in getting to the city, and he was always inviting us to go to his house. But after a time he grew very rich; a large estate was left to him and a great number of houses, and after that he seemed to grow more miserly and more grasping, and we heard of many cruel things he did to increase his rents. He had only one son, Herbert, whom he loved very dearly.

"One day a poor widow came to our house and begged so hard that my husband would go to the great house and plead with Mr. Winslow to give her a little time to pay her rent. It was past due, and Mr. Winslow was going to sell her furniture. She was a very good old woman, and your grandpapa promised he would go, and he put on his hat and walked up there right away.

"What happened at that interview I never knew; but when Reginald (that was your grandpapa, my dears) came back he was very pale and sad. He said we must do all we could for the poor widow, for Mr. Winslow was resolved to turn her out. So we made room for her in our house until a little frame house was put up for her on our land. We never went any more to the great house, and Mr. Winslow never came to see us. Once when we met him driving I was surprised to see that he looked at us so wrathfully and with such hatred as I never saw on any human face before or since. Your grandpapa told me then that Mr. Winslow could not forgive us for taking compassion on the widow, and that he had stormed and sworn at him, when he, as a Christian man, had warned him that in oppressing the widow he was sinning against God. Mr. Winslow took an oath that your grandpapa should repent 'insulting' him, as he called it.

"I noticed, too, that Reginald no longer drove through Mr. Winslow's woods, but always took the long way when he went to the city. One day when I was in that direction I saw why he did so. The road was fenced across now, and a deep ditch was cut in front of the fence. That was a dreadful thing, for if your grandpapa had attempted to drive that way in the dark, not knowing of the change, he might have been killed. But that was Mr. Winslow's way of 'getting even with him,' as boys and girls say, and it seemed as if he would like something very dreadful to happen to his former friend.

"Things went on so for some weeks, and we saw nothing at all of Mr. Winslow, but we heard of him and that he had said some very malicious things about us. One night your grandpapa and I were walking home from a visit to a neighbor's, when a buggy passed us very fast. It was too dark to see who was in the buggy, but we hurried home thinking it might be some friend to see us. When we arrived we learned that Mr. Winslow's son Herbert had called. He was returning from college, where he had been nearly a year, and being intimate with my husband he called on him on his way home. Evidently his father had not written to him about the quarrel. In an instant we thought of the fence and the ditch.

"Your grandpapa ran as fast as he could go after the buggy, and told me to send one or two of the farm hands after him. He was too late to save the young man. In about an hour I heard them coming back, walking heavily. They were carrying the insensible form of Herbert Winslow, terribly bruised and crushed. We laid him on the bed, and sent one man for the doctor and another for Mr. Winslow. The doctor came and bound up the poor crushed form. One arm, the right, was broken, and there was a great gash on the head where the horse had kicked. Mr. Winslow was away from home, so we sent a man after him, but it was not until the next day that he came riding into the yard on horseback, the horse covered with foam, and Mr. Winslow looking pale and ghastly. Herbert's favorite servant was watching by him when the father entered his son's room, and after a time we went in too.

"I shall never forget that scene. Your grandpapa laid one hand on the afflicted man's shoulder, and extending the other, said, 'Winslow, my friend, my heart bleeds for you. May God comfort you in your sorrow.' Mr. Winslow still retained his son's hand in his, but he turned as Reginald spoke to him, and such a face of grief and woe I never saw. He could not speak then, but he turned again to his boy, and falling on his knees by the bed he moaned, 'God forgive me, the stone that I rolled has fallen upon me.' (Prov. 26 : 27.)

"That night Herbert Winslow died. His father was almost mad with remorse and grief. He called himself a murderer, and begged your grandpapa to pray for him. He never held up his head after that terrible night, but went about a heartbroken man. Now when I hear little lips say, 'I will get even with you,' I shudder at the memory of that man and that scene fifty years ago, and I wish every one knew of what came of trying to injure another."

MAP OF EGYPT AND THE SOUDAN.

The accompanying map will assist readers in understanding the operations and positions of the contending forces in Africa. Suakim, as will be noticed, is on the western shore of the Red Sea. A picture of that place appeared in The Christian Herald of March 13th. It forms the convenient base for the British movements, as it is accessible by water. How very small a strip of land they have been able to occupy, will be seen by the position of Tokar on the south of Suakim. It will be remembered that Tokar was besieged by the Mahdi's troops, and it was in marching to its relief that Baker Pacha met with his severe repulse. He and the remnant of his army fled to Trinnitat, marked on the map a little below Suakim on the shore of the Red Sea. The Governor of Tokar, who was in sympathy with the Mahdi, surrendered the place to him, but the British recaptured it on March 1st.

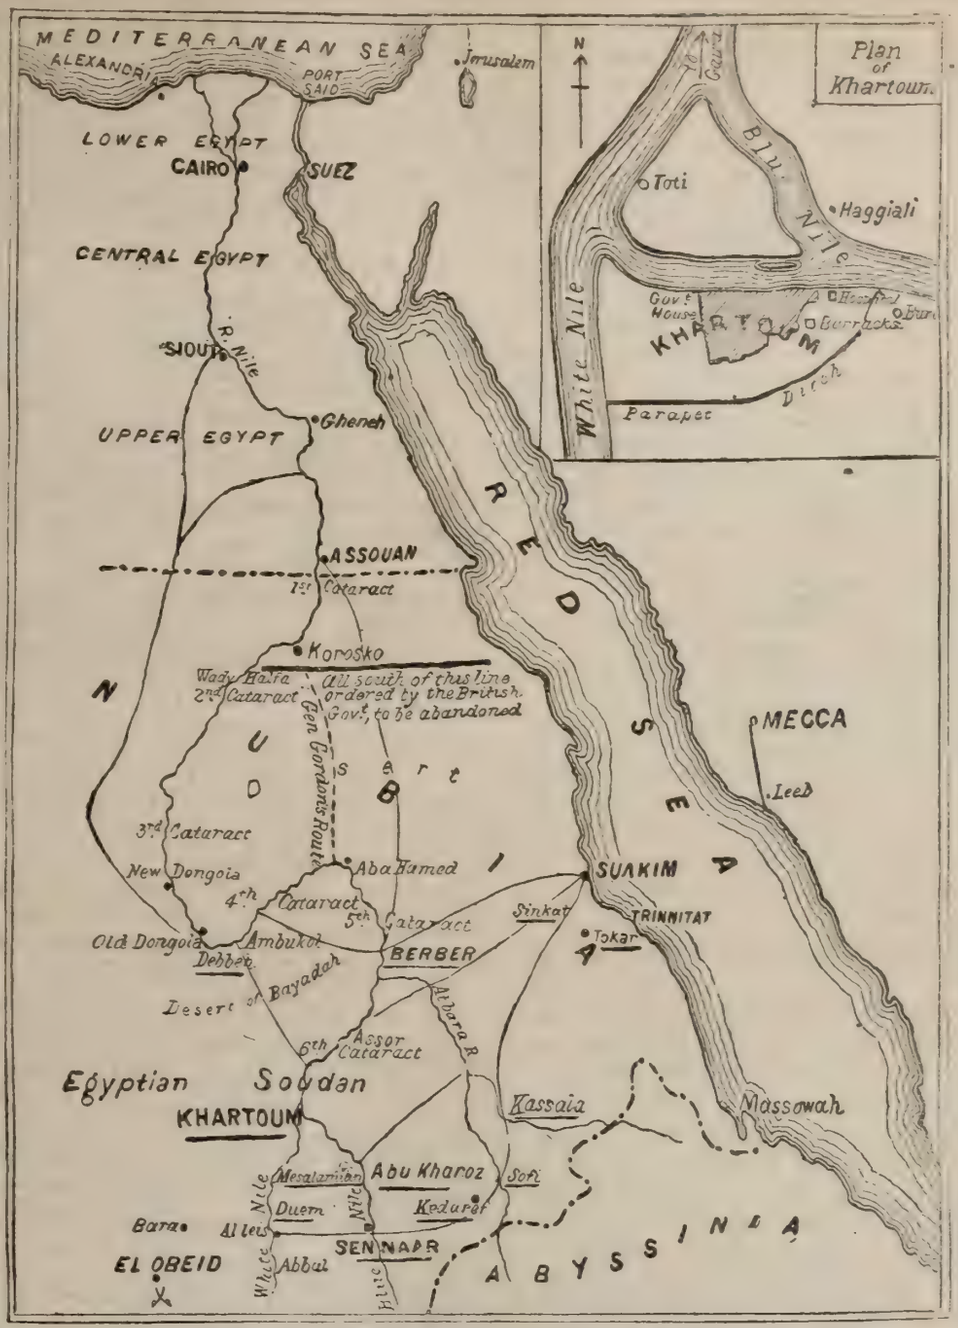
Further to the west is Berber, the principal place on the route to the capital, and a city of some importance. General Graham's endeavor to open the road to Berber has now been abandoned. The march of the British troops in that direction on March 24th proved how perilous would be the effort to reach Berber. The weather was so intensely hot that one quarter of the force lay down unable to proceed, and a large number representing another fourth of the men dropped to the rear and straggled along without their guns. It was evident that if on that day Osman Digma had attacked them they would have been unable to fight, and another massacre like that which befell General Hicks would have occurred. On March 26th the heat moderated a little, and the force reached the wells of Tamanieb, where the men and horses slaked their thirst. A brush with the enemy occurred which the despatches magnify into a battle, but was probably only a conflict with the small force left by Osman Digma to guard the wells. Afterward the British burned two villages and returned to the vicinity of Suakim.



Map of the Soudan and Plan of its Capital, Khartoum.

On the south-west of Berber is Khartoum, the capital of the Soudan, and an enlarged plan at the top of the map shows its situation and defences. There General Gordon now is. He is so completely cut off from communication by telegraph or messenger that it is difficult to form anything like a reliable idea of his position. It is known that he is hemmed in by the Mahdi's troops and that he must, consequently, be in considerable peril; but that he is still alive and is apparently able to hold together some supporters proves that his moral influence is not wholly extinct. It cannot, however, be so powerful as he expected nor as the British Government hoped, as the Mahdi appears to still retain his hold on the allegiance of the people, and Osman Digma, his lieutenant, still has a considerable following.

The British Government is daily assailed by its political opponents for its determination to abandon that portion of the Soudan south of the line marked on the map. It may be hoped, however, that they will not yield. A task of such magnitude as that of subduing that vast tract of country and holding it by force might be left to Egypt, and if Egypt is too weak and too supine to do it, then she deserves to lose her territory. It is not for England to spend blood and treasure in conquering a country which would revolt as soon as the Europeans leave. The best that can be expected is that General Gordon may ascertain the wishes of the people as to the government, and make such rarangements as will be best in the interests of the people.

A SERIAL STORY.

Summary of the Story.

JOHN MORLEY, a studious bookseller, a widower with one child, Hester, becomes attached to a lady much younger than himself, a teacher in a school. He asks her to become his wife, and she, being weary of her scholastic duties, consents. Being introduced to Hester as the child's second mother, Hester promises solemnly to love and honor her as long as she lives. Mr. Morley being a deacon in a church, his pastor, Mr. Watson, and his fellow-deacon, an aristocrat, Mr. Waldron, warn him against marrying an unconverted lady. After the marriage the young wife is disappointed in her lot. Her husband spends his days in reading, and does not give her the gay pleasures she expected. He too is disappointed and troubled at the thought that one so near him is in danger of perishing eternally. He prays for her and endeavors to enlist the efforts of others in her conversion. But she continues dull and dispirited, and does not respond to the injudicious methods Miss Waldron takes to lead her to religion. Finally a brother of Miss Waldron returns to his home, and he, having been acquainted with Rose before her marriage, renews the intimacy. Rose leaves home ostensibly on a visit to a relative. That night Hester on going to bed finds a letter from her step-mother on her pillow, which she takes to her father, who is talking with Mr. Waldron. John Morley, on reading the letter, falls down in a swoon, and Mr. Waldron reads it. From this point the story proceeds.

The Confession.

THIS was the letter Mr. Waldron read:

"I am the most wicked and shameful woman you ever knew. Oh, why was I born so wicked?

"How good you were to me the other day! You suffered me to kneel at your feet, and kiss your hand—only you did not know how wicked I was: and all the day long, while I sat looking at you, you never lifted up your head without a kind word and a smile for me; your head which is going gray, and which ought to be held in honor by everybody about you. Oh, why did you not choose a wife who could not have been so wicked as to bring dishonor upon you? You are so good and wise—only not wise in loving a shameful thing like me. It is all like a dream—a very horrible and dreadful dream—from which I can never awake, and find that it is only a wicked dream. If I could only be what I was when you married me! If I could only be what I was three months ago! If I could only have seen beforehand how I was being led on—how we were both being led on by Satan—oh, I should have turned back quickly, and found a shelter by your side. But it is too late now—forever!

"I have gathered up everything which could remind you of me, and if I could I would have destroyed that room, which was mine, and which must remain under your roof. I did ask God if He could not destroy it, as He destroyed Sodom and Gomorrha. But even God cannot separate good from evil—even He cannot punish me and spare you.

"I do not go away to be happy. I go away because to stay longer in your home is to be guilty of a greater wrong against you. Robert takes me away with no thought of being happier, but because he can do nothing else. Oh, I pity you; I am angry for you; I could smite myself to death, if that would do you good. But after death is the judgment, and I am afraid of the judgment.

"Oh, why did you marry me? Hester told me once how his father, Robert's father, came to you, and exhorted you not to marry a godless woman. Yet you did. There was nothing in common between us. You took me out of the old, merry, careless life, and brought me into a new one, one where I could scarcely breathe,

It was all gloom, and darkness, and silence to me, till Robert came. And then there was a light which dazzled me, and I saw nothing. And now there is complete darkness, that utter darkness into which the outcasts are driven. O God!"

"O God!" echoed Mr. Waldron, with a groan. There was no other word added to Rose Morley's letter, and no other cry was uttered by the lips of the man who read it. He laid it down, and tried to think; but his usually clear brain was in a maze, and his confused thoughts resolved themselves again into the same simple, deep, unfathomable cry, which left everything to be divined by the heavenly Helper; and once more his quivering lips breathed, "O my God!"

"What is the matter?" asked a voice beside him, and turning his gaze away from the letter in his hand, he saw Hester at his elbow, straining her eyes to read her stepmother's writing. Lawson was looking on with a wild, half-crazy expression, and he too came forward as Mr. Waldron remained silent and stupefied.

"What is the matter with my master?" he asked.

Before Mr. Waldron could frame any reply, John Morley gave the first token of returning life by heaving a profound sigh. Hester was upon her knees beside him again in a moment, pressing her small cold hands upon his burning forehead, and speaking to him in quiet tones. He lay still for a few moments, but after a while he pushed her on one side, and staggered to his feet. He confronted Mr. Waldron; and the two men looked speechlessly into one another's eyes, having no need of words. The crushed and torn letter lay upon the table in the full light of the lamp. Neither of them looked at it, though both saw it, and both, in their fevered brains, were repeating the words written in it. Mr. Waldron at last tried to speak, but twice his voice failed him; until by a great effort he cried, while still gazing into John Morley's face, "He is my only son."

"Leave me," exclaimed John Morley, awakening to the full shame and grief that had befallen him; "let me be alone! Why do you all stand staring upon me? Leave me to myself, I say."

"No, brother, no," answered Mr. Waldron, his voice broken by sobs; "God is our only refuge till this calamity be overpast. Let us pray together, brother."

He knelt down, and Hester knelt also. But Lawson remained standing near the table, where the letter lay open before him. John Morley himself had fallen back into his chair, in a maze of anguish and dishonor. He could not pray yet. In the whole universe there was no one but himself and the wife who had proved unfaithful to him. If there was a faint thought of God lingering somewhere in the dark cells of memory, it was only of a Being, who either saw all these crimes without having the power to prevent them, or who was so far removed in a serene blessedness that He could pay no attention to the sorrows of His creatures. He felt as yet no need of prayer. But while he was thus lost in a stupor of despair, a prayer, mingled with sobs and tears, was being offered up for him by Mr. Waldron, who now for the first time realized how very near a brother John Morley was to him. When he had brought his broken supplications to a close, he rose from his knees, and clasped John Morley's hand affectionately and humbly. But "he spoke no word unto him, for he saw that his grief was very great."

A few minutes afterward John Morley was left alone; and Hester was crying herself bitterly to sleep upon the pillow where Rose Morley's letter had lain hidden all day.

In the dead of the night the child's slumbers were suddenly broken by a light falling upon her closed eyelids. She awoke, and opened her eyes upon her father's face bending over her. He had placed his candle upon the chair at the side of the bed, and the light shone full upon him. His eyes were bloodshot and strained, and his face wore a scared and haggard expression, as if he was gazing spell-bound upon some horrible vision. He was grasping in his hand, which was already cut and blood-stained, a sharpened razor, the hard, bright steel of which was gleaming brightly. Never had Hester seen him thus visit her in her sleep before. She sat upon her pillow, and looked earnestly into her father's face, until he seemed troubled, and turned away uneasily from her childish scrutiny.

But he spoke after a little while, in hoarse and tremulous tones:

"Child," he said, "it is sometimes better to die than to live."

"Are you very angry, father?" asked Hester.

He did not answer her, but stood looking down upon her with his bloodshot eyes.

"I don't know what is the matter," she said, lifting up her hand and laying it on his neck, while he bent lower to receive the rare caress; "I don't understand what has happened; I am only a little girl, but I am your own daughter; tell me what is the matter, father."

"She is gone away," he answered, trembling and shivering; "Rose has left me!"

"I know she is gone away," said Hester, drawing down his face to her lips, and kissing it; "but she only went away this morning, and she is coming home again soon."

"No, never!" he cried, falling down on his knees, as if his failing limbs could no longer support him. "I shall never see her again; she will never sleep again under my roof."

As he spoke of it, the extremest tension of his anguish gave way a little. He continued kneeling at Hester's side, repeating dully in a half whisper that Rose would never sleep again under his roof. The moment of temptation, in which it had seemed better to die than to live, was past; and with a man like John Morley could not return. He turned himself, with blind and dumb disgust, toward the life that stretched before him, which he must traverse, bowed beneath his burden of shame. He dreaded to open his eyes or utter a word, lest a full torrent of misery should break over him to overwhelm him at once. The image of Rose was before him, with all the fatal charms that had beguiled him into his second marriage; but behind it there rose a sweet, pensive, saintlike face, which had been fading from his memory, but now came back as if to reproach him. He felt that he ought to hate his second wife the more bitterly, because she had usurped and betrayed the place of Hester's mother.

"Hester," he said, "we must forget that this woman has ever lived with us."

As if he could forget! He laughed harshly after speaking the idle words. Would not the remembrance of her, and the shame which was the only dower she had brought him, be the food of his thoughts night and day? Would he not eat, and sleep, and read, with the remembrance of her infamy always before him? It was a horrible unheard-of thing to happen to him. He had known that such sins were, but only as a thinker and philosopher. He had contemplated them afar off, as one of the many social problems which were altogether apart from himself, and which could never enter the sphere where he dwelt. It was a loathsome leprosy, to be looked at from a distance; but it had never entered his heart to conceive of the tainted hand touching his, or the foul lips breathing the atmosphere of his own home. He felt himself caught in the infected meshes. He abhorred himself and his dwelling; that dwelling from which Hester's mother had passed peacefully away into her hallowed rest. This woman had dragged him down with her own fall; for he had made her "bone of his bone, and flesh of his flesh."

He put away, but gently and reverently, Hester's arm, which still lay upon his neck, and he turned aside his face from her kisses. He identified himself so fully with the woman who had dishonored him, that it seemed to him sacrilege to suffer the innocent young lips of his little daughter to be pressed to his. The paroxysm of passion in which he had sought her room, resolved that neither of them should outlive the first night of his shame, was past forever; but none the less was his heart crushed down and hardened.

A barrier seemed raised between him and his child. He had done her an irreparable wrong in putting into her mother's place a stranger, who had brought an ineffaceable stigma upon them both. For, in the time to come, he could foresee it clearly, the world would not be too careful to remember that it was not her own mother who had fallen into the slough. The sting of that thought pierced him yet more poignantly than any other. Hester's mother would be dragged down from her fair and holy place in the heavens, and be confounded with this lost, false creature, who had sunk so low into the abyss that even he, forced to gaze down into it, could not fathom all the degradation and vileness of it. Hester was looking at him with the clear, pure, sweet eyes of her mother, and he could not endure to meet them. He took up the light abruptly, and left her to weep and sob in the darkness.

For a whole week the house of John Morley was closed as if it had been the house of the dead. People who went by, and saw the shutters all up, and the light excluded, made haste to repeat to one another every detail which the town's gossip could supply. The servant of the desolated household had a few choice particulars to add to the common stock. John Morley had shut himself up in his office, and refused to see any one, even Hester herself. But, at night, when he supposed everybody else to be wrapped in sleep, he roamed to and fro restlessly in the house. It may be he sought then to discover if any trace was remaining of the residence of Rose in his home; but, if so, he found none. The only memorial of her presence there was the closed door of the room, the key of which she had carried off with her, and which he could only enter by a force and violence from which he recoiled.

But that course of life could not continue. John Morley had to return to his daily duties as all have to do, no matter how bitter the sorrow that interrupted them.

When John Morley returned to his ordinary life, there were some marked changes in him. Not only his face bore the scars of a mortal conflict, but his daily conduct still more plainly testified to the hard gripe of shame upon him. He withdrew peremptorily from every office in the church which brought him into prominence; and would occupy no position in it, except that of the humblest member. He declined to give his counsel, as in former times, to the numerous clients who had found it less costly and less formidable to turn into John Morley's shop than to seek the doctor or the lawyer. He ceased to care for his business, was apathetic and forgetful. The gravity which had characterized him was become an unbroken and joyless gloom, which took sorrow to its heart, and prostrated itself before despair.

On his part, Mr. Waldron also had suffered a severe shock; but the sin of a son is not equal to the dishonor of a wife. Religious as he undoubtedly was, a righteous man who strove to judge righteously, the world's estimate of his son's conduct could not fail to influence him, and to appease in some measure his anger and sorrow. The world easily forgives the male sinner in such affairs; for the woman it has neither pity nor forgiveness—nothing but scorn. Robert might at any time repent, shake off his sin, and come back to social life, to be welcomed there without reference to his "youthful indiscretion." He might enter upon a public career as useful and more brilliant than his father's, and not a voice would be lifted against him. Mr. Waldron mourned over his son, but there was no bottomless depth of anguish in his soul. He could gaze down into the gulf into which he had fallen, and see there a path, toilsome it might be, by which he could climb up again into reputation and honor.

Miss Waldron, who, like others of her class, thought that every good and evil thing that happened in her immediate circle had been sent for her benefit, looked upon her brother's sin as a cross expressly constructed for herself, and weighing more heavily upon her than upon any one else. She grew a hundredfold more severe in her Bible classes and mothers' meetings; and expatiated with extreme unction upon the judgments of heaven. A great work began in her classes; and she said that her brother's fall had been the conversion of many souls.

Miss Waldron took a profound interest in John Morley and Hester. She felt it almost as a personal insult that the dishonored husband would not suffer her to probe his deep wound. It was a symptom over which she shook her head ominously. But Hester was easily reached. She even carried her down to Aston Court one day, when she met her going out for a walk, that she might have a long uninterrupted opportunity with her, and make such an impression upon her tender mind as time would not be able to efface. She set Hester on a high, straight-backed chair, opposite to the portrait of Luther, and addressed her in deep and awful tones:

"You have lost your step-mother," she began.

"Oh," interrupted the child eagerly, "tell me what has become of her, and what she has done. Nobody will speak about her to me, and they say I must never, never mention her name again."

"She has done," said Miss Waldron, in a tone of concentrated bitterness, "the greatest, vilest, foulest sin a woman can commit. She will never come back, and if she did, none of us ought to look at her or speak to her. In olden times she would have been stoned to death; yes, stoned to death; and you and your father would have been the first to cast a stone at her."

"No, no," cried Hester, bursting into tears; "I know now what you mean. She is like that poor woman who was very wicked, and they brought her to Jesus; and He said, 'Let him that is without sin among you first cast a stone at her.' And not one of them could cast a stone at her. It would be the same now if she was here and Jesus Christ. There would be nobody that would dare cast a stone at her; not even you, Miss Waldron. And now, if you please, I should like to go home."

Hester did not linger for permission, but walked straight out through the glass doors, and along the terrace, and up the park, her heart swelling with childish grief and indignation.

PAUL AT EPHESUS.

S. S. Lesson for April 13, Acts 19: 8-22. Golden Text, verse 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Paul's Inspired Preaching—His Blameless Life—Failure in the Synagogues—Removal to the Porch—Preaching Accompanied by Healing—Spirituality Hindered by Suffering—Counterfeit Healers—Sent by Satan—Seekers for Notoriety—Their Discomforture—Loss to Satan—The Purging of the Church—Led by the Spirit.

For three months Paul's testimony concerning Christ was tolerated in the synagogue at Ephesus. He was, as usual, working for his living. Speaking afterward to the Ephesian elders gathered at Miletus, he says: "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel. Yea, ye yourselves know, that these hands have ministered unto my necessities, and to them that were with me" (Acts 20: 33, 34). He lived "holily and justly and unblameably" before them (I Thess. 2: 10), and thus his life was a witness to his doctrine. Boldly and continually he continued "disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God." And such preaching proceeded really not from Paul at all, but from the Spirit of God. It was not a dry logical statement of facts, he had a burning, intense desire for the salvation of souls; his warning of every man "night and day with tears," could not fail to accomplish its purpose. God spoke through His servant. The Spirit of God is a discerning and a dividing Spirit; those in the synagogue who believed could not but be separate from those who believed not. Light and darkness are not to be mistaken; death and life, whether physical or spiritual, are the exact opposite the one to the other. The unbelieving, who remained in darkness and in death, "were hardened," and "spake evil of that way before the multitude." What was to be done? Up to the time when he was in Corinth Paul had allowed himself to be turned out of the synagogue in many places and persecuted, but there for the first time he said distinctly, "From henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles;" and there he continued preaching not in the synagogue, but in the house of Justus. Here in Ephesus he departed from the synagogue, and disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus." Paul had longed to establish Christianity in the synagogues where the Word of God was already known, and where many were already devout worshippers under the law; but God had shown him that he must not sacrifice the truth of God to any form of worship, however pure and even divine its origin may have been. Probably the school of Tyrannus was a lecture-hall of some size, and well known in Ephesus. The influence going out from these daily preachings of Paul must have been very great during the two years they continued, for "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the Word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks."

Paul's preaching was always accompanied with healing, according to the commands of Jesus to His apostles and evangelists when He sent them to preach the kingdom of God and to heal the sick (Luke 9: 1, 2; also Matt. 10: 1, 7, 8; Mark 3: 14, 15; 6: 7-13; Luke 10: 9; Mark 16: 15-18). He says to the Corinthians, "Truly the signs of an apostle were wrought among you in all patience, in signs, and wonders, and mighty deeds" (II Cor. 12: 12). Again to the Romans he writes: "For I will not dare to speak of any things save those which Christ wrought through me, for the obedience of the Gentiles, by word and deed, in the power of signs and wonders, in the power of the Holy Ghost; so that from Jerusalem, and round about even unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ (Rom. 15: 18, 19, Rev. Ver.). Thus Paul was a minister of the compassions of God to soul and body. We have seen this at Iconium, where signs and wonders were done by the hands of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14: 3); again at Lystra (14: 8-10); at Philippi (16: 16-18); and later on in the island of Melita. And it is evident that Paul looked upon this part of his mission as being equally important, whether among the cultured Corinthians or the barbarous people of Melita. At Ephesus special miracles by the hands of Paul: so that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirits went out of them." How many poor sufferers there are incapable almost of taking in a spiritual thought, from the fearful pressure of the pains which absorbs every bit of consciousness. God has compassion, and Jesus has borne these sicknesses that His Word may be fulfilled in healing all who will come to Him (Matt. 8: 16, 17). There are many whose nerves are so taken possession of by the enemy, that every moment of life seems to be a tension too great to bear; everything seems wrong; it appears to them as though God did not keep His promises, as though they trusted Him in vain. Many earnest Christians who have never thus suffered cannot understand the almost utter despair of such a state. It is easy for such as have not thus suffered to preach patience, and say it is the will of God. But our Father has compassion, and sends us a blessed Gospel to reach all our being—spirit, soul, and body (1 Thess. 5: 23). Some will say, "But is not this the gift of healing which Paul was exercising at Ephesus?" Perhaps it was; any way, God, not Paul, wrought the miracles.

There are counterfeit healers as well as counterfeit preachers; there is no power of the Holy Ghost which Satan will not attempt to imitate. When God sent Moses to stand before Pharaoh, he had magicians ready to work the same wonders which Moses did, until the plague was upon the magicians themselves, and they could no longer stand before him (Ex. 9: 11). So that in these days in which we are hearing from Africa, America, Australia, China, India, Japan, Bulgaria, Sweden, Norway, France, Germany, Switzerland, and other countries of the Lord's healing, it is no wonder if Satan sets up some counterfeits. But Satan often defeats himself; and this was the case at Ephesus. "Then certain of the vagabond [or strolling] Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth." Among these were seven men whose parentage ought to have guaranteed something better, for they were sons of one of the chief priests among the Jews. There are some people whose passion in life is to obtain notoriety; and they are not very particular as to what means they use to attain this end. If they see others conspicuous as preachers, as Christian workers, etc., they will, almost unconsciously to themselves, even make use of Christian work to attain their own ends, and to bring themselves into notice. This was the case with these base men, the sons of Sceva. The priesthood was sinking into obscurity; as simple Jewish priests they would be nobodies. Why not take a hint from this Paul? He did not profess to have any personal power, it was the name of Jesus which did the work. Why should not they make use of the charm of this name, and gain as much notoriety as he? They made the attempt; but they had not taken God into their reckoning, nor did they consider how awful was their sin if Jesus was the Christ in attempting to make use of His name

WITHOUT BEING SUBJECT TO HIM.

They dared to use the name of Jesus, but the evil spirit in the man, instead of being subject to them "answered and said, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye? And the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded." Satan cannot cast out Satan. It was a blow to the priesthood, but a glorious triumph for the cause of Christ. We need never fear counterfeits; God will never suffer them to go farther than is needed for the trial of our faith. But God took care that this defeat of the sons of Sceva should be "known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified."

The kingdom of Satan had sustained a heavy loss; deceivers felt that they could no longer be hidden. True believers were brought to full consecration, "many that believed came, and confessed, and showed their deeds." It is a blessed thing when a movement of this kind takes place in a church; when the members feel they cannot longer tolerate unreality and concealment; when all comes to the surface. "Many of them also which used curious arts (witchcraft, spiritualism, etc.) brought their books together, and burned them before all men; and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver. So mightily grew the Word of God and prevailed." This was an open testimony to their complete turning from the past and complete surrender to the Lord Jesus; this was proof of how much they valued Him. But this great success was no reason why Paul should remain at Ephesus; God was really doing the work, Paul was only a willing instrument. Thus he purposed in the Spirit to go through Macedonia and Achaia and then to go to Jerusalem, and later on to Rome. So he sent on as pioneers of his visit to Macedonia his beloved Timothy and Erastus, and himself remained for a short time in Asia.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Interesting and Imposing Ceremony Took place in London on March 25th, when the American flag was run up on the Alert, the ship which the British Government has presented to this country. Mr. James Russell Lowell, the United States Minister, hoisted the American colors at the Alert's peak. Fifty guests lunched on board, among whom were the Earl of Northbrook, First Lord of the Admiralty, and Lord Alcester (Admiral Seymour), one of the Junior Lords of the Admiralty. Conspicuous among the company were many famous for Arctic explorations, as Vice-Admiral Sir Francis McClintock, who accompanied the Sir John Franklin search expedition of 1848 and 1850 and commanded that of 1857; Sir Allen Young, who served under McClintock in the Fox and has made two expeditions since in the Pandora; Sir George Nares, who commanded the Alert on her previous visit to the Arctic regions ten years ago, and Commander Parr, who accompanied the same expedition, and Mr. Leigh Smith, who in the last twelve years has made twelve voyages to the frozen North. Lieutenant Commander Chadwick, the naval attaché of the American Legation, was present; also Lieutenant Commander Goodrich, who will take the Alert to America. Mr. Lowell proposed the toast to the Queen, to which the Earl of Northbrook responded. He said the Queen took deep interest in the expedition in which the Alert was to share, and had felt great pleasure in sanctioning the offer of the Alert to the American Government. A toast was then proposed to the success of the expedition, with which was coupled the health of Lieutenant Goodrich.

The Insults Minister Sargent has Received from the press of Berlin, and the marked coldness displayed toward him by Bismarck and the German Court have rendered his position in that capital uncomfortable. It was evident to the Washington government that the dislike conceived against him personally, by Bismarck and his creatures, interfered with Mr. Sargent's usefulness in the capacity of minister. The President, therefore, fully approving Mr. Sargent's conduct, nominated him successor to the late Mr. Hunt at the Russian Court, and the Senate honored him by confirming the appointment without reference. Mr. Sargent, however, declines the appointment, preferring to resign the Berlin ministry and return home. It is expected that the President will indicate his feeling toward the German Court by refraining for the present from appointing a successor to Mr. Sargent.

Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, the Youngest son of Queen Victoria, died suddenly on March 28th. He was staying at Cannes, in France, for the benefit of his health. A physician who slept in the same room with him heard him breathing stertorously in the night and went to his side. He found the prince was in a fit, and at once summoned assistance. Every effort was made to save his life, but he died in six minutes after his condition was discovered. It is supposed that his death was caused by apoplexy. The deceased prince was in his thirty-first year. He has been subject to epileptic attacks from boyhood. His delicate health preserved him from the temptations to fast life which beset his brothers, and he is generally believed to have been a quiet, studious young man. He was married on April 27th, 1882, and leaves one child. He received an income from the National Treasury of $125,000 a year, beside his salary as a colonel in the army. Mr. Frelinghuysen on Saturday telegraphed to Mr. Lowell at London, desiring him to express the President's sympathy with Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, in the bereavement she has suffered.

Another Victory over Osman Digma was achieved by General Graham on March 27th. The battle was fought near Tamanieb and appears to have been little more than a skirmish. The British troops returned to Suakim after the battle, and the attempt to open the road to Berber was abandoned. It is now stated that owing to the heat the campaign is closed. The accounts of the sufferings undergone by the troops during the march from Suakim to the scene of the battle show that unless England employed Indian troops any further attempt to suppress the Mahdi would involve disaster. Efforts are being made to enlist the assistance of native tribes, and the government of Abyssinia in the work of tranquillizing the Soudan.

Nothing had been Heard from General Gordon at the close of last week. His latest despatch was a request for troops. It was known that he was then shut up in Khartoum, and his application for troops implied that he was in imminent peril. The gravest apprehensions are felt for his safety. On Monday a report was current that General Gordon had made a sortie from Khartoum and had been repulsed. After that he surrendered the city and he and his secretary were thrown into prison. The rumor, though not confirmed, is probably true.

Mr. Gladstone's Determination to Give Irethe same privileges as England and Scotland in the new Franchise Bill is strenuously opposed by the Conservatives, who argue that it will give Mr. Parnell too much power in Parliament. They assert that by lowering the franchise Mr. Parnell's followers will be able to elect his nominees in many places which are now represented by loyal men. Strangely enough Mr. Parnell also opposes the bill. He stated publicly his hope that the House of Lords would reject the bill. The result of this, he said, will be a dissolution of Parliament and an appeal to the country. He declared that the government is dependent, in committee of the whole, upon the Irish vote for a majority. Mr. Parnell expects, under the present franchise, that his party will be able to carry seventy-five seats in Parliament at the next general election. Candidates, he says, will be required to give a pledge that they will sit, act and vote with the Irish party or resign. It is necessary, he believes, to make provision for eligible candidates who are poor. In his opinion $200,000 would be a sufficient fund to cover election expenses and to secure the constant and efficient attendance of the Irish members in Parliament.

The Policy of France in Madagascar was Explained to the French Chambers on March 27th by Premier Ferry. He said: "It is hoped that the negotiations which have been resumed will result in a treaty which shall guarantee the protection of the inhabitants of the northwestern district of Madagascar and of resident Frenchmen, as the acquisition of land by foreigners, except Frenchmen, is inadmissible. To raise the question of sovereignty would involve war to the death with the Hovas, and would necessitate a policy of conquest. It is incumbent upon us to be modest and wise in order to obtain practical results. If, however, the pending negotiations fail we shall spare no effort to reduce the Hovas to submission."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Commenced their meetings on March 25th in a new district of London—that of Hammersmith. Their opening services there were densely crowded. Many persons, responding to an appeal, rose and prayed. The movement is spreading all through London. A monster meeting of converts was held in St. Pancras Hall on the same day, at which Mr. Moody, the Rev. Charles Spurgeon, of Greenwich, and Major Whittle delivered practical exhortations. The hall at St. Pancras was erected immediately opposite a market where the vendors of clothes, boots, provisions, etc., meet to barter on the Sabbath. The site was lent by Mr. J. J. Noble, manager of the Midland Railway Company, who personally assisted in the mission. For several weeks the clergy and ministers in the locality held prayer-meetings, and engaged daily in the distribution of tickets, over which great care was taken. In order that the poorer classes should attend the meetings the gatekeepers were extremely vigilant in preventing those without tickets gaining admission to the hall. A correspondent sent to the London papers an interesting observation. He said: "One of the lessons of an address by Mr. Moody, 'Who is chiefest among you, let him be servant,' seemed to be very practically illustrated, when as we entered the hall three quarters of an hour before the time of service we found two well-known and wealthy merchant princes quietly sweeping the front of the platform. Noticing that sweeping was required, they fetched a broom and dust-pan and did it themselves. So that Christ be glorified and souls be won, such ready servants are willing to do anything, and count nothing too lowly if it be but contributory to the efficiency of the work."

Mr. Spurgeon's Jubilee Year, which is to be celebrated on June 19th, the fiftieth anniversary of his birth, is exciting great interest among his friends at the Tabernacle and elsewhere, but no one seems as yet quite to know what form the celebration will take. As in the instance of the silver wedding, Mr. Spurgeon will refuse to accept anything on his own account, but he is naturally desirous that the sum collected should be as large as possible. The funds will probably be used for several useful enterprises, such as the erection of the new offices in the rear of the chapel, additional endowment for the alms houses, and another meeting-hall at the Stockwell Orphanage.

The Jerusalem Jew, Solomon Shapira, hacommitted suicide. He is the man who recently tried to induce the British Government to purchase a manuscript of portions of the Pentateuch for five million dollars. Shapira shot himself in the head with a revolver at a hotel in Rotterdam. He had not left his room for several days, and on forcing the door the police found his bloody corpse lying upon the bed. Letters were found proving that he was suffering from mental aberration. It was recently disclosed that Shapira had offered the forged manuscript to the German Government before taking it to England.

How much work for Christ has been performed by men who are not clergymen, will never be known until the day when God makes up His jewels. That it has been far greater than is generally believed, is certain. Not only has the Gospel been preached with the blessing of God, by men who have in business and in the professions toiled for their daily bread, giving their labors in the cause of Christ freely, but much of the philanthropic work of the world has been done by them. That work is eminently Christian in motive and impulse. Thousands upon thousands who are now active and useful Christians, would never have become such, if they had remained in the circumstances and with the surroundings of their early years. By removing children from the slums and giving them opportunities to learn, and by surrounding them with Chirstian influences, they have been brought through the work of the Holy Spirit to know the truth which makes them free. On the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week is the portrait of a man whose labors in that sphere have brought his name into prominence. It is noteworthy, incidentally, that he derived much assistance and obtained many suggestions which led to the initiation of his most successful enterprises from his visit to this country in 1862.

Mr. A. O. Charles, the friend of little boys, was born in London, England, on June 12th, 1830, so that he is now nearly fifty-four years of age. His father was a member of the Corporation of the city of London, who when quite a lad went up from his birthplace in Somersetshire "to try his fortune;" and having picked up a knowledge of the trade of a woollen-draper, he established the first business ever opened in London where gentlemen's clothing could be procured ready-made.

Mr. Charles's father appears to have been an upright, persevering, God-fearing man, and it was his ambition from his son's birth that, if his life were spared, he might become a Christian and be serviceable to his fellow-men; and this devout desire has, through the divine blessing, been abundantly realized.

A REMINISCENCE OF SCHOOL-BOY FRENCH.

The lad being destined for commercial life, his father thought it desirable that he should learn French as well as the Latin usually taught at middle-class schools. Mr. Charles himself mentions the following reminiscence of the period. "My father had been content with English himself, for strange languages were not thought of for ordinary school-boys in his days. But he was anxious that his boys should learn French, so I was duly taught. How many lessons I had I do not remember; but their utter failure is well impressed on my memory.

"A Frenchman came to my father on business one day, who began by saying, 'Parlez-vous Francais?' As my father could not respond, I was sent for. In reply to the same inquiry I was bold enough, foolish enough, to say, 'Oui, monsieur.' When, lo! the Frenchman poured forth what seemed to be a whole volume in a few seconds, and I stood aghast. I did not understand one single word. I was dumb, and could do nothing but beat a hasty retreat, blaming myself for my folly, and resolved never again to say to the most tempting inquiry of a foreigner, 'Oui, monsieur.'"

Leaving school he entered his father's shop until something turned up. He began at the beginning, by sweeping out the shop, dusting the counters, brushing the goods, and so forth. And this was his

FIRST LESSON IN BUSINESS.

But it was not to be his line; and after a few months he received an offer, through the much-esteemed rector of St. Dunstan's Church, in Fleet Street, London, of a clerkship in the office of the Church Missionary Society. And here we must go back just a little to show the connecting link. Before leaving school Mr. Charles had, following the example of his sisters, become connected with the Sunday-school in the parish. He was thought old enough, though still a scholar during the week, to take a class of the younger ones on the Sunday; and never till he was married, and left the parish, did he give up his place in that Sunday-school. Mr. Charles was thus pretty well known to the rector, who was on the committee of the society; and as he knew that young Charles was wanting to make a start in life, he kindly procured him the appointment to that office. It was entirely unexpected, and in November, 1846, our friend made his first real start in life. He went in faith, not knowing if he should suit, or what would be his salary. At the end of a month great was his delight when the secretary came and informed him that they were pleased with his work, and that he was to have $250 a year.

About eight months afterward Mr. Charles's father died, and his two brothers went abroad to seek their fortune, and he was the only son of his widowed mother left at home. He had long felt a deep interest in missionary work, and as it became more intense the longer he thought about it, it led him to desire to offer himself to go out as a missionary. His Christian mother had given her consent; but when the new step was on the point of realization Mrs. Charles had a serious illness. The doctors affirmed that it was brought on by the thought of her son leaving her; "and, at length," says Mr. Charles, "it was made plain that that was not the path which God had marked out for me. My own mission work was to be at home."

A Protestant theological class was formed under the guidance of the Rev. R. McGhee, and discussions were held with Roman Catholics dwelling near Drury Lane. At those meetings the were examined and debated with much earnestness. An incident of these discussions is related by Mr. Charles. He says: "There were usually several hundreds of Roman Catholics present—all men; and only some half dozen Protestants.

"On the evening in question we were discussing the duty of reading the Scriptures, and in the course of my remarks I was led to refer to the Bereans as having been commended for 'searching the Scriptures.' It has been so much the practice of the Church of Rome to treat the Bible as a sealed book to the laity, that this commendation of the Apostle Paul was disputed as though it were not recorded on the page of the New Testament. It had always been our practice to meet them as far as possible on their own ground; and we had, therefore, always used their version of the Scriptures—the Douay Bible. So I turned to the passage in the Acts of the Apostles, and read it. This caused some little commotion; but as I was reading it, my eye rested on a foot-note in their Bible which I had not before seen, in which it is said that the Bereans were justly commended because 'they found out the texts.' This, of course, was a great point for me; but such an uproar was made at the discovery, that they would not listen to another word, and presently the meeting broke up in confusion."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL EXCURSIONS.

All this time he continued to act as superintendent of St. Dunstan's Sunday-school. He conducted a special service on Sunday mornings for the infants, and was the first superintendent to get permission to picnic in Richmond Park. The children had never had a whole day's holiday before; and if it was to be, Mr. Charles must beg the money. There were then five bankers in the parish, who seemed fit "game" for the purpose. But they were aged, demure people, and could the teachers dare approach them? Mr. Charles resolved to try. So one day, in his dinner hour (he was then only a clerk at the Church Missionary Society), fortified with a sheet of foolscap bearing the rector's signature, and one or two others connected with the school, he ventured into the inner sanctum of the "bank parlors," and very soon emerged, to his intense delight, with a like contribution from each, fully equal to expectations. In this, as in other things, Mr. Charles was privileged to be a pioneer; and the bank parlors have been regularly visited each year ever since with the like results. It was Mr. Charles's first begging expedition for the children. A good cause does give a young fellow courage, and what cause can be better than getting a "day in the country" for London Children?

A NEW APPOINTMENT.

After nearly eight years of unremitting labor under the auspices of the Church Missionary Society, Mr. Charles accepted, in 1854, an appointment as Assistant Secretary of the Home and Colonial School Society. His wife, whom he married at this time, was one of the educational staff of the college. In the early part of 1857 attention was called by the Earl of Shaftesbury to the necessity for further efforts to reach those who habitually absented themselves from the house of God, and urged the desirability of having special religious services in special buildings. In this work the Young Men's Society took a prominent part, and through the energy of Mr. Charles, as secretary, and his committee, a series of special Sunday evening services was arranged for in Exeter Hall, London, an enterprise which has since developed in many other directions, and upon which the blessing of God has abundantly rested.

But when these special services were over, though the Hall had been densely crowded, it seemed to Mr. Charles and his friends that the effort had scarcely reached the lower and poorer classes, for whom the meetings were particularly intended; so a few of the young men, with Mr. Charles at their head, formed themselves into a committee, and rented in a disreputable locality. They engaged some instrumentalists, including a cornet player, to lead the singing, and they preached the Gospel to the destitute, poor, and depraved, as God enabled them. The need of still further efforts to bring the neglected and outcast to Christ was afterward recognized, and the special services in theatres were commenced, which have been continued with such gratifying results ever since.

In 1860 Mr. Charles accepted the secretaryship of

THE REFORMATORY AND REFUGE UNION.

The Union was only a few years old, but it had already done much useful work. In the arrangements for exhibitions, conferences, social meetings, and so forth, the new secretary found ample scope for all the energy he could bring to bear, and it is largely through his business tact and prayerful, unflagging industry that the Society now occupies such a high position among existing agencies for good.

When Mr. Charles became secretary of the Union, efforts were being largely directed toward sending to America some of the boys and girls from the institutions. He had to continue this work, and started several parties of girls to Canada, under a competent matron, while the boys were consigned to the recognized emigration agents in the Dominion. But it seemed very desirable that some more definite and trustworthy information should be obtained as to the results. Consequently, in the autumn of 1862 he landing at Quebec, whence he proceeded, seeking information and suggestions, to Montreal, Ottawa, Kingston, London, Hamilton, and Toronto. He also took the opportunity of visiting the Falls of Niagara, proceeding subsequently to New York, where he rendered him-elf practically acquainted with the many forms f Christian beneficence for which this city is amous. Thence he returned to his work in England.

One or two special efforts on behalf of prisoners sprang out of the Reformatory and Refuge Union, and it was the privilege of Mr. Charles o promote their adoption and extension. Some hundreds of prisoners were annually discharged after brief sentences from the jails of he British metropolis, but nothing was done to ive them a helping hand as they again found hemselves free, without a character, and without a friend to give them a fresh start. Mr. Charles, after thinking and praying over the natter, got a committee formed, and prevailed n a friend to take up the work. The Union ade a grant, and as fairly started. Some thousands of discharged prisoners must now thank God for this. I was in prison, and ye visited me," said the aviour. It is a Christlike work, and they who o it shall be blessed in their deed. But the ork with which Mr. Charles is more especially lentified is a work on behalf of little boys. or more than twenty years now Mr. Charles as given the chief part of his time and his wonerful energies to the welfare of the institution nown in Christian and philanthropic circles as

THE HOME FOR LITTLE BOYS.

As secretary of the Reformatory and Refuge nion he was frequently applied to officially to nd suitable homes and institutions for little ildren and young people under various circumstances. The number he had to refuse was considerable that he was greatly grieved, and oncluded that something ought to be done. e named it to one or two humane friends, and ey promised to form part of a committee. his was in 1862. But he did not then meet ith the encouragement he reasonably exected; and though a circular had been drawn announcing the proposed institution as the Asylum for Destitute Boys under Ten Years Age," he was obliged to let the matter drop, nd put the circular in his drawer.

But still the applications continued to pour in, nd in 1863, as the late Mr. E. J. Tabrum and r. Charles were walking together up the Liverool Road, they settled the name of the proected new institution. It was to be the Home for Little Boys." Other friends were llied, and in November, 1863, the first committee-meeting took place at Tabrum's

SHOEBLACK HOME,

North London. On the 19th of March, 1864, Coomb's Croft House," at Tottenham, was pened, with thirteen boys. The opening was lebrated by a luncheon. Among the invited ests was a judge noted for his learning and hilanthropy and also for his quaint humor. eing called upon for a speech, Judge Payne sponded in his happiest vein, bringing his rearks to a close by reciting the following origil lines of eulogy of Mr. Charles and his new ork:

Hark! I hear a pleasant sound,
Tiny feet are pattering round;
Surely, from the merry noise,
'Tis a Home for Little Boys.

Charles the First was tyrant styled,
Charles the Second reckoned wild;
Charles the Third his time employs
On a Home for Little Boys.

He will not a Tartar prove,
Nor in reckless riot move,
But will mingle books with toys,
In the Home for Little Boys.

Hanbury will aid impart,
Friend to all that springs from heart;
Skilfully each rule will poise
In the Home for Little Boys.

Doubtless some who would have power,
Were they here to glad the hour,
Bending from sublimest joys,
Bless the Home for Little Boys.

In less than two years there were in the Home ninety boys; and so fast did the work grow and manifest its priceless utility, that a new Home was determined upon, and in 1866 the Home at Farningham was commenced, which, by God's blessing, has since attained such magnificent proportions. In July, 1883, a branch Home for orphans was opened at Swanley by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales; and there is also another branch Home for destitute orphan boys at Margate.

THE FRONTISPIECE PICTURE

represents various departments of the Homes for Little Boys, whose rise we have just narrated. The parent institution, as we have stated, was originally established at Tottenham in 1864, its object being "to feed, clothe, educate, and train to industrial work homeless and destitute little boys, and those in danger of falling into crime, whether orphans or not, who are disqualified, by poverty, or other circumstances, for admission to existing asylums and institutions." Subsequently, as the enterprise developed, the scene of its operations was transferred to Farningham, where there are now more than three hundred boys being educated in ten cottage Homes, only thirty boys living in each house, under the charge of a man and his wife, who are responsible for their domestic training. At Margate there are eighty boys, of the kind already referred to, and two hundred more at Swanley, making a grand total of who are distributed according to age, under qualified matrons and masters, the whole being under the fostering supervision of their founder, Mr. Charles.

at Farningham is represented in the picture on the top left-hand side of our front page; the new building at Swanley is shown immediately to the right of it; the Stores at Farningham are depicted on the left-hand side of the portrait; the Shoemakers' Shop is seen in the left-hand section of the lower division of the frontispiece; while the Boys' Composing Room at Farningham is the subject of the illustration immediately to the right of it.

In a circular which Mr. Charles has recently issued, he says: "To show how general is the cry of homeless little ones, their plea comes from almost every part of England. Some are found in Yorkshire, others in Devonshire and Cornwall. From along the east coast the same cry is heard, while others are found under the shadow of the Welsh mountains. The busy hives of industry in the midland counties send the same cry amid the roar of their machinery; and of course London, that huge over-grown world in itself, repeats again and yet again, with ever-increasing bitterness,

THE CRY OF HOMELESS LITTLE ONES.

"And how is it that these little ones are thus left in danger? It would take too long to tell all their tale of suffering, and how, in very early life, many of them have been cruelly deserted; while with others, the cold hand of death has been laid upon the breadwinners, and the boys were left to perish with hunger. Statistics are too dry and cold to tell their tale; but it may be some indication of the sad condition of these homeless little ones, coming from all parts of the country, just to say of 72 of the most recent applicants: 29, their fathers were dead, and the children left destitute; 3, their mothers were dead, and their fathers tramps or drunkards; 13, both father and mother were dead, and the boys homeless; 16 had been deserted by their fathers; 43 had fathers who were drunkards and mothers powerless to help them; 2 fathers were disabled from work; 1 father a lunatic; 1 father died in prison; 3 fathers committed suicide; 3 fathers were in prison."

Such facts as those—and almost every institution of like character in America could furnish a similar pathetic list—appeal with trumpet voice to the Christian public for support, encouragement, and prayer. The followers of Him who took the children in His arms and blessed them cannot be indifferent to the fate of these little friendless creatures. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

INCIDENTS AT MESSRS. MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN LONDON.

A Handsome Young Bohemian Girl has been rescued at Euston. She was attracted to the hall, and entered just in time to save her from ruin. She states that she was on the brink of the precipice, and she adds, "Oh, how my soul heaves with gratitude to God for delivering me!" She has been taken care of, and is about to enter the service of a Christian lady.

An Actress was Converted at the Meeting at St. Pancras. She is twenty-seven years of age, and of prepossessing appearance. After fourteen years of stage life she has found rest for her soul, and is now an inmate of a home, awaiting a situation. She expresses her purpose in the following words: "All my future life shall be devoted to my Lord."

A Drunkard and his Wife and his Family were brought to the Lord. The husband was found crouching in a dark corner of the hall at St. Pancras laboring under deep emotion. He was seen by a Christian worker, who quoted to him promise after promise until at last "Whosoever" went into his very soul. That evening he found Christ.

Another Slave of Strong Drink, who for Ten years has been in bondage to his debasing appetite, and who has destroyed his home, and on several occasions suffered imprisonment for ill-treating his wife, was brought into the liberty of Christ at the St. Pancras Hall. His wife was also brought to give herself to the Saviour, and they have both testified of the change that has come over their lives and their home. They are "new creatures in Christ Jesus."

A Young Man's Testimony at the Tonbridge Chapel recently was as follows: "At the age of seventeen my father called me to his side and told me that if I would follow his footsteps—he was then living in adultery and was a confirmed drunkard—I should become his sole residuary legatee. Under his guidance I set out upon the world, and have for the past fourteen years been leading a life of sin. During these long years my life has been one of wretchedness and misery, and my adultrous intercourse has been the means of ruining my frame and has shattered my constitution. I thank the Lord for leading me to the hall at St. Pancras, where I have found Christ, for it has been the means of rescuing me from a life which was dragging me down to perdition."

A Catching Madness.—A Young Man who went to London to seek a situation, was invited into the St. Pancras Hall. He was so impressed that he went into the inquiry-room, and found Christ. He then thought that he would like to go home and tell his parents of his new-found joy. He accordingly went, and on informing them of the peace that he had found, they declared that he was suffering from religious mania brought on by "undue excitement." Great dismay spread over the household, and the parents kept a vigilant eye on their son during his stay there. He subsequently expressed his intention of returning to London, to continue his search for a suitable situation. His mother told him he was "mad," and that his sister would have to accompany him on the journey. To this he assented, but declared he was perfectly "compos mentis." "You're gone mad," said the father. "Well!" the boy replied, "if that is so, heaven's the asylum." Ultimately both he and his sister were seated in a railway carriage accompanying each other on the journey to London. They stepped out at Euston Station, and retired to the St. Pancras Hall, where they were afterward heard in the inquiry-room praying to the Lord. The next morning the young man sent his sister home rejoicing in Jesus Christ as her Saviour also, she having during the previous evening caught the "madness" which had visited her brother.

HIGH LICENSE, THE MONOPOLY OF ABOMINATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 6, 1884.

"It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood."—Matt. 27 : 6.

The First Potter's Field—The Liquor Traffic—To be Restrained, Controlled, or Stopped—Effects of Making a Monopoly—To Make the Traffic Respectable—The Rash rather than the Carbuncle—High License Anti-American—Discrimination of Classes—The Half-Loaf Plea—Applied to other Matters—A Half Bridge—Compromise with all Law-Breakers — High License for Theft—For Blasphemy—For Murder — Anti-Common-Sense —Why a Manufacturer Went to Georgia—The Courage of Iowa —Failure of High License in Nebraska—High License a Flag of Truce—Fight the Battle Out—Victory Certain.

For fifteen dollars Judas Iscariot had sold Christ. Under a thrust of conscience or in disgust that he had not made a more lucrative thing out of it, he pitches the rattling shekels on the pavement. What to do with the conscience money, is the question. Some say, "Put it into the treasury." Others say, "It isn't right to do that, because we have always had an understanding that blood money or a revenue obtained by the sale of human life must not be used for governmental or religious purposes." So they decide to take the money and purchase a place to bury paupers ; picking out a rough and useless piece of ground all covered over with the broken ware of an adjoining pottery, they set apart

THE FIRST POTTER'S FIELD.

So you see the relations of my text when it says, "It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood."

We are at a point in reformatory movements in this country where it is proposed to restrain or control or stop the traffic of ardent spirits by compelling the merchant thereof to pay a large sum, say $500 or $1000 as a license. It is said that this will have a tendency to close up all the small drinkeries which curse our cities, and only a few men can afford to sell intoxicating drink. This will help support the poorhouses, where there are widows and orphans sent there by the dissipations of husbands and fathers. Don't you see? This high tax will help support the prisons in which men are incarcerated for committing crimes while drunk. Don't you see? This high tax will help support the Court of Oyer and Terminer, whose judges, and attorneys, and constables, and juries, and police stations, and court rooms find their chief employment in the arraignment, trial, and condemnation of those who offend the law while in a state of insobriety. Don't you see? How any man or woman in favor of the great temperance reform can be so hoodwinked as not to understand that this high-license movement is the surrender of all the temperance reformation for which good men and women have been struggling for the last sixty years, is to me an amazement that eclipses everything.

My subject is, "High License, the Monopoly of Abomination." Do you not realize, as by mathematical demonstration, that the

of this high-license movement, and the one result of the closing of small establishments—if that were the result—and the opening of a few large establishments, will be to make rum-selling and rum-drinking highly respectable? These drinkeries in Brooklyn and New York are so disgusting that a man will not risk his reputation by going in them ; and if a young man should be found coming out from one of those low establishments he would lose his place in the store. Now, suppose all these small establishments are closed up and that then you open the palaces of inebriation down on the avenues. It is not the rookeries of alcoholism that do the worst work ; they are only the last stopping places on the road to death. Where did that bloated, ulcerous, wheezing wretch that staggers out of a rum-hole get his habits started? At glittering restaurant or bar-room of first-class hotel, where it was fashionable to go. Ah! my friends, it seems to me the disposition is to stop these small establishments, which are only the rash on the skin of the body politic, and then to gather all the poison and the pus and the matteration into a few great carbuncles which mean death. I say, give us the rash rather than the carbuncles.

Here you will have

A SPLENDID LIQUOR ESTABLISHMENT.

Masterpieces of painting on the wall. Cut glass on silver platter. Upholstery like a Turkish harem. Uniformed servants to open the door, uniformed servants to take your hat and cane. Adjoining rooms with luxuriant divan on which you can recline when taken mysteriously ill after too much champagne, cognac, or old Otard. All the phantasmagoria and bewitchment of art thrown around this Herod of massacre, this Moloch of consumed worshippers, this Juggernaut of crushed millions.

Do you not see that this high-license movement strikes at the heart of the best homes in America? that it proposes the fattest lambs for its sacrifice? that it is at war with the most beautiful domestic circles in America? Tell it to all the philanthropists who are trying to make the world better, and let journalists tell it by pen and by type that this day in the presence of my Maker and my Judge I stamp on this high-license movement as the monopoly of abomination. It proposes to pave with honor, to pillar with splendor, and guard with monopolistic advantage a business, which has made the ground hollow under England, Ireland, Scotland, and America with the catacombs of slaughtered drunkards.

I am opposed to this high license because it is it is anti-common-sense, it is anti-demonstrated facts, and it is anti-Christian. Our revolutionary fathers wrote first with pen and then with sword, first in black ink and then in red ink, that all men are equal before the law. Impartiality written on the Declaration of Independence, on the Constitution of the United States, and over the door of our State and National capitols. Now, how then dare you propose for $500 or $1000 to let one man sell sweetened dynamite, while you deny to his fellow the right, because he cannot raise more than $100, or more than $50, or cannot raise anything? Are the small dealers in this festive liquid to have no rights? I plead for equal rights, the first American doctrine. I plead for the rights of these men who are doing a small, prudent, economical business in selling extract of logwood, strychnine, and blue vitriol! What right have you to say to these wealthy men standing beside their great conflagration of temptation, "Go ahead," while you deny the poor fellows in the traffic the right so much as to strike a lucifer match?

Now, this high-license movement is the property qualification in the most offensive shape. Why do you not carry it out in other things? Why do you not stop all these bakers until the bakers can pay a $1000 license? Why do you not shut up all the butchers' shops until the butchers can pay $1000 or $500? Why do you not stop these thread-and-needle stores and the small dry-goods establishments, except that a man pay $500 or $1000? "Oh," you say, "that is different." How is it different? "Well," you say, "the sale of bread and meat and clothes does no damage, while the sale of whiskey does damage." Ah, my brother, you have surrendered the whole subject! If rum-selling is right, let all have the right, and if it is wrong, $500 or $1000 are only a bribe to government to give to a few men a privilege which it denies to the great masses of the people. Why do you not carry out this idea of licensing only those who can pay a large license? give them all the privilege.

"Oh," say some people, "you cannot e[x]ecute a prohibitory law, and therefore you h[a]ve better take this high license as a compromise." And there are people who say, of bread is better than no bread at all." W[ell] that depends entirely upon whether the [l]oaf is poisoned or not. You say half a pou[nd] of butter is better than no butter. That [de]pends upon whether it is oleomargarine or n[ot]. Here is a bridge over a roaring stream. [A] freshet in the night-time sweeps away half [the] railroad bridge. The first half of the bri[dge] stands solidly. It is half-past eleven o'clock [at] night, and the express train is coming. [The] watchman stands there with a lantern. [He] sees the bridge sound at that end, and he wa[ves] the lantern, "All is well," and at forty mi[nutes] the hour the midnight express train sweeps [on] and having passed the first half of the bridge [the] crash, crash, crash! Two hundred souls go [are] into eternity. Better have had no bridge at a[ll] then the watchman would have swung his l[an]tern of warning. Is half a bridge better than [no] bridge?

So they propose to compromise this matt[er]. They say a prohibitory law cannot be execut[ed] and, therefore, we had better not have any st[at]ute law on the statute book. Will you tell me, [my] friends, which one of our laws is fully execut[ed]. We have a law against Sabbath-breaking. M[il]lions of people break that law every Sund[ay]. We have laws against blasphemy. Sometim[es] the air is lurid with imprecation. We have la[ws] against theft, but you have highwaymen a[nd] burglars filling your jails and penitentiaries, a[nd] thousands of people outside of jail who ou[ght] to be inside. You have laws against murd[er] yet we have three men in our Raymond Str[eet] Jail for murder, and there are scores of them [in] the United States, and Cincinnati has her [full] share. Now, why not throw overboard th[ese] laws, if they are not executed fully, and let [us] give for a high license to a few men all the p[ri]vilege of swearing and stealing and murd[er]. Now, let us have a HIGH LICENSE FOR THEFT.

Get ready your excise commissioners. We [will] have $5000 or $10,000 high license for th[eft]. We must somehow put down these small cri[mi]nals that are stealing door-mats and post[age] stamps and chocolate drops. For high lice[nse] we will give to a few men the privilege of r[un]ning off with $50,000 of the Newark Bank [by] watering the stock in a railroad company, t[hat] ing $250,000 at one clip. Now, I shall h[ave] this license very high, say $10,000 for th[ese], and in that way we shall put to an end all th[e] sneak thieves and tuppenny scoundrels a[nd] wharf-rats, and all hail to the million-do[llar] rascals. You will never put down theft in t[he] country until you give a few people for a h[igh] license all the privilege of stealing.

Then there is

THE EVIL OF BLASPHEMY.

Let us for a high license, say $10,000, gat[her] a hundred men in these cities, men of the h[ot]test tempers and the fieriest tongue and [the] most spiteful against God and decency, and [go] to them the Speaker of the New Jersey Legi[sla]ture, whose address to the Legislature last w[inter] was so full of oaths and imprecations that [the] printers, who never swear themselves, had [to] put blanks all through the speech to sh[ow] where the oaths came in. Having gathered [this] precious group to do all the blasphemy of [the] country at high license, give them full swe[ep] and then just let us extinguish all these sr[all] swearers, who never have any genius at sw[ear]ing, and who always swear on a small scale, [and] who never get beyond "by George!" or, "[by] stars!" or, "darn it!" Extirpation for [the] small swearers. You will never put down b[las]phemy in this country except by high license.

And the sin of murder. Why, your law aga[inst] it is a failure. Murder on Long Island, mur[der] in Illinois, murder in Pennsylvania, murder [all] over. It is almost impossible to convict on[e of] the desperadoes. He proves an alibi right aw[ay]

Or he did it under emotional insanity. Courthouse full of sympathizers, and when he is cleared the crowd follow him down the street thinking he ought to be sent to Congress! Your law against murder is a failure. Now, we have got to stop these clumsy assassins who kill people with car-hooks, and Paris green, and dull knives, and having a high license, say $10,000 or $20,000, give to a few men the privilege of genteelly and skilfully and gracefully putting their victims out of their worldly misfortunes. You will never stop murder in this country until you put a high license upon it and let a few men do all the killing. But, my friends, all irony aside, you see that if rum-selling is right we all ought to have the right, and if it is wrong, five million dollars paid down in hard cash for one license ought to purchase no immunity.

High license is

ANTI-COMMON-SENSE.

You know very well one business has no right to despoil other businesses. A manufacturer—I have the authority for this from a gentleman who sits in this audience—a manufacturer went down South and established himself in Georgia. Somebody asked him why he built his establishment there. He said, "Because they voted to have no license here." That honest manufacturer knew what you and I ought to know, that the liquor traffic is in antagonism with every other business. If the millions of dollars which go into that business went for lawful and healthful styles of business there would come to the agricultural and manufacturing and commercial interests of this country a boom of prosperity a hundred and fifty per cent greater than we have ever had.

THE SUFFERERS.

Oh that the working people of America understood that it is time for them by their votes to keep at home the drivelling pot-house politicians in Albany and Harrisburg, who vote down prohibition. Do you not know that if you have $2 as wages now a day, you would have $4; if you have $1000 salary you would have $2000; if you have $10,000 income now you would have $20,000? The rum traffic puts its clutch this moment upon the neck of every merchant, mechanic, artist, and farmer in America. You pay for its destructive work by your honest sweat and by the deprivation of your households of many comforts. Oh for an hour of the whose Legislature a few weeks ago passed an out-and-out prohibition law, and whose governor had grace and greatness enough to sign it. Lead on, O Western State, in this glorious reform! Our own beloved New York State may be the last to fall into line, but come she will. After a few more thousand of our homes are despoiled by the rum traffic, after a few more thousand broken hearts, after a few more thousand of the noblest intellects of this age are sacrificed, after a few more years the distilleries shall have insulted the heavens with their uprolling stench, the tide will turn, and all good people rising up will lay hold of the strength of Almighty God and hurl into the perdition from which it smoked up this sweltering and putrefying curse of nations.

ANTI-FACTS.

Yes, I have to tell you that this high-license movement is antagonized by all the demonstrated facts in the case. I am amazed to hear intelligent men of Brooklyn and New York talk as though this were a new plan that we are to try just once. It is an old carcass. It first died in Missouri; then it died in Kansas, the second death, and it has been tried over and over and over again, and has always been a flat and disgusting failure. Men of America, hear that! It was tried in Iowa, a thousand-dollar license. A prominent paper of Iowa says:

"Experiments being made with high license in Iowa as a temperance method are fast proving what a cheat it is. Des Moines has tried a thousand-dollar license only to find it has increased the number of its saloons and the daily cases of drunkenness. Other cities in Iowa have tried it with similar result."

It was tried in Nebraska, a thousand-dollar license, under what was called the Slocum Law. A prominent citizen was asked as to what he thought had been the effect of that high license. His reply was: "You ask, has a high license diminished drunkenness? Not in the slightest degree. Drunkenness is steadily on the increase. This vice, as all other vices which government fosters, grows continuously. High license, as far as diminishing drunkenness is concerned, does nothing of the kind. Mark this well. I would repeat in thunderous tones, if I could, does nothing of the kind. Gambling consequent upon high license has fearfully increased. The saloon keeper must have in many cases a gambling annex in order to make his business pay a profit under the high-license system. This vice is making rapid progress throughout the State, and much of this increase is directly traceable to high license."

High license tried again and again and again, and yet here we, in the State of New York, are so stultifying ourselves as to propose that the farce be re-enacted. The hardest blow the temperance reformation has had in this century has been in the fact that some reformers have halted under the delusion of this high-license movement. You know what it is. It is the white flag of truce sent out from Alcoholism to Prohibition to make the battle pause long enough to get the army of decanters and demijohns better organized. Away with that flag of truce, or I will fire on it. Between these two armies there can be

NO TRUCE.

On the one side are God and sobriety and the best interests of the world, and on the other side is the sworn enemy of all righteousness, and either rum must be defeated or the Church of God and civilization. What are you trying to compromise with? Oh, this black destroying archangel of all diabolism, putting one wing to the Pacific, putting the other wing to the Atlantic coast, its filthy claws clutching into the torn and bleeding heart-strings of the nation as it cries out, "How long, O Lord, how long?" Compromise with it! You had better compromise with the panther in his jungle, with the cyclone in its flight, with an Egyptian plague as it blotches an empire, with Apollyon, for whom this evil is recruiting officer, quartermaster, and commander-in-chief.

Oh, my friends, let us

on the old line, for victory is coming as surely as right is right, and wrong is wrong, and falsehood is false, and truth is truth, and God is God. Can it be that you are so deaf that you cannot hear in the distance the rumbling of the oncoming chariots of victory? Three hundred and twenty thousand votes at the last election in Ohio for prohibition. Kansas on the right side. Iowa on the right side. Alabama and Georgia soon to be on the right side. Fifteen legislatures of the United States now, or this last winter, discussing the temperance question. Two hundred and forty-six of the townships of Massachusetts out of two hundred and fifty-six proclaimed for no license. In all the State of Maine not one signboard out announcing the sale of strong drink, so that if in any place it is sold it is a pronounced crime. In our own monopoly-ridden New York Legislature a few weeks ago we came within three votes of having the choice of prohibition given to the people. The liquor traffic so panic-struck that it is now at Washington trying to get the Constitution altered, so that prohibitory laws, if passed, as they will be passed all over the land, can be pronounced unconstitutional. A few days ago the Congress of the United States demolishing the bonded whiskey bill by one hundred and eighty-six votes to eighty-three, although the liquor traffic had expended $700,000 to buy spectacles through which our rulers might see things in the right light.

Oh, I tell the politicians of America, I tell the leaders of our beautiful Republican party and of our glorious Democracy that the temperance movement is going to hold in this country, and decide who shall be the Mayors, and the Governors, and the Congressmen, and the Presidents. I expect to live to see a President of the United States elected on a prohibition platform. Better get off the track before the morning express train comes down with the women's temperance societies, and the Sons of Temperance, and the Good Samaritans, and the Good Templars, and the long train of Christians and philanthropists and reformers. Clear the track! The cowcatcher will be all piled up with smashed decanters, and the staves of beer-barrels, and the splinters of high-license platforms, and the rails with people who sat on the fence, and all the machinations and briberies and outrages of all Christendom. The time will come when there will be only ten decanters left, and they will be set up at the end of an alley like ten pins, and some reformer will take the round ball of prohibition and he will give one roll, but it will be a ten strike.

My friends, this subject looked at from the side of worldly reform is so bright; but looked at from the side of Christian reform is ABSOLUTELY CERTAIN.

God is going to destroy drunkenness. Is there a man sitting or standing in this assembly who doubts that God is stronger than the devil?

Blucher came up just before night and saved the day at Waterloo. At four o'clock in the afternoon it looked very badly for the English. Generals Ponsonby and Picton fallen. Sabres broken, flags surrendered, Scotch Grays annihilated. Only forty-two men left out of the German brigade. The English army falling back and falling back. Napoleon rubbed his hands together and said, "Aha! aha! we'll teach that little Englishman a lesson. Ninety chances out of a hundred are in our favor. Magnificent! magnificent!" He even sent messages to Paris to say he had won the day. But before sundown Blucher came up, and he who had been the conqueror of Austerlitz became the victim of Waterloo. That name which had shaken all Europe and filled even America with apprehension, that name went down, and Napoleon muddy, and hatless, and crazed with his disasters, was found feeling for the stirrup of a horse that he might mount and resume the contest.

THE SPOILER'S DOOM.

Well, my friends, alcoholism is imperial, and it is a conqueror, and there are good people who say the night of national overthrow is coming, and that it is almost night. But before sundown the Conqueor of earth and heaven will ride in on the white horse, and alcoholism, which has had its Austerlitz of triumph, shall have its Waterloo of defeat. Alcoholism having lost its crown, the grizzly and cruel breaker of human hearts crazed with the disaster, will be found feeling in vain for the stirrup on which to remount its foaming charger. "So, O Lord, let Thine enemies perish!"

The Significance of the Temperance Movement now reported from every section of the country is obtaining recognition from secular and political journals. In the course of a survey of the situation, published recently by the New York Mail and Express, that journal predicts a cyclone that will sweep the liquor dealers, and all supporters of that traffic, into wreck and ruin. And it adds: "The war that now seems impending would, in fact, pay its way from the start, in the scores of millions of money and thousands of souls saved by the first grand movement for the suppression of the traffic. Rightly conducted, wisely led and with a strict adherence to practical methods, the temperance movement that is about to sweep this country with irresistible force may be the most inspiring, elevating, humanizing and Christianizing movement known in all the nineteen Christian centuries."

PROPHETIC NOTES.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

APPROACHING TROUBLES IN INDIA.

India equally with Ireland is expected by prophetic expositors to become politically separated from England in these last days, because it never belonged to Cæsar's Roman Empire. The present Egyptian crisis may easily lead to the Mohammedan agitation spreading from Egypt to Arabia and Syria and India. The employment of Indian troops in the Soudan may become necessary, and none can tell what effect this may have in India. In any case, great troubles may soon be expected in India according to Scripture prophecy.

COMING SEPARATION OF IRELAND FROM ENGLAND.

Prophetic expositors have long ago shown that Ireland also not being part of Cæsar's Roman Empire must before the final development be separated from Britain, which did form part of that empire. The Irish Nationalists in London dined together at the Holborn Restaurant on the evening of St. Patrick's Day, March 17th, under the presidency of Mr. Parnell. There were no loyal and patriotic toasts, in the usual acceptance of the words, and even the health of Her Majesty was not drunk. The essential disloyalty of the Parnellite faction could not be more clearly or ostentatiously displayed. Nor could a more striking illustration be afforded of the uselessness of giving paltry or even important concessions to the Irish Nationalist party in the hope of pacifying them. They declare that nothing short of absolute separation will content them, and while half measures are accepted, they are only regarded as steps on which to mount to their true and avowed object. Mr. Parnell boasts, and not without reason, that the new Franchise Act now under the consideration of Parliament, will increase the number of seats in the House of Commons occupied by these disaffected men to eighty or ninety, instead of about sixty as at present. Mr. Parnell assumed confidently the ultimate triumph of his movement, and spoke with contempt of English political parties. There can be no room for misapprehension as to what the Nationalists mean. Their aim is the establishment of an Irish Republic, and any co-operation with them on the part of English politicians will, whether those politicians so understand it or not, be used to that end.

"HUNGRY FELLOWS SOON TO BREAK LOOSE."

The New York Christian Advocate says, in regard to the increasing tide of political corruption and lawless communistic feeling in the United States: "A noted millionaire, when asked why he did not build a palatial mansion such as Vanderbilt's, said: 'I don't want a house that will be so easily found when the hungry fellows break loose.' This is the most fearful sentence we have heard since the outbreak of the war. As certain as the earth continues and things go on as they have for twenty years, the 'hungry fellows will break loose.' Nothing hastens it like men of vast wealth, who buy up legislatures, disregard private rights, live in luxury, and say, 'What are you going to do about it? The public be ——,' and talk about the 'hungry fellows breaking loose.' He who looks ahead and sees no breakers, is either blind or has some glass that those who judge the future by the past can't get access to."

ATMOSPHERIC PHENOMENA.

Something like a repetition of the splendid aerial phenomena which were witnessed in various parts of America, England and France toward the end of last year has recently been noticed at Paris. M. Joubert describes the appearance of these new phenomena in a letter which he has sent to the Academy of Science. At four o'clock in the morning his attention was drawn to a flame of extraordinary brilliancy reflected on the mirror in his room. Looking in an easterly direction he saw the heavens from the horizon to a height of about twenty-two degrees illuminated in a magnificent manner. Objects around were seen distinctly, and in the atmosphere the partial mists and vapors were covered with every conceivable variety of tint, from a deep blood-red fringing the horizon in a limitless line to soft streaks of violet fading away toward the zenith. These splendid hues gradually disappeared before the approach of dawn. These must be included among the "great sights from heaven," foretold by Christ to precede His Second Coming, as shown in Luke 21 : 11. Such events, though referrible by materialists and rationalistic misbelievers generally to second and solely natural causes, are yet by earnest Christians watched with an interest as time rolls on, that deepens in its intensity, for such phenomena are regarded by them as so many intimations of the near approach of the end of the age and the ushering in of a new dispensation.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

From a Shoeblack to an Evangelist.—At a recent meeting Mr. Scott, of Glasgow, said: "An evangelist visited us recently, and addressed our meeting in the James Morrison Street Hall. He told us that when he was very young his parents deserted him and he became a regular London street-boy, and as he grew older and must earn his living he became a shoeblack. One night he went to a special evangelistic meeting, where he was converted to Christ. Step by step he got on, till he became an evangelist, and is now going out to preach the Gospel in Australia. When he was preaching in Hyde Park some time ago, a man told him that he was converted in the tent on Glasgow Green. We are often asked, 'Where are all your converts?' This incident confirms my reply, 'They are scattered all over the world.'"

Appalled by his Own Life.—A Young Soldier said: "I was along with my comrade here in the Afghan war. I feared not the enemy, because I had the Light of the World in me. It was in a little meeting at Benares in India where I met the Lord. It came about this way. There was nothing for the men to do but drink, so they spent their time in getting drunk and getting sober. I got frightened at our fearful life, and went to the meeting so that I might be saved from it, and I was not disappointed, for grace was given to me to turn to the Saviour, and the same Divine Power keeps me to this hour."

An Over-Endowed Evangelist.—The Rev. Mr. Gault said: "A rich man in America gave an evangelist a fine estate of land, thinking to encourage him in his work for the Lord. The evangelist was very grateful, and accepted the gift with thanks. Within three months, he called upon his benefactor, and asked him to take back the title-deeds of the land. Amazed, the rich man asked, 'Is not the land good?' 'Yes,' was the reply, 'it is very rich soil.' 'What is the matter then?' 'All my life I've been singing "No foot of land I now possess;" I can't sing that hymn now. I would rather be able to sing it than have the land, valuable as it is. Many thanks for your kindness, but after this I'll depend as I formerly did upon God, and live entirely by faith in God, who knows my needs, and has promised to supply them. I am sure He will do so!'"

A Ship's Crew Dying of Thirst.—At a Recent prayer-meeting, Mr. Thomson said: "I shall never forget being at sea once, when our water ran short. An unspoken, nervous fear was on every man. The ship was steered for the nearest land, but days before we could sight it, our water ran out. Hour after hour passed, but no water was to be had. The hot sun shone from a cloudless sky, making our thirst more intense by his fierce rays. All on board were as though dying; unless a ship hove in sight or we reached land sooner than we expected, every man on board must die of thirst. We all gathered on the poop, and the question was, 'What shall we do?' 'Land! land! right ahead' was the inspiring cry which interrupted and closed our discussion. In a moment almost every bit of canvas the masts and spars could bear was clapped on. The casks were put into the boats, and everything was made ready to receive the water. We sailed so close to land that the sound of streams of water rushing down a mountain-side made us dance with joy. We lowered and manned the boats; then we pulled for the shore. No sign of dying now; all were full of life and vigor, because we saw where water was to be got in abundance. The first thing we did was to drink our fill out of the stream, then we filled our casks, and it was no long before we were spreading our sails to the breeze, and going on our way with glad and grateful hearts. Christians should imitate this ship's crew, and drink their fill from the fountain and stream of the water of life first; then they will be able to carry water to others who are dying, and go on their way rejoicing in the salvation of God."

A Suicide Prevented.—The Rev. Mr. Campbell related: "A Sabbath-school teacher told me that he had a scholar whose home was of the most wretched description; his father and mother were both confirmed drunkards, and treated him very cruelly. Driven to despair, he left his home to put an end to his existence by drowning himself in the river. On his way he saw a small company gathered on the street, and as he drew near them he heard that they were singing the hymn, 'It's better on before.' He joined the group, and went with them into their hall, where he was converted to Christ, and has since shown by his consistent and happy life that his conversion was genuine. Never give up preaching the Gospel in the open-air. None can tell, or may discover till the judgment day, how great good has been done by it, and how many by its means have been turned from sin to God."

A German Saved from Wreck.—Mr. Cumming related: "When Dr. Somerville and I were in South Africa, we met a German who was one of ten survivors of a disastrous wreck. All the passengers and crew were lost but these ten. When he saw that the steamer must be lost, he went down to his cabin and prayed that the Lord would save him alive, vowing to be ever thankful if his life was spared. He also asked grace to submit cheerfully to death if such was the will of God. He went on deck quite calm, and prepared for either life or death. When the steamer sank he was dragged down with her, but rose to the surface when the ship settled down and the force of the suction was spent. Seeing a spar floating with a man clinging on it, he made his way to it and seized it. The other man was crying for mercy, and bewailing his sinful life. In a short time they were rescued. The German did not forget his promise, but with a truly thankful heart toward God for answering his prayer, he yielded himself to Christ, and lived to His glory."

Story of a Widow's Son.—A Member of Mr. Moody's Mizpah Band gives his history thus: "I had a praying father and mother, and was brought up to go to church, but when I was seventeen years of age I thought that I was too old to go to church with my parents, and so went alone. Then being afraid of the scoffs and jeers of my companions, I stayed away altogether. The first thing I went wrong in was Sabbath-breaking, the second was drinking. While still very young, I was in the habit of getting drunk. In the midst of all my foolery, I felt an unutterable emptiness and weariness. My mother used to go to the different revival meetings, and take with her a written request for prayer on behalf of a widow's only son who was going astray. Often have I seen her leave the house, putting the bit of paper on which it was written in her pocket. One Sabbath morning my mother went away early to get a seat in the City Hall, where Richard Weaver was going to preach. The night before I had some drink, and when I waked up in the forenoon I was most unhappy, and asked myself, 'What have I done last night that I am so unhappy?' I could not remember anything in particular, but I learned the cause later on. My mother had as usual put in a request for me. Mr. Weaver read it out first, and when he led in prayer, he seemed to rend the heavens on my behalf. I was greatly disturbed about my sins, and my mother got Mr. Scott, who was a missionary in the Wynch then, to speak to me, but I did not get rest till one Sabbath I was reading 1 Peter 4, and I came to the word 'commit,' in the last verse. That gave me peace. It showed me that God was to save me, not myself. I testified in the workshop the next day, and my fellow-workmen came down upon me, and God gave me grace to stand fast."

An Emigrant Israelite Converted.—"A New Testament was given to a young Jew, who was emigrating to America. On the voyage out, he read it, and was to some extent awakened and convinced that the Jesus spoken of therein was the Messiah of which the Old Testament speaks; but he had not attained to a saving knowledge of Christ when he reached Baltimore. One day, in an unhappy state of mind, he entered a restaurant to get some food. While waiting till it was served, he cast his eye over a paper issued for the purpose of interesting the Germans in America in Jewish work. The young Jew thought he saw a way out of his mental and spiritual distress, and wrote to the editor, stating his case, and asking guidance. The editor is a godly man, and called upon him at his lodgings, spending a good deal of time with the stranger in directing him to Jesus. It was time and labor well bestowed, for he soon made a public confession of Christ, and is now an indefatigable worker among the Jews. An effort is being made to train him for the ministry of the Gospel."

The Man at the Wheel.—"Some Years ago a man shipped as an able seaman on board a seagoing ship. Some of the men took it into their heads that he was an officer, though he shipped as an A.B., because he strutted about on the deck, giving orders to all and sundry. His manners and apparent knowledge so impressed the officers that before sailing he was made a quartermaster. When he got to sea, and his turn at the wheel came, he made the ship spin round like a top. The officer of the watch demanded, 'What are you doing, sir?' 'Give me a patch of land to steer by,' he replied. 'I can't do it without that!' It turned out that he had been trained on a river steamer, and accustomed to steer by landmarks, and not by the compass, so that he was useless out of sight of land. Many of the men on board, though not good steersmen, could do better than he could, because they were trained at sea. So it is in our spiritual voyage. The unconverted steersman who attempts to guide a soul to the haven of rest only makes it spin round and get dizzy, or leaves it a helpless wreck on the ocean of life. The most ignorant but truly converted person is a better pilot than such a man, in spite of all his fine words and appearance."

How the Jew's Mission Began in Edinburgh.—Mr. Baron, the missionary to the Jews, said: "It was after earnest prayer that our Society decided to establish a fixed mission to the Jews in Scotland. Two incidents showed us clearly that it was the Lord's will that we should do so. When we visited Edinburgh on a tour of inspection, as the train was entering the city, we asked the Lord to guide us to a suitable place, as we were entire strangers to the city. When we go to a strange town we find out the Jewish quarters, and select a prominent room where we can hang out, printed on a large card, the 53d chapter of Isaiah. Following this rule in Edinburgh we looked out for a room, and saw a suitable place near the Synagogue, which we secured at once. Two days after a friend called and said, 'Dear me! how wonderfully God answers prayer! This is the house and the very room in which we met for years, and prayed that God would send a missionary to the Jews of this city.' Remember, we did not know any one in the town. Then on the morning of our arrival in Glasgow a check reached Mildmay, London, for the very sum we had taken with us. As you may be aware, we do not ask money from any person, nor make collections. We leave all that to the Lord."

THE VISIONS OF DANIEL.

By Willis Lord, D.D.*

The Four Successive Empires—The Import of the Stone—The Period of its Striking—When the Image is in its Tenfold Divison—Another Vision—Identical in Import—The Little Horn—A Formidable and Relentless Enemy—The Duration of his Power—No Millennium before Christ Comes.

THE prophet thus interprets the vision of the great image seen by King Nebuchadnezzar (Daniel 2 : 31–45). In this vision God has made known what shall come to pass hereafter. The great image is a symbol. In its form and materials it represents four mighty kingdoms of this world. They are to arise, each after the other, and gain wide dominion. The first is the Babylonian, then existing. This statement by the prophet renders it certain that the other three kingdoms are the Medo-Persian, the Macedonian and the Roman. When the fourth kingdom, "strong as iron," shall reach a specified stage in its history, the stone cut out without hands shall smite the image and destroy it; and itself will become the world-filling and world-ruling power; or "the God of heaven will then set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever."

The prophet does not explain

THE IMPORT OF THE STONE.

It was not necessary. It denotes either "the stone of Israel," rejected by men but "chosen of God and precious," or His Messianic kingdom. Nor does the prophet determine here the exact time of this kingdom. In the vision itself, however, there are some interesting and conclusive data. The stone is not to smite and destroy the image, while the fourth kingdom exists in its unity, as it did at the first coming of Christ; nor yet while it exists in its twofold division, as it did in the Eastern and Western empires, represented by the legs of iron; but, while it shall be existing in as represented by the feet and toes of iron and clay. The stone will smite upon these, and, destroying the kingdoms which they represent, will bring in their place that kingdom which cannot be destroyed. Demonstrably, therefore, this smiting and this kingdom are yet in the future.

At what point in the future? Let "the man greatly beloved" answer, in another vision, which he himself saw.

"I saw in the night visions, and behold, One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven; and came to the Ancient of days; and they brought Him near before Him. And there was given Him dominion and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations and languages should serve Him; His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed" (Dan. 7 : 12–14).

How impressive is this divine view. How clear the conclusion which it compels. The smiting of the terrible image upon its feet and toes, by the stone; the destruction of the kingdoms of this world, which these feet and toes symbolize, by this smiting; and the setting up in their place of that kingdom which shall be everlasting, are plainly contemporaneous events. But this kingdom will be set up, or given to One like the Son of man, not until He comes with the clouds of heaven; i.e. at the second coming of Christ. Before that epoch, therefore, there can be no millennium.

Here again the heavenly witness (Daniel 7 : 2–27). In this Scripture we have ANOTHER PROPHETIC VISION.

Widely different in form from that of the huge image, it has essentially the same import, only that, in connection with the latter days of the fourth kingdom, it adds some particulars of deep moment. The prophet beholds, coming up from the great sea, four great beasts. The first of these beasts is like a lion, the second like a bear, the third like a leopard, and the fourth—not compared with any other—is exceedingly strong and terrible, and exercises immense powers of destruction. The four great kingdoms set forth in the vision of the image are symbolized here by these four beasts. The extraordinary fourth beast has ten horns. These horns symbolize a tenfold division of the fourth kingdom, just as was done by the ten toes of the image. Among these horns springs up another, a little horn, of a remarkable character. It has eyes like the eyes of a man; a mouth speaking great things; and it plucks up three of the first horns by the roots.

The vision continues "until the thrones were placed, and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow, and the hair of His head like the pure wool. His throne was like the fiery flame, and His wheels as burning fire. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before Him; thousand thousands ministered unto Him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before Him. The judgment was set, and the books were opened."

Up to the very moment of this overwhelming scene is heard "the voice of the great words which the horn spake." But the judgment proceeds; the beast is slain and his body given to the burning flame; the Son of man comes with the clouds of heaven, and is invested by the Ancient of days with the promised and glorious kingdom.

Divine manifestations awe men. The prophet was deeply impressed. His spirit was troubled within him. What can this transcendent vision mean? Especially did he desire to "know so diverse from all the others, and exceedingly dreadful; and of the ten horns that were in his head; and of the other which came up, and before which three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things; whose look was more stout than his fellows: and the same horn that made war with the saints, and prevailed against them." This strong desire of the prophet was answered. "The fourth beast," said the interpreter, "shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and tread it down and break it in pieces. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise; and another shall rise after them, and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and think to change times and laws."

We have thus the elements of a true and great conclusion. The fourth beast symbolizes the fourth kingdom, i.e., the Roman. Its ten horns symbolize the fourth kingdom in its state of tenfold division. The little horn, which comes up among the ten, and displaces three of them, symbolizes another kingdom of a character without its parallel for malignity and impiety. Beyond any question, this horn designates some enemy of the saints of the Most High. And now, mark; it makes war with the saints, and prevails against them, and wears them out—how long? Until the millennium? The inspired answer is: until the Ancient of days shall come; until judgment is given to the saints of the Most High; until the time is come that the saints possess the kingdom; all which events are here inseparably connected with the coming of the Son of man with the clouds of heaven; or, what is the same thing, His coming in the glory of His Father, with all the holy angels. There can be no millennium, therefore, before Christ's second coming.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reduction in the Public Debt for the month of March is shown to have been, according to the statement issued last week by the Treasury Department, $14,238,324, making a total in nine months of $81,840,000. The customs receipts during the month were less than those of the same month of last year by $2,119,881. During the nine months there was a falling off in the customs compared with the corresponding period of the last fiscal year of $15,657,792. There was also a decrease in internal revenue in the nine months amounting to $20,962,510. The total decrease in receipts from all sources amounts to $43,870,255. Expenditure has also decreased. The total decrease for the three quarters amounts to $18,540,052. Of that amount $4,569,742 has been saved in interest, and about the same amount represents lower payments on account of pensions.

The Holding of a Constitutional Convention is advocated by Mr. McCord, of Iowa, who has prepared a joint resolution for introduction to the House authorizing it. He contends that many constitutional questions have arisen since the Constitution was framed which demand changes. His resolution provides for the appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, of a commission, to consist of seventy-six persons, two from each State, of different parties, for the purpose of considering and proposing to the several States the propriety of calling a convention by at least two thirds of the States to propose amendments to the Constitution. The members of the commission are to be called together by a proclamation of the President after their appointment. Among the subjects to which the proposed amendments relate are the Presidential succession, the election of President and Vice-President, the exercise of the veto power, woman suffrage, and a number of other subjects, such as the regulation of trade marks, the establishment of a federal system of popular education, and the freedom of the civil service from political control, which have come up for action since the constitution was adopted, and with which Congress now has no power to deal.

The Bill for Withdrawing the Trade Dollar at its face value and issuing the standard dollar in its place, was passed by the House on April 1st. The last clause of the bill, which was its best feature, was struck out, on Mr. Bland's motion, by a vote of 131 to 118. That clause provided that the silver contained in the trade dollars received into the Treasury should be regarded as part of the bullion required to make the two million standard dollars which Congress orders shall be coined every month. The bill was sent to the Senate, which will, it is expected, restore the clause. There are now more than one hundred and twenty-nine millions of standard silver dollars in the Treasury vaults, and the two millions made last month went there. The public did not want them.

The Dangers of our Present System of Granting divorces have forced themselves on the attention of Congress. A bill has been reported by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate authorizing the collection of statistics with regard to marriage and divorce. It places the work in the hands of the Bureau of Statistics, and the results to be reported to Congress. If the true facts are obtained they will be such as ought to issue in a much-needed reform. Under our existing system the marriage bond is rapidly becoming a subject of contempt. A man who is tired of his wife or a wife who desires a wealthier or more agreeable husband, has no difficulty in obtaining a divorce, and in some States it can be obtained without the proceedings coming to the knowledge of the injured party. The facility with which divorces can be obtained and the carelessness with which judges in certain States grant them are a public scandal, which, for the sake of public morality, ought to be promptly removed. If a carefully considered law were enacted by Congress it would doubtless be adopted in time by the Legislature of every State, and so we might come by an easy process to the best remedy—a uniform divorce law for all the Union.

The Conference Committee of Independent Republicans has issued a circular which deserves the careful attention of all citizens, especially the members of the Republican party and the professional politicians who aspire to the control of that party. It may be particularly commended to the notice of the man who is chairman of the County Committee in the State of New York and to that of the men whose votes placed him there. The circular impresses on all citizens the importance of the duty of attending the primaries and of selecting good and reliable men as delegates to the National Convention. It emphatically assures the Republican party that the State can be carried in 1884 by the Republican party as it was in 1880, providing its ticket commands the approval of the independent and respectable voters. But it also warns them that however satisfactory the party platform may be, the vote of the State will not be cast for a candidate who might, if elected, use the patronage of office as a reward for personal or party service. That is a useful hint to the Stalwarts, who are supposed to hold that the spoils belong to the victors, and to the half-breeds who do not profess that doctrine, but who indorsed the appointment in 1881 to the Collectorship of the Custom House of New York.

Cyclones of a Destructive Character were again reported last week. On April 2d a cyclone struck the town of Oakville, Ind., completely wiping it out of existence. A telegram from Muncie, Ind., says: "At about five o'clock a heavy black cloud came driving from the west and another from the north. The two clouds met over a house two miles west of Oakville, lifted it from its floors and foundations, and tearing it into kindling wood deposited it a distance of over two miles and a half. A minute later the storm struck Oakville, carrying death and destruction in its track. Twenty-seven houses were torn down in a moment. Four persons were killed outright in Oakville, and the fifth died the next morning, while another man, two miles west of Oakville, was also killed, making six killed in all, while fifty are reported wounded. A large warehouse and saw-mill adjoining are in ruins." Telegrams from Columbia, S. C., Huntsville, Ala., Chattanooga, Tenn., and Pittsburg, Penn., state that those cities were also on the same day visited by a cyclone which did much destruction to life and property.

Extraordinary Precautions to Suppress a riot were made in New York on Saturday last. The police received warnings from well-informed persons that a meeting to be held at Cooper Union on Saturday night was likely to develop a riot worse than that in Cincinnati. It was declared that the torch would be applied simultaneously in pre-arranged localities, and that a conflict was inevitable. The police captains had a hundred and fifty men in Cooper Union, and collected five hundred more within call, while in each of the precinct stations a hundred men were under arms. The preparations appear to have awed the malcontents, and the meeting passed without disturbance. Resolutions were, however, passed calling upon the working classes "to organize and carefully prepare with all possible energy for the overthrow of the existing social order."

One Hundred and Twenty Persons Lost their lives on April 3d by the wreck of the White Cross steamer, Daniel Steinemann. The vessel was on her voyage from Antwerp to New York via Halifax, N. S. She left Antwerp on March 30th, and made a good passage until Friday, when she was approaching Halifax. A thick mist prevailed, and the captain, who tried to run into the harbor, appears to have mistaken the Sambro light for that of Chebueto Head. The vessel got among the rocks at that point, and struck slightly. She was backed off, but struck another rock, which broke her propeller and carried away her rudder. Then a scene of utter confusion prevailed. Though the vessel was afloat for an hour only one boat was launched, and in that seven men were saved. As she settled in the water the waves washed the deck, carrying away men, women, and children. The captain and one passenger succeeded in saving themselves by climbing to the masthead, which was above the water when the ship sank. They and the seven men who got away in the boat were all who were saved of 129 on board. Not a woman nor a child escaped.

The Bartholdi Statue to be Erected in the harbor of New York will soon be ready for erection. The work of laying the concrete foundation for it on Bedloe's Island has been commenced. The entire cost of the pedestal to support it and the work of its erection will cost $400,000. The Travellers' Insurance Company, of Hartford, Conn., has generously contributed $1700 toward the fund, besides sending to the press throughout the Union a large colored engraving of the statue, copied from the official picture. The munificence of the Travellers' Company will be heartily appreciated by the trustees, who are having no little difficulty in raising the necessary funds.

A Very Gratifying Political Sign of the times is reported from Ohio. The Ohio correspondent of the leading Republican journal states that in the district which elected ex-Speaker Keifer to Congress "public sentiment has undergone a most decided change during the past few months, and many of the ex-Speaker's political as well as personal friends are free to admit that the recent investigation has not in any manner contributed toward vindicating the ex-Speaker." A personal friend of Mr. Keifer's is reported as saying that Keifer is not likely to be a candidate for renomination when he knows the state of public feeling. That, however, may be considered doubtful. It will be a most encouraging feature of the political situation if the districts grow more particular as to the character of their representatives.

Jerry McAuley has Sufficiently Recovered from his illness to return to his labors in New York. Last week he was again present at the Cremorne Mission, and received a warm welcome. He told the crowded audience that he had received renewed physical strength during his stay at Lakewood, N. J. His face beamed with gratitude as he stood on the platform under the flower-woven legend, "Welcome Home," and told his audience how near death he had been, and how happy he was to be with them again.

Large Temperance Meetings have been Held during the past few weeks in New York, Brooklyn, and several cities in New Jersey by the veteran temperance advocate, Captain Sturdivant. The captain appears to have lost none of his old-time vigor, and the large number of persons who came forward to sign the pledge and put on the blue ribbon testified to the power he exercises over his hearers. Temperance societies desiring to secure Captain Sturdivant's services may address him at 805 Broadway, New York

An Appeal for Aid is Made by the Committee having in charge the meetings conducted by Mr. C. W Sawyer in the Hall of Cooper Union New York. W. E. Dodge, Jr., the chairman, states that the rent of Cooper Union and the smaller hall, Nos. 14 and 16 Fourth Avenue, the salary of Mr. Sawyer and the various incidental expenses, make it wise and necessary to raise about $10,000 each year.

A Fatal Shelter was Constructed by a Boy in South Carolina recently. A despatch from Columbia, S. C., states that a lad of fourteen, residing in Spartanburg County, began digging a cave in the bank of the Tiger River several days ago, to make a place of safety from cyclones. His parents did not know it. He was missed on April 1st. He had told some children of his intention, and a clue was thus obtained. Upon searching along the banks of the river it was found that the cave had fallen in and that the boy's body had been crushed almost beyond recognition. Hundreds of similar pits and caves are being made throughout the counties in which the recent cyclones did such great damage. So terrible is the havoc caused by the cyclones that it is no wonder that timid persons try to make for themselves a place of refuge against them. It is marvellous, however, that men should persist, in spite of warning, in doing the same thing against the storm of the day of God's wrath. Nevertheless, the self-made refuges of works and self-righteousness are often preferred to the divinely appointed refuge (Heb. 6 : 18).

Defective Life Preservers were Discovered on board several steamers by the inspectors during their recent investigation. In many cases they found the cork floats to be miserable shams, entirely unfit to save a human being from sinking at sea. It is required by law that all life-preservers must contain at least six pounds of good sound cork blocks, capable of sustaining a buoyancy of twenty-four pounds. In examining the floats on a Michigan steamer, the local inspector found them all short-weight, and capable of buoying only seventeen pounds each. In Boston a twenty-four-pound weight tied to a life-preserver taken from a ferry-boat sunk it like a lump of lead. About two hundred more from the same boat were found likewise faulty and condemned. These preservers were furnished by contract, were made of black cork, and cost about seventy-five cents each. From the examinations made so far it seems that the most faulty life-preservers are of recent make. Old ones, which have been carefully stored away for years on ferry-boats, came up to the requirements. A reason given for the deficiency in the new article is that competition has forced down the price so that dishonest manufacturers, in order to make ample profit, have stuffed their goods with sawdust instead of cork. This report will doubtless cause people to be chary of trusting the new life-preservers. The same disposition may be recommended with reference to new doctrines and theories. To some people a new interpretation or teaching has a charm, but there is no way of saving the soul to be relied upon but the divine way through Christ (Gal. 1 : 6–8).

A Mistake as to the Nature of a Plant caused the death of a young man named James Richards in Cleveland on March 30th. He went out fishing on that day, and while walking along the banks of the river found a plant which he supposed to be white balm. He dug it up and ate a part of the root, giving some to his two companions, who happily ate but a very small quantity. In a very short time afterward all felt unwell, but Richards was so seriously ill that his companions decided to take him home immediately. He became insensible on the way, fell into convulsions, and died. He had eaten a deadly poison. His fatal mistake was caused by the resemblance existing between the poison and the harmless plant. It is often so in spiritual matters. Some fall into sin with their eyes open, but a far greater number are deluded by Satan, who deceives them as he did our first parents by representing the evil as a thing "to be desired to make one wise" (II Cor. 11 : 14).

An Extraordinary Application to the Recorder of Paterson, N. J., was recently made by a lady of that city. She appeared before him to invoke his assistance in relieving her from a peculiar affliction. She says there is a society of men who have the power of taking away the souls of people and subjecting these souls to all sorts of unpleasant treatment, returning them to their owners when through with them. Her soul has been thus taken away at times, and she wants this sort of thing stopped. She presented a long and detailed statement of the indignities her soul had suffered at the hands of these people and of the permanent injury they had done it. The recorder, who took a humorous view of the application, told her that he could not issue warrants for the arrest of the ringleaders of the society who interfered with her soul, and he did not believe any power short of the Supreme Court of the United States could afford her relief in the premises. She deferentially agreed with him, and said she would bring the matter to the attention of that august tribunal. The lady is evidently insane, though it was stated she is perfectly rational on other subjects, and manages her affairs with remarkable ability. Other people who are not insane have reason to make a similar complaint, but if they are wise enough they carry it not to an earthly tribunal, but to Him whose power and authority the enemy of souls is forced to acknowledge (Mark 1 : 23–27).

A Young Man's Reckless Leap on the Elevated railroad in New York exasperated a conductor last week. A train was just leaving the Twenty-third Street station when a young man hurried out of the ticket office on to the platform. Seeing that the car gates were closed he made a leap, cleared them, and alighted safely on the car-platform. The feat was a dangerous one, as the young man, if he had missed his footing, would have fallen to the street beneath. It startled a dozen or more passengers who saw it. The burly conductor was dumbfounded at first, but as soon as he had satisfied himself that nobody had been hurt gave vent to his indignation. "Wot do yer mean by jumpin' over that 'ere gate?" he shouted, laying a heavy hand on the trembling young man. "I didn't want to get left," was the apologetic reply. "Yer didn't; well, I reckon yer'll get left at the next station. Suppose yer had fallen into the street and smashed yerself all ter pieces? I'd have bin in a nice fix, wouldn't I? Why, they would have docked me two weeks' wages." And at the next station he kept his word by putting the young man off the train, saying he would not carry such a careless fellow. We count a man foolish who imperils his life in so reckless a manner, but men who voluntarily place their souls in peril in a mad race for wealth or fame are often admired and applauded, though the apostle warns us of the danger of the act (1 Tim. 6 : 9).

PUTTING THE HAND UPON THE HEAD OF THE SACRIFICE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering; and it shall be accepted for him to make atonement for him. And he shall kill the bullock before the Lord."—Leviticus 1 : 4, 5.

Two Matters Essential in Sacrifice—The Act of Appropriation—I. It Meant Confession—Of Sin—Of Impotence—A Child's Definition—Of Desert of Punishment—II. It Meant Acceptance—Of Principle and Plan—The Sacred Person—An Arab Chief's Mistake—III. It Meant Transference — Religions Differing in Tense —IV. Identification — A Conscript in the French War—Useless Talking—Useless Consultation—Useless Tears—A Very Good Spelling.

No doubt there are clear distinctions in the teaching of the burnt offering, the meat offering, the peace offering, and the sin offering. In those various sacrifices we have views of our Lord's atoning work taken from different standpoints. On another occasion it will be profitable to note these delightful lessons and lay them to heart; but at this time I am not about to enter into such matters.

I desire to preach this morning so that I may fulfil the prayer of a little boy who, one Saturday evening before he went to bed, said in his prayer, "Lord, grant that our minister may say something to-morrow that I may understand." I am very sorry that such a prayer should ever be necessary, but I am afraid it is not only needful for children, but sometimes for grown-up people to pray, "Lord, help our minister to say something that we can understand, and that is worth understanding." Some of my brethren appear to dwell on high Olympus among the clouds; it were better if they lived on Calvary. Little dew comes from the dark mountains of intellectual dreaminess; far more refreshing drops are found upon the Hermon of the Gospel. I feel like Dr. Guthrie when he desired those around him to sing him a bairn's hymn; I would be a little child in preaching to you. Simple things are the most sublime, and to a sick man the most sweet. I wish to be plain as a pikestaff in setting forth the way of expiation by the death of Jesus.

I have a reason also for preaching to-day which to myself is powerful, though you may smile at it. It is this: If I have but few shots to fire, I should like each time to hit the centre of the target; that is to say, if I may only speak to you once to-day, after having been laid aside for three weeks, I desire to speak only upon topics which touch the vitals of godliness. I would plunge into the heart of the matter, and deal with the essence and soul of true religion. There are some things that may be or may not be, and yet no great evil will come either way; but there are other things that must be, or all goes wrong; of these must-be's I would now speak. Some things are important for the well-being of Christians, but certain other things are absolutely essential to the very being of Christians; and it is upon these urgent necessaries that I shall now speak—namely, concerning the precious blood of the Lord Jesus Christ and our faith in it; for these two things are of the highest importance, and they cannot too often be brought before our minds.

Two matters were essential in the sacrifices of the ceremonial law; and you have them both in our text: "He shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering," and "he shall kill the bullock before the Lord." The appropriation by the offerer and the death of the offering are most fitly joined together, and must neither of them be overlooked. All through the book of Leviticus the laying on of the hand and the killing of the victim are mentioned in immediate connection. These are each of them so important, and so full of meaning, that we must have a sermon upon each of them.

Let us on the present occasion look at the leading act of the offerer: "He shall lay his hand upon the head of the burnt offering." All that goes before is important, but this is so far as the offerer is concerned. Before he reached this point, the person who presented the offering had to make a selection of the animal to be brought before the Lord. It must be of a certain age, and it must be without blemish; and for this latter reason a careful examination had to be made; for the Lord would not accept a sacrifice that was lame, or broken, or bruised, or deficient in any of its parts or in any way blemished. He required an offering "without spot."

Now I invite all those who seek reconciliation with God to look about them, and consider whether the Lord Jesus Christ be such an atoning sacrifice as they need and as God will accept. If you know of any other atonement for sin, examine it well, and I am persuaded that you will find many a fault and flaw in it; but concerning the Lamb of God, I have no question; you may search, and test, and try, but you shall find no blemish in Him. If there were any fault in Him, either of excess or deficiency, you might well refuse Him; but since there is nothing of the kind, I pray you joyfully to accept Him at once. Come now and look at the Lord Jesus Christ, both at His Godhead and His manhood, at His life and His death, His acts and His sufferings, and see if there be any iniquity in Him. He knew no sin; He had no acquaintance or dealing with it; "He was holy, harmless, undefiled." After you have well examined His blessed person and His spotless character, if you arrive at the conclusion that He is a fit and acceptable sacrifice for you to present before the Lord, then I long that you may take the much more practical step, and accept the Lord Jesus to be your representative, your sin offering, your burnt offering, your substitute, and your sacrifice.

I. To our work, then, at once. What did that mean? It meant four things, and the first was

CONFESSION.

He that laid his hand upon the head of the offering made confession of sin. I do not care what offering it was that was brought by a believing Israelite, there was always a mention of sin in it, either implied or expressed. This is true of the burnt offering, but in other sacrifices, especially in the trespass offering, where the hands were laid upon the victim's head, the offerer was charged to "confess that he hath sinned in that thing" wherein he had trespassed. There was a detailed confession of sin joined with the laying on of hands in the case of the scapegoat. See then that if you would have Him to be your atonement whom God has appointed to be His sacrifice, you must come to Him confessing your sin. Your touch of Jesus must be the touch of one who is consciously guilty. He belongs not to you unless you are a sinner.

Ah, Lord, confession of sin is to some of us, for we can do no other than acknowledge and bemoan our guilt! Here we stand before thee self-condemned, and with aching hearts we each one cry, "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy loving-kindness." Do any of you refuse to make confession of guilt? Then, do not think it hard if, since according to your own proud notions you are not sinners, the Lord should provide for you no Saviour! Should medicine be prepared for those who are not sick? Wherefore should the righteous be invited to partake of pardon? Why should a righteousness be provided for the innocent? You are the rich and you are sent empty away; the hungry shall be filled with good things. Go to; you that say, "I am clean; I am not defiled;" I tell you that you have no part in the great sacrifice for sin. O self-righteous man, you make out God to be a fool, since He gave His only-begotten Son to die, when according to you there was no necessity for His death. Many of us come most readily at this time and lay our hand upon the head of the appointed sacrifice, even our Lord Jesus Christ, because we have sin to confess, and we feel that we need a Saviour, even a Saviour for the guilty.

In this act there was also a confession of self-impotence. The believer who brought the bullock did as good as say, "I cannot of myself keep the law of God, or make atonement for my past breaches of the commandments, neither can I hope through future obedience to become acceptable with God; therefore I bring this sacrifice because I myself cannot become acceptable without it." This is a truth which you and I must also confess if we would be partakers of Christ, and become "accepted in the Beloved." O brethren, what can we do without Christ? I like what was said by a child in the Sunday-school, when the teacher said, "You have been reading that Christ is precious; what does that mean?" The children stayed a little while, till at last one boy replied, "Father said the other day that mother was precious, for 'whatever should we do without her?'" This is a capital explanation of the word "precious." You and I can truly say of the Lord Jesus Christ that He is precious to us, for what should we do, what could we do without Him? We come and take Him now to be ours because if He be not ours we are utterly undone.

If you could read the text in the Hebrew you would find it runs thus: "He shall put His hand upon the head of the burnt offering, and it shall be accepted for Him to make a cover for Him"—to make atonement for Him. The word is copher in the Hebrew—a cover. Why, then, do we hide behind the Lord Jesus? Because we feel our need of and to act as an interposition between us and the righteous Judge of all the earth. Oh, what a blessing it is, dear friends, when our sense of self-impotence is so great that we have no desire to make a show of ourselves, but on the contrary long to be out of sight, and therefore we enter into Christ to be hidden in Him, covered in the sacrifice which God has prepared. That is the second confession, and thus we have a confession of sin and of need of covering.

There was a further confession of the desert of punishment. When a man brought his bullock, or his goat, or his lamb, he put his hand on it, and as he knew that the poor creature must die he thus acknowledged that he himself deserved death. The victim fell in the dust, struggling, bleeding, dying. The offerer confessed that this was what he deserved. He owned that death from the Almighty hand was due to him. And oh, when a man comes to that, when he owns that God will be justified when He speaks in anger, and clear when He judges and pronounces sentence in justice; when he confesses that he cannot deliver himself, but has so sinned as to deserve to be accursed of God, and adjudged to feel the horrors of the second death, then is he brought into a condition in which the great sacrifice will be precious to him.

II. Secondly, the laying on of hands meant

ACCEPTANCE.

The offerer by laying his hand upon the victim's head signified that he acknowledged the offering to be for himself.

He accepted, first of all, the principle and the plan. Far too many kick against the idea of our being saved by substitution or representation. Why do they rebel against it? For my part, if God will but graciously save me in any way I will be far enough from raising any objection. Why should I complain of that which is to deliver me from destruction? If the Lord does not object to the way, why should I? Moreover, as to this salvation by the merit of another, I do remember that my first ruin did not come by myself. I am not speaking to excuse my personal sin, but yet it is true that I was ruined before I committed any actual sin by the disobedience of the first father of the race who was my representative. How this was just, I do not know, but I am sure it must be right, or God would not so reveal it. At any rate, it is not for you and for me to raise objections against ourselves, but to feel that if God sees that this is a proper way of salvation, He knows best and we cheerfully accept what He approves. Who is there among you that will not do so? God grant that no one may hold out against a method of grace so simple, so sure, so available!

But, then, mind. After you have accepted the plan and the way, but you must go on to accept the sacred person whom God provides. It would have been a very foolish thing if the offerer had stood at the altar and said, "Good Lord, I accept the plan of sacrifice; be it burnt offering or sin offering, I agree thereto." He did much more than that; he accepted that very bullock as his offering, and in token thereof placed his hand upon it. I pray you beware of resting satisfied with understanding and approving the plan of salvation. I heard of one who anxiously desired to be the means of the conversion of a young man, and one said to him, "You may go to him, and talk to him, but you will get him no further, for he is exceedingly well acquainted with the plan of salvation." When the friend began to speak with the young man, he received for an answer, "I am much obliged to you, but I do not know that you can tell me much, for I have long known and admired the plan of salvation by the substitutionary sacrifice of Christ." Alas! he was resting in the plan, but he had not believed in the person. The plan of salvation is most blessed, but it can avail us nothing unless we believe. What is the comfort of a plan of a house if you do not enter the house itself? What is the good of a plan of clothing if you have not a rag to cover you?

YOU MUST NOT STOP THERE,

Have you never heard of

at Cairo who was very ill and went to the missionary, and the missionary said he could give him a prescription? He did so; and a week after he found the Arab none the better. "Did you take my prescription?" he asked. "Yes; I ate every morsel of the paper." He dreamed that he was going to be cured by the plan of the medicine. He should have gone to the chemist's and had the prescription made up, and then it might have wrought him some good. So it is with salvation; it is not the plan, it is the carrying out of that plan by the Lord Jesus in His death on our behalf. The offerer laid his hands literally upon the bullock; he found something substantial there, something which he could handle and touch; even so do we lean upon the real and true work of Jesus, the most substantial thing under heaven.

III. But thirdly, this laying of the hand upon the sacrifice meant not only acceptance, but also

TRANSFERENCE.

The offerer had confessed his sin, and had accepted the victim then presented to be his sacrifice, and now he mentally realizes that his guilt is by divine appointment to pass over from himself to the sacrifice. Of course this was only done in type and figure at the door of the Tabernacle; but in our case the Lord Jesus Christ as a matter of literal fact has borne the sin of His people. "The Lord hath made to meet on Him the iniquity of us all." "Who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree." "Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many."

But do we by faith pass our sins from ourselves to Christ? I answer, No; in some senses, no. But by faith he that accepts Christ as his Saviour agrees with what the Lord did ages ago, for we read in the book of Isaiah the prophet, "The Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." That was Jehovah's own act in the ages past; and it was complete when Jesus stood as the great sin-bearer, and redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us. All the transgressions of His people were laid on Him when He poured out His soul unto death, and "was numbered with the transgressors, and bare the sin of many." Then and there He expiated all the guilt of all His people; for He "finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness." There are around us at this day, and they mainly differ in tense. The general religion of mankind is "Do," but the religion of a true Christian is "Done." "It is finished" is the believer's conquering word. Christ has made atonement, and we accept it as done. So in that respect we do lay our sins on Jesus, the holy Lamb of God, because we set our humble seal to that grand transaction which was the confirming of the covenant of old.

The laying of the hand upon the head of the sacrifice meant a transference of guilt to the victim, and, furthermore, a confidence in the efficacy of the sacrifice there and then presented. "I am a great sinner," says one, "therefore, I cannot be saved." Man alive, did Christ die for those who are not sinners? What was the need of a Saviour except for sinners? Has Jesus actually borne sin, or has He not? If He has borne our sin, it is gone; if He has not borne it, our sin will never depart. Assuredly, you, my hearer, if you be a believer, cannot have sin if Jesus has taken it away. You are made clean in the sight of God because your uncleanness has been washed away in the blood of the great sacrifice. See you not this way of salvation? If you do see it, will you not accept it now?

IV. Once more, this laying of the hand upon the head of the victim meant

IDENTIFICATION.

The worshipper who laid his hand on the bullock said, "Be pleased, O great Lord, to identify me with this bullock, and this bullock with me. There has been a transferring of my sin, now I beseech thee let me be judged as being in the victim, and represented thereby." Now consider that which happened to the sacrifice? The knife was unsheathed, and the victim was slain. He was not merely bound, but killed; and the man stood there and said, "That is me; that is the fate which I deserve." I beseech you when you think of our blessed Lord to identify yourselves with Him. When your substitute rendered to the law of God the penalty which it demanded, you virtually rendered it. "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," and you have died, believer; you have paid the debt in the person of the Lord Jesus Christ whom by the laying on of your hands you have accepted to be your substitute. You know that story—it is a capital one, well worth telling a thousand times. In the great French war a person was drawn for but as he could not leave his family, he paid a very heavy sum for a substitute. That substitute went to the war and was killed. After a time Napoleon called out the rest of the conscription and the man was summoned because he had been formerly drawn; but he refused to serve. He said, "No, by my substitute I have served, and I am dead and buried; I cannot be made to serve again." It is said that the question was carried up to the highest court, and laid before the Emperor himself, and the Emperor decided that the man's claim of exemption was a just one. He had fulfilled the conscription by a substitute; that substitute had served for life, and could not be called upon to do more; and therefore the person for whom he was the substitute could not further be summoned under that conscription. This sets forth our joy and glory; we are identified with Christ, we are crucified with Him, buried with Him, and in Him raised to newness of life. "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live." "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God."

Now, suppose that the Jew, who went up to the tabernacle and to the altar, when he came there had been content to talk about the sacrifice without personally placing his hand on it. I am afraid that this is what many of you have done hitherto. You are pleased to hear the Gospel, you take pleasure in the doctrine of substitution, and you know true doctrine from the current falsehoods of the hour; for all which I am very glad; but yet you are not saved because you have not taken Christ to be your own Saviour. You are like persons who should say, "We are hungry; but we admit that bread is a very proper food for men, besides which we know what sort of food makes bone, and what makes muscle, and what makes flesh." They keep on talking all day long about the various qualities of food; do they feel refreshed? No. Is their hunger gone? No. I should suppose that, if they are at all healthy, their appetite is increased, and the more they talk about food the more sharp set they become. Do go beyond talking about Christ, and learn to feed upon Christ.

Suppose, again, that the Israelite instead of talking with his friends, had thought it wise to consult with one of the priests. "Might I speak with you, sir, a little? Have you a little room somewhere at the back where you could talk with me, and pray with me?" "Yes," says the priest, "what ails you?" "My sin lies heavy upon me." The priest replies, "You know that a sin offering lieth at the door, and God will accept it at your hands." But you say, "I beg you to explain this matter more fully to me." The priest answers, "I will explain it as well as I can; but the whole of my explanation will end in this one thing—bring a sacrifice, and over its head confess your sin, and let an atonement be made." Sitting in your pew this morning, without speaking to me or any living man or woman, I exhort you to believe in Jesus. Stretch out your withered hand, God helping you, and lay it on the head of Christ, and say, "I believe in the merit of His precious blood. I look to the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world." Why, man, you are saved as sure as you are alive; for he that layeth the hand of faith upon this sacrifice is saved thereby.

But I see another Israelite, and he stands by his offering, and begins to weep and groan, and bewail himself. I am not sorry to see him weep, for I trust he is sincerely confessing his guilt; but why does he not place his hand on the sacrifice? He cries and he sighs, for he is such a sinner; but he does not touch the offering. The victim is presented, and in order that it may avail for him, he must lay his hand upon it; but this vital act he neglects and even refuses to perform. "Ah," he says, "I am in such trouble, I am in such deep distress," and he begins starting a difficulty. You hunt that difficulty down, but there he stands, still groaning and moaning, and producing another difficulty, and yet another, world without end. The sacrifice is slain, but he has no part in it, for he has not laid his hand upon it, and he goes away with all the burden of his guilt upon him, though the sacrificial blood has reddened the ground on which he stood. That is what some of you do.

Observe that the Israelite had to put his hand upon a victim which was not slain as yet, but was killed afterward. This was to remind him that the Messiah was not yet come; but you, beloved, have to trust in a Christ who has come, who has lived, who has died, who has finished the work of salvation, who has gone up into the glory, and who ever liveth to make intercession for transgressors. Will you trust Him or will you not? I cannot waste words; I must come to the point. John Bunyan says that one Sunday when he was playing the game of tip-cat on Elstow Green, as he was about to strike the cat with the stick, he seemed to hear a voice saying to him, "Wilt thou leave thy sins and go to heaven, or wilt thou keep thy sins and go to hell?" This morning the voice from heaven sounds forth this question, Will you trust in Christ and go to heaven, or will you keep apart from Him and go to hell? for thither you must go unless Jesus becomes your Mediator and your atoning sacrifice.

WILL YOU HAVE CHRIST OR NO?

I hear you say, "But"—Oh that I could thrust your "buts" aside. Will you have Christ or not? "Oh, but"—Nay, your "buts" ought to be thrown into limbo; I fear they will be your ruin. Will you trust Christ or not? If your answer is, "I trust Him with all my heart," then you are a saved man. I say not you shall be saved; but you are saved. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." You know how our dear friend, Mr. Hill, put it the other night at the prayer-meeting. "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." "H-A-T-H,"—that spells—"Got it." Very good spelling too. If you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ you have eternal life in present possession; go your way and sing for joy of heart, because the Lord has loved you. Mind you keep on singing until you join the choristers before the eternal throne. The Lord save every person that shall hear or read this sermon, for Jesus sake. Amen.

AN EGYPTIAN BEDOUIN'S JOURNEY.

Our picture on the next page represents a Soudanese Arab and his wife prosecuting a journey from one town in the desert to another. There are two things at least which an Egyptian Arab highly values, and makes strenuous efforts to possess, first, a good, much-enduring, good-tempered camel, and second, a trusty gun, such as the man in the picture is seen to be carrying.

The camel and his Arab master have so many points of resemblance that a Bedouin of Shomer once said, "God created the Bedouin for the camel, and the camel for the Bedouin." The camel has the reputation of being very docile, but it appears that sometimes he is very much the contrary; he takes no heed to his rider, pays no attention whether he be on his back or not. walks straight on when once set a-going, merely because he is too stupid to turn aside, and then, should some tempting thorn or green branch allure him out of the path, continues to walk on in this new direction, simply because he is too dull to turn back into the right road.

His only care is to cross as much pasture as he conveniently can while pacing mechanically onward; and for effecting this his long, flexible neck places him at great advantage, and a hard blow or a downright kick alone has any influence on him, whether to direct or impel. In a word, he is from first to last an undomesticated and intractable animal, rendered serviceable by stupidity alone, without much skill on his master's part or any co-operation on his own, save that of extreme passiveness. Neither attachment nor even habit impresses him; never tame, though not wide awake enough to be exactly wild.

One passion alone he possesses, namely revenge, of which he furnishes many a hideous example, while in carrying it out he shows an unexpected degree of premeditated malice, united meanwhile with all the cold stupidity of his usual character. Mr. Palgrave, a celebrated Eastern traveller, gives the following instance. He says: "A lad of about fourteen had conducted a large camel, laden with wood, from one village to another at half an hour's distance or so. As the animal loitered or turned out of the way, its conductor struck it repeatedly, and harder than it seems to have thought he had a right to do. But not finding the occasion exactly favorable for taking immediate quits, it 'bode its time,' nor was that time very long in coming.

"A few days later the same lad had to reconduct the beast, but unladen, to his own village. When they were about half-way on the road, and at some distance from any habitation, the camel suddenly stopped, looked deliberately round in every direction to assure itself that no one was within sight, and finding the road far and near clear of passers-by made a step forward, seized the unfortunate boy's head in its monstrous mouth, and lifting him up in the air, flung him down again on the earth with the upper part of his skull completely torn off, and his brains scattered on the ground. Having thus satisfied its revenge the brute quietly resumed its pace toward the village, as though nothing were the matter, till some men who had observed the whole, though, unhappily, at too great a distance to be able to afford timely help, came up and killed it."

The Bedaween are supposed to be the descendants of Ishmael, of whom it was prophecied that his hand should be against every man and every man's hand against him (Gen. 16 : 12). They have no houses but wander from place to place in the desert, sleeping in tents. They have no national organization and have never been absolutely subject to any foreign conqueror. They are bound together, however, by religious customs and beliefs, which form the only bond of order among them. They are divided into tribes, over each of which a sheik exercises patriarchal authority. Their complexion is brown and their persons are lean, sinewy and active.

MARY BEAUMONT'S DECISION.

It was a long time after her husband's death before Widow Beaumont could bring her mind to taking a boarder. She pinched and economized in every conceivable way ; but in spite of all her care the little capital she received from the insurance company on her husband's life policy grew smaller. She was a plain, simple, honest woman, a farmer's daughter, unused to city ways, having no idea of how to obtain employment or to perform its duties if she obtained it. Her house was as clean as hands could make it, and her furniture was polished until you could see your face in it. She was always busy cleaning or washing, but still the necessity of earning money somehow was not met. Her daughter Mary, a well-grown girl of twelve years, was still at school, and the widow meant to keep her there another year or two if she lived on bread and water to do it. "Why don't you take a boarder or two?" said her friends. "You have plenty of room." But the widow thought her furniture would be spoiled, and she could not bear the idea of being a servant in her own house.

At last, however, it had to be done. A young music teacher, Henry Leslie, came with excellent references, and was admitted. He brought his piano with him, and was installed in the widow's best parlor. He was out most of the day attending the schools where he gave lessons, and in the evening a few pupils came to him for private lessons in music and singing. Altogether he was a very acceptable inmate of the house, paid regularly, and was quiet and friendly.

One day when he was alone he asked the widow if Mary would not like to learn the piano. Mary heard, and begged that she might try. Mr. Leslie was pleased with the child's eagerness, and when she had received one lesson he was astonished at her intelligence and quickness. Then he induced her to sing, and the scope and sweetness of her voice convinced him that she had unusual musical powers. After that Mary's music lessons were a source of delight to teacher and pupil. Mr. Leslie, weary with teaching children without taste and with no love for the art, who learned because they were compelled to learn, found a rare pleasure in Mary's intense earnestness, her rapt attention, and the rapid progress she made. So matters went on for five years, until Mary was an accomplished musician and a singer whose voice enchanted all who heard it.

Mr. Leslie was very proud of his pupil. He obtained for her the post of organist at one of the city churches, and found several pupils to whom she gave lessons. She was earning a small income, and was now able to help her mother ; but she longed to do more, and the praises she heard of her musical talents encouraged her ambition, and she begged Mr. Leslie to help her to get some more profitable engagements.

About that time a new preacher came to the church of which Mary was organist. For the first time since she had been there she let her music books alone during the sermon, and listened intently. She was interested and impressed. As the preacher concluded with an earnest appeal to unconverted people to decide for Christ, Mary felt an intense desire to accept the offered salvation. All the following week she was ill at ease. Even music seemed to have lost its charms. The next Sunday she paid even closer attention, and after the evening service she had a private conversation with the clergyman, in which she gave her heart to Christ.

The following day Mr. Leslie asked Mary and her mother to come into his room.

"I have at last succeeded," he said, "in procuring you an engagement, Mary. I consider you are on the high road to fortune if not to fame. You can commence your duties at once with a capital salary, and you will only need a little special training, which you can take as you go on, to become one of the famous singers of the world."

Widow Beaumont's eyes sparkled as she heard. She kissed her daughter, and poured out a profusion of thanks to Mr. Leslie.

"What is the engagement, Mr. Leslie?" Mary asked.

Mr. Leslie explained that a leading theatrical manager was preparing to produce a piece in which an exquisite song was introduced. It occurred in a minor part, which would involve scarcely any study and in which there were other musical pieces. The lady would have little to say, little to do, but she must have a fine voice and a brilliant touch. "Both of which I could conscientiously say you have, Mary. And the manager has accepted you on my assurances. It is really a magnificent opening. We shall hear you sing in opera yet."

"How can we ever show you our gratitude, Mr Leslie?" said the widow "Why don't you speak, Mary? Mr. Leslie has taken your breath away, I guess."

"No, mother, not that. I thank Mr. Leslie for his kindness ; I know all I owe him, and I appreciate this opportunity, but I cannot take it."

Henry Leslie looked at her in amazement. His hand mechanically dropped on the keys of the piano near which he was sitting, and he struck a chord as a relief to his astonishment.

Then he pointed out again the advantages of the offer, and asked Mary if she had any valid reason for declining it. Mary told her story, and ended with the declaration that she would rather remain poor and unknown than win wealth and fame on the stage.

"I think your scruples absurd," said Mr. Leslie, still toying with the keys. "Many Christian people go to the theatre, and if they go there and pay to be amused, surely you may go and be paid to amuse them."

"I am not responsible for them, Mr. Leslie, but I am responsible for my own acts, and I dare not go."

It was a long conference, Mr. Leslie arguing and pleading and Mrs. Beaumont entreating and insisting, but Mary remained firm. She was resolved that her kind friend's respect, even her mother's love, should be sacrificed rather than she would grieve her Saviour. "He that loveth father or mother more than me is not worthy of me" rang in her ears and held her to her resolution.

Mary Beaumont has never sung in opera, her voice has never been heard from the stage of a theatre, but she is no longer poor, and her mother has lived to see that consistent adherence to principle does not necessarily involve poverty. She, too, has become a believer in Christ, and thanks God that her daughter was enabled by God's strength to resist the temptation to enter a path in which many have fallen never to rise again.

GOLD MINING IN THE OLDEN TIME.

Before the days of hydraulic mining such a scene as that depicted in our illustration was a common sight throughout California. Even now there are districts, especially on the river bars, where there are no grades to render improved methods practicable, groups of Chinamen may be seen using the primitive cradle or rocker, and gaining results that satisfy the patient plodding race. It is remarkable that the latest improvements in hydraulic mining retain the principle of the rocker. Those pioneer miners had the true secret of their labor, and the inventions now in use are merely the rocker enlarged, with labor-saving appliances added. The original cradle was an oblong box with graded sieves laid in tiers, and blankets were alternated to catch and retain the precious dust, the whole being set on transverse rockers like a child's cradle.

After the cradle came "the long tom," which was a cradle with a stream of water doing the work of separating the gold from the earth and gravel, which operation was formerly effected by the motion the miner gave to the cradle. Still later other boxes were added to the long tom fitted with riffles to catch the finer gold as it escaped with the stream of water. This led to the ground sluice, in which the bed-rock did duty as a sluice, the stream being turned against the rock by the miner cutting a new channel with his pick. The effect of this stream saved an immense amount of labor, and was so effectual that it suggested the idea of applying a greater force of water to the deep gravel deposits on the high banks of the cañons of the streams. That was done by a similar method to that adopted in our fire engines. The miner conveyed the water by flumes to a point above that which he intended to work, and thence by pipes to the foot of the bank; then he applied his hose with a fireman's nozzle at the end. With the nozzle in his hand he could direct a powerful jet of water upon the bank. This was the common method in use in 1856.

The hydraulic monitors now in use first appeared in 1865, since which time the improvements have been directed to the increase of force with which they can send the jet of water on the rocks, the increase in the volume of water, and the more powerful means of moving the monitors. The monitors resemble huge cannons, which are easily turned by balanced weights, so that with one hand the miner can change the direction of the stream, while with the other hand he can regulate the volume of the water. A recent visitor states that he saw rocks many tons in weight tossed about like pebbles by a well-directed shaft of water from the mouth of a monitor.

The public has been familiarized by Bret Harte and other writers with the life of the mining camps. Many touching stories have been told of the rough men whom the prospect of speedy riches attracted to the place. Some of them were ruined aristocrats from Europe, others bankrupt business men from our Eastern cities, and others criminals who fled for their lives and dropping their identity spent their lives, in searching for gold, which they gambled away as fast as they obtained it. Yet in such a reckless crowd it was remarkable how the religious teaching of their early years would, on any solemn occasion, come back to the memory.

The following is a description of a funeral service witnessed in one of those early mining camps by a visitor from the East: The dead man having been religiously trained had frequently, especially during his last illness, given expression to pious remarks, and when he died the miners resolved that he should be buried with a religious service. A minister was found and brought to the camp. The scene was impressive as these rugged men stood around the open grave while the beautiful hymn, "O God! our help in ages past," was sung, and a part of the Burial Service was read. When the reader, himself deeply moved, uttered, "To whom shall we seek for succor but unto Thee, O Lord?" eyes that were but seldom lifted God-ward were upturned as if in appeal to the Helper of the helpless, and when offering the closing sentences of an extempore prayer, "That God would guide them through this world of sorrow and danger, and bring them unto His heavenly kingdom at last," lips that were unaccustomed to pray, responded with a solemn and fervent "Amen." Here, for the time, national prejudices and sectarian differences sank out of sight—one sect only, believers in Jesus, was here recognized, having one article only in their creed—faith in His name. Service over, the mourners retired, one of whom returned a few evenings after and placed a head-board over the quiet grave, on which the initials "J. S." were rudely carved, and left the sleeper in his lone repose.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A Stricken Household.

When Hester reached her father's house she crossed over to the opposite pavement, and stood for a minute or two looking at it with tearful eyes. It had always been a dull, gloomy, low-spirited looking house; but now, with the large casement on the upper floor closed with shutters, it seemed more cheerless than before. The faded books in the shop windows, which had not been moved since Rose had fled, and the panes stained with the dust and the rain, were very mournful to look at; and they affected Hester as if they had been living things, conscious of neglect. Her feelings were not very definite, but there was a sort of yearning pity toward the deserted old place, which seemed abandoned by the sun and all cheering influences.

There was not a sound to be heard within. She peeped into her father's room, and saw him sitting there in gray and grim silence, with his arms crossed upon his breast and his head drooping, awaiting in this attitude the entrance of any chance customer, which disturbed him but seldom, as his neighbors yet shrank from intruding needlessly upon his grief. Hester closed the door gently, and stole up the creaking old staircase, and through the empty rooms to Lawson's attic. He was stooping over his press in the window; but the ardor with which he had formerly pursued his work was dead, and his withered face was wrinkled with anxiety. She wished Lawson to be the first to speak; but he was in a silent mood, and for some time his work went on, without a word being spoken on either side.

"Lawson," asked Hester, after a long perseverance in silence, "what do you think about my mamma, my step-mother, you know?"

"Don't trouble your little head about her," answered Lawson; "you just think about your own mother. I'll show you her picture again."

"No," interrupted Hester, as he was about to reach down the portfolio, "I want you to tell me truly why people talk so about her. They point at me in the streets; and I heard a woman say, 'I hear that's her little girl, poor thing!' I wish to know what it is all for; and I mean you to tell me, Lawson," she added imperiously; "how am I to know what I ought to do, if I don't know what she has done? She was just as kind, and as good, and as pretty when she went away that morning as she ever was. Tell me directly, Lawson."

She had descended from her seat on the step-ladder, and was standing before him drawn up to her fullest height, with her head thrown back in an attitude of childish authority at once amusing and graceful. Lawson sat down on a high three-legged stool, which was his ordinary seat, and confronted her, his sallow skin flushed with a dull red, and his eyes not meeting hers, but fixed upon some point behind her, as if he saw and was speaking to some person who stood at the back.

"I'd tear my tongue out," he said, "before I'd tell the child. But if I knew where that woman was, I'd follow her to the world's end, and strike her down dead. As long as she's alive, she's the master's wife, and I know you cannot come back till she is dead. Only give me time and opportunity, and I'll see her dead at my feet."

"Lawson, Lawson," cried Hester in affright, "who are you speaking to? What are you speaking about?"

He lifted himself up slowly, and set doggedly to work again, turning a deaf ear to all Hester's questions and entreaties. Before him on the press was a volume bound in purple morocco, the title of which he was lettering in gold. One after another he took up mechanically his stamps of old English characters, and pressed them upon the gold leaf. He did it carefully, yet with an air of abstraction, and his thin lips moved, as if he was muttering to himself. Hester had stolen away sobbing, and the attic was his solitary abode again.

So the house and its inmates settled down into a life still more sombre than had reigned there before Rose had entered it. The brief period of sunlight had come and gone, and had left a deeper gloom than it had found.

Soon the brief season of Hester's childhood ended. By small degrees household cares thrust themselves upon her; and at a time when the daughters of other homes were still careless and apparently irresponsible, she had begun to busy herself quietly about her father, watching for his wants, and providing beforehand for them. The old servant gradually lost her importance, and finding herself no longer regnant, she abdicated indignantly, and Hester, a woman already at the age of fourteen, supplied her place, without troubling her father with the matter, while he seemed unconscious of the change.

As for her education, that was self-directed and almost self-acquired. She had gone to no school; for if ever the thought of it had been pressed upon John Morley, he had thrust it away with impatient agony. For the only good school in the place was the one in which Rose had been governess, and he would have felt less emotion in seeing his child dead in her coffin than in knowing day after day that she was gone to that school. He allowed her to choose and engage her own masters; and they came and went, and she received them and their instructions with a quaint, shrewd, old-fashioned womanliness, which often threw them into doubt as to whether she was indeed the young girl she seemed. It was an isolated life; and Hester grew so used to the shadowy, colorless tone of the old house, that she felt afraid of venturing out into the brilliant light and ceaseless stir of the outer world.

In this heavy and stagnant atmosphere Hester's young nature was compelled to unfold all the graces of girlhood which could struggle into existence. The blossoms were but pale and few, but they were very sweet, had there been any one to take pleasure in them; a quaint, quiet, demure, and pensive girl; her heart feeding upon fancies half romantic and half religious. One thought and memory lived within her—the memory of the fair young stepmother, and the thought of her mysterious crime.

There was a memorial of Rose's brief sojourn under their roof, which was more directly beneath Hester's notice than her father's; for the closed room, the key of which the unhappy wife had carried away, was opposite to her bedroom, in a part of the house which her father never entered. Since the night after his wife's elopement John Morley's foot had never ascended the two or three steps leading to Hester's chamber, and the locked door, behind which were hidden all the mementoes of Rose.

This room was like a grave in the house. Never did a sound come from it, though Hester, while yet a child, had sometimes sat up in bed at nights, holding her hand against her throbbing heart, and listening, as if some one might be moving about that mysterious room. No light could penetrate into it; and the shuttered windows looked blankly out upon the sky. She was not afraid of the place, but she was awed by it; the prevailing gloom and stillness of the whole house seeming to centre there in a perpetual silence and blackness, which was the monument of Rose Morley's guilt. So long as that heart of darkness remained, the sun could not shine very brightly into any other nook of the dwelling. It was the eye of the house; and that eye being darkness, how great was the darkness!

The years glided by, strengthening the fixed customs of the household. John Morley became formal and automatic in his habits. At a given moment of the morning his clouded and sad face and bowed figure emerged from his chamber, looking neither to the right hand nor to the left, and glided, shadowlike, into his sitting-room, where his solitary breakfast awaited him. From that time until seven in the evening he remained brooding over his lot, with no distraction except the entrance of his few customers. His business declined slowly but surely, yet he scarcely perceived it. In the almost sublime egotism of his grief he was conscious only that time did not dissipate the clouds about him, but rather drew their sombre curtains more closely and thickly.

At length, in the course of years, the sole custom left to him was that of the people of his church, most of whom were poor and little given to reading. It seemed also as if the fire of Lawson's genius was forever quenched. The aristocracy of the country trusted no more rare and costly volumes to John Morley's binding-office. Now and then Lawson achieved a triumph, but success came only to him as a chance. Yet, in a little measure, his cunning returned when Hester brought her sewing up-stairs into the sunny attic, and sat in the obscure window by his press, plying her needle busily, though with few words passing between them. Sometimes she set her own hands to the work, under his directions, and gained a rare skill in it. But, for himself, his trembling fingers could not regain their delicate workmanship, and he felt that his occupation was gone from him. However, the current of life had drifted him into quiet waters, which, if they were not sunny, seemed very safe; and the sweet young face of Hester, not quite round enough or rosy enough for her years, was a hundred-fold dearer to him than it could ever have been in the brightness and gayety of a happier girlhood.

The chief changes in Hester's own existence were regulated by the sessions and vacations of Parliament. When Mr. Waldron rested from his Parliamentary duties in the seclusion of the country, Hester's religious duties became a little severe, for Miss Waldron expected her to attend punctually all the meetings for females, as well as occasionally to visit Aston Court for more private and personal instruction. Miss Waldron never forgot, and never suffered Hester to forget, that their spheres in life were totally different. She gave Hester gooseberries to eat while she regaled herself with grapes. It was something after the same fashion that she fed the souls of her scholars. There were promises and experiences too luscious for inferior palates; grapes of Eshcol, belonging by right to the aristocracy of the church, among whom she was numbered by every claim which it is possible to possess. By birth, by rank, by wealth, by early membership, by unremitting attendance at public worship, by indefatigable labors, and by every other qualification which the most exacting church could require, Miss Waldron laid claim to the finest of the grapes; and they were adjudged to her without a single dissentient voice.

When Hester's eighteenth birthday came it was noticed by no one but herself, and she kept it by buying a new bonnet in the place of an old one, which had seen long and hard service, and by contemplating her own face a little longer than usual, as it smiled and blushed back at her from the small round mirror which hung over her dressing-table. It was a spark of vanity quickly put out by the reproaches of her morbid conscience, and she went down-stairs to fulfil the duties of the day more in the spirit of eighty than of eighteen.

This same day Mr. Waldron found himself hovering about John Morley's shop, passing and repassing it in a singularly embarrassed and irresolute state of mind. There had not been much intercourse between them since the wrong committed by his son. John Morley had shrunk from all contact, and he had respected his feelings, though he could not sympathize with them. Sympathy was not Mr. Waldron's forte. He argued that if he had been able to support the thought of his son's sin, and, while deeply mourning it, still not to suffer it to interfere with his faithful discharge of public duties, both in the church and world, John Morley ought also to have proved himself superior to his sorrow and disgrace. He had been a perpetual and jarring memorial of the past, with his gray face and white head; and Mr. Waldron had been naturally irritated by him, whenever he was residing near Little Aston.

To-day he felt it an awkward thing, though he was a great man and member of Parliament, to enter John Morley's shop, and give utterance to the words he had carefully meditated beforehand. At last he marched boldly forward, ringing the shop-bell furiously with his quick entrance; and John Morley, gaunt and melancholy, the wreck of the handsome man he had once been, met him and looked him in the face with sunken eyes, which glowed with a dull and sorrowful flame.

"I wish to speak to you alone, Brother Morley," said Mr. Waldron, offering his hand, which probably John Morley did not see, for he did not take it.

"We are alone here," he answered.

"No, no," replied Mr. Waldron, "we are liable to interruption here, and I have much to say to you."

"Father," said the voice of Hester from the room within, "come in here."

John Morley complied by a silent gesture to his guest to enter, and he, removing his hat for the first time, passed in, and saluted Hester with the air of old-fashioned gallantry he had been wont to display toward her pretty stepmother nine years before. She had been sitting in her great chair, which stood summer and winter in the same spot on the hearth; and as soon as her quiet reception of the visitor was over, she resumed her seat, and took up her work again. Mr. Waldron stood opposite to John Morley, neither Hester nor her father asking him to be seated. The elder man, with whom life had been a prosperous thing, looked ten years younger than he upon whom had fallen perhaps the heaviest burden that can crush the spirit of a man.

"Brother," said Mr. Waldron, in a voice which faltered more than it had done when he had addressed his maiden speech to an inattentive audience in the House of Commons, "I am come here to ask a great gift. If the choice had been given me, there is nothing I would not have done to spare you and myself the pain we must bear to-day. But my duty lay here and with you. Will you let me speak to you?"

John Morley bowed his head as his only reply.

"My son," stammered Mr. Waldron, and John Morley shivered and shrank back, as if recoiling from a hand raised to strike him, "my son Robert, whom I have banished from my house these nine years, is longing to return. He is ill and penitent; penitent almost to despair. He implores to be no longer an outcast from his own home, and the place which will be his at my death. He is my only boy, and I am getting well into years, and my heart yearns toward him. When Absalom fled to Geshur after the murder of his brother Amnon, he was an exile but three years, when his father's soul longed to go forth to him. Do you hear me, Brother Morley?"

"I hear you," he murmured, in a hollow and almost inaudible tone.

"Oh, let me bid him come home!" said Mr. Waldron urgently; "his sin was great, but it was the sin of a young man. It has been punished enough. For your sake and for righteousness' sake I have never received him under my roof since then—my only son! It would be unnatural, unmerciful, unjust, if I refused to let him come home, now that he is broken in health and contrite in spirit. My house is empty and desolate without him, and he is my heir. He will take my place when I am gone."

There was no answer when Mr. Waldron ceased to speak. John Morley stood with bowed shoulders and bent head, while his frame trembled like a child's, who knew not how to escape from the presence of some cruel tyrant.

PAUL'S PREACHING.

S. S. Lesson for April 20, 1 Cor. 1 : 17-31. Golden Text, verse 23. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The True Test of Preaching — The Secret of Paul's Success—Speaking God-Given Words—The Opposing Forces — Invulnerable against Human Agency — A Lady's Conversion—The Will Must Bow—The Truly Wise Despised by the World — The Way to Deal with Home Trouble—Power in Preaching—Christ the Only Strength of Preaching.

THE true estimate of preaching is by its results, and no preacher ever had greater results than the Apostle Paul. What was the secret of this power? There are schools of divinity wherever Christianity exists; theological seminaries there are plenty, but few such preachers as Paul are to be found. What was it in this man's preaching which insured such great success? Was it his oratory? He said of himself that he is "rude in speech," and others said of him that his speech was contemptible (II Cor. 10 : 10; 11 : 6). And again he says of himself: "My speech and my preaching was not with enticing words of man's wisdom" (1 Cor. 2 : 4); again, "Christ sent me, not to baptize, but to preach the Gospel, not with wisdom of words, lest the cross of Christ should be made of none effect." Was it his logical clearness or reasoning power which so swayed the hearts of men? No, for in speaking of "the things which are freely given to us of God," he says, "Which things also we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which

THE HOLY GHOST TEACHETH."

This was the whole secret. Paul was filled with the Holy Ghost, the willing, intelligent instrument of the Holy Ghost. To the Thessalonians he says, "Our Gospel came not unto you in word only, but also in power, and in the Holy Ghost, and in much assurance." "My speech and my preaching was . . . in demonstration of the Spirit, and of power" (1 Thess. 1 : 5; II Cor. 2 : 4).

Paul knew well what many preachers seem to know so little, that the odds against Gospel preaching are quite beyond what any human power can cope with. "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places" (Eph. 6 : 12). Behind the darkness, deadness, and indifference of the souls we deal with, there is hidden all the power of Satan's kingdom. It is not a match of human reason against human reason; it is spiritual light against spiritual darkness. God alone is a match for Satan, and unless the Spirit of God possesses us, we are foolish indeed to attempt as to convince a soul which is in Satan's possession. The wisdom of words may reach that which is on its own level, the level of reason; but it can go no farther. What presumption there is in a little finite man proposing to himself that he will fight God's battles and overcome God's enemies by the little store of reasoning power which he possesses! God says, "I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and will bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? For after that in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." No reasoning power of man ever procured to him the knowledge of God. It comes by revelation, not by wisdom; by light, not by logic.

We remember a lady on whom the strongest powers of argument were brought to bear; incessant care was bestowed upon her, time and strength given; every Christian worker within reach brought to speak to her, and this for years together; but all to no avail. Then one Christian cast all the care on the Lord, asked and received for her by faith the revelation of Jesus by the Spirit, and then a word, the weakest word, was enough, and "the foolishness of preaching" saved her, for she then "believed." The Holy Ghost was trusted to do the work,

AND HE DID IT.

"The Jews require a sign and the Greeks seek after wisdom." "I will believe if I feel first," says one; "I will believe if I can satisfy my reason first," says another; the Jews and Greeks of old have their representatives among us now. On the one hand the creature wants a proof that his Creator is to be trusted; on the other hand the creature is presupposing that his Creator's reason is within the limit of his own; both are forgetting their relative relations to God; and while in this spirit, no amount of argument would convince them; it is the will which is wrong, and which must bow before its God. The very moment before God, the Gospel, whether of salvation, sanctification, healing, or whatever may be the need, becomes "the power of God and the wisdom of God." And this because Christ crucified takes His rightful place, the reins and the sceptre are transferred to the right hands. God hides His wisdom from the wise and prudent, and reveals it unto babes (Matt. 11 : 25). He calls us to be converted and become as little children, that we may enter into the kingdom of heaven (Matt. 18 : 3). Thus "the foolishness of God (the little babe with God) is wiser than men, and the weakness of God is stronger than men." Joseph in the house of Potiphar and in the prison was stronger than his master, for the Lord was with him. Moses, the shepherd of Midian, was stronger than when he was the heir apparent to the throne of Egypt; for God was with him. David keeping the sheep was stronger than Goliath of Gath. Samuel, the little child, was wiser than Eli, the high priest; but the strength and the wisdom was not of these children of God, it was only of the Lord who was with them. If the Lord is with us, and we are nothing but as He uses us, we too shall be strong with His strength, wise with His wisdom.

WHEN THE WILL BOWS

"For ye see your calling, brethren, how that men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise." The world counts foolish those who do not maintain their own cause, do not depend upon their own strength, do not make their own plans, and in no way take the initiative. The world counts such poor-spirited; so they are, if they act so only in relation to man, and yield to every human influence or opinion; but it is quite another thing to yield to the supreme power and wisdom of God. If the wife of an unconverted husband becomes saved, and then for the sake of peace yields to him, and is outwardly as much entangled in the world as ever, she is certainly wrong; if, however she takes up her own cause, argues with him, and reproaches him for thwarting her and for standing in the light of her conscience, she is still more in the wrong, for she leads her husband to think that Christianity makes homes unhappy and wives quarrelsome. But if she comes in her weakness and foolishness to her heavenly Father, tells Him her difficulty, and charges Him with the responsibility of making her way for her; doing this, it will always be found that the weakness of God is stronger than men, that the wife's way is made to serve the Lord, and the husband's soul won to Him.

God has chosen "the weak," "the foolish," "the base," "the despised" to confound "the wise," "the mighty," the "things that are." Let there be a preacher, who, knowing himself foolish, and weak, and inefficient, yet receives by faith the Holy Ghost, and Christ dwells in his heart by faith—he will soon find that to him Christ is made in very deed and the wisdom of God. He will experience a complete rest of soul in the most difficult circumstances, because he knows that God is equal to the task which is before him, and he counts upon Him for what he shall say and what he shall do. The result will always show that his confidence has not been misplaced, that it has answered to trust the Lord. Just as we are willing to know ourselves, the weak and foolish things which we are, by the revelation of the Holy Ghost, the Spirit of God reveals unto us Christ "made unto us Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, Redemption."

Some preachers are admired much for their eloquence, logic, rhetoric; one hears their names everywhere; one reads their praises in the papers, and yet when one hears them there is so much of the man himself that one has a difficulty in perceiving Christ in him. The words of his discourse attract the attention more than Christ who is conveyed in them. There are others whose utterances are awkward, tedious, illiterate, unfinished; but the impression left on the mind is,

"JESUS HAS BEEN SPEAKING TO ME."

Holy Ghost preachers preach not themselves, but Christ Jesus the Lord (II Cor. 4 : 5). God's rule is "that no flesh should glory in His presence." If we glory in any natural power or talent, any quickness or wisdom of our own, it is just flesh or self glorying in His presence. Nothing can be more distasteful to God. Christ and self are the extreme opposites one of another; that which exalts self depreciates Christ; that which exalts Him depreciates self. And this is more markedly so in preaching than in anything else. No presumption can be greater than to imagine that by some intellectual power of ours we can bring unsaved souls into contact with God; that by some logic we can unseat Satan from his throne, and place Jesus there. This is the work of the Spirit of God, and if He uses us as His honored instruments in speaking, or praying, or preaching, or writing, it becomes us indeed to echo His words, "He that glorieth let him glory in the Lord;" it becomes us to give the glory where it is due, to Jesus Christ, "the power of God and the wisdom of God."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

General Gordon's Situation at Khartoum still causes serious anxiety. The report of the surrender of the city and the imprisonment of the intrepid general has not been confirmed. The only reliable intelligence respecting affairs in the city comes from the correspondent of the London Times, who is with General Gordon in Khartoum, and succeeds at long intervals in sending a despatch to his journal. The latest one published says: "We are daily expecting the arrival of British troops. We cannot believe that the government will abandon us. Our very existence depends upon Great Britain." General Gordon has finally decided to abandon his policy of conciliating the natives, having become convinced by repeated efforts and failures that it is utterly useless. His new policy will be more vigorous, and, as the first step toward carrying it out, the Egyptian soldiers who had been detailed to give a safe conduct to parties leaving Khartoum and proceeding to Egypt have received orders to return to the beleaguered citadel without delay. Armed steamers daily engage the rebels, who lose heavily. The rebels are still encamped opposite the town, but their numbers are decreasing. General Gordon is mounting Krupp guns on an iron lighter in order to reach the rebel camp from the river. The city at the date of that despatch was evidently still under General Gordon's command, but in expecting the arrival daily of the British troops he would be disappointed, as General Graham, with his expedition, has sailed from Suakim to Suez. The inhabitants of Suakim are discontented and angry at being left by the British to take care of themselves. The rebels on learning of the departure of the British approached to within a mile of Suakim and looted the cattle.

The French Demand for an Indemnity from China is to be enforced. The special correspondent in China of the New York Herald cabled on April 3d: "I learn from official sources that the French, in support of their claim of indemnity, will hold Langson and Caobang passes and will then enter China from the north side of the Gulf of Tonquin. Thence it is five days' journey to the Canton River and seven days to Canton City. The fleet will cooperate from the south. They can collect the indemnity in a few years from the Canton native customs. Those best informed in Chinese affairs regard the scheme as wholly feasible."

Russia's Annexation of Merv Appears not to have been so unanimously desired by the inhabitants as was represented. Recent despatches from that place indicate that considerable disaffection prevails among a portion of the Turcomans of the district. On March 3d a collision occurred between the malcontents and Russian troops. The details of the affair are so far unknown. It affords clear evidence, however, of much dissatisfaction on the part of the natives with the new arrangement, and makes it certain that Russia will be compelled to maintain a larger garrison in the newly acquired territory than she had intended.

A Destructive Fire in Paternoster Row, the publishing district of London, occurred on April 2d. Many of the publishing houses were threatened. The cablegram reporting the catastrophe says: "The Religious Tract Society's building and the buildings adjacent were burned. The fire raged for four hours. Twenty-four engines were called into service. About a dozen houses, mostly bookbinding and publishing establishments, were gutted. The damage by the fire is immense. One firm lost a large collection of sheet music. An American fire ladder was used by the firemen, and proved to be of great service." A favorable wind diverted the flames from St. Paul's Cathedral, which is near the scene of the conflagration.

The Body of the Late Duke of Albany, Queen Victoria's youngest son, was interred at Windsor on April 5th. The ceremony was private, but in all cities and towns there were demonstrations of respect, and people of all ranks who were desirous of showing their loyalty put on mourning garb. Cable despatches state that at the funeral the Queen sat during the service weeping bitterly. All the young princes were sobbing. The Prince of Wales was very pale. After the service the Seatforth Highlanders (the Duke's Regiment) played "He will return to Lochaber no more." It is reported by journals usually well informed that the young prince, who was always extremely quiet in his habits, appeared to forget during his sojourn in France in the last week of his life how precarious was his health. He is said to have indulged in unwonted excitement, which, acting on a constitution naturally feeble, precipitated the apoplectic attack which proved fatal. His widow will receive $30,000 a year from the national treasury.

A Continental Gambling Hell, where both life and property are sacrificed every year, is situated at Monte Carlo, Italy, and thither many ladies and gentlemen from all European countries resort in the season. The number of persons who have committed suicide in connection with that centre of corruption would astonish the most incredulous. Only a few days ago a rich stranger blew out his brains at the Hotel de Paris, after having lost all his fortune at play. A commercial clerk, at Nice, followed the same example from a similar cause, while in the night a successful gamester was assassinated and robbed of six or seven thousand francs. This latter piece of intelligence is followed by the significant remark: "No one knows, and no one will know, any more, for the authorities of Monaco wish the affair kept quiet." If ever any pernicious evil cried for redress, surely it is the present practice of gambling at Monte Carlo.

The State of Zululand.—The Missionary bishop of Zululand (Dr. Wilkinson) writes from that country, describing the state of anarchy and bloodshed which at present prevails there. He says that for thirteen months they have been the sad witnesses of the ferment and bloodshed which they knew full well would result from the return of Cetewayo. At the very least 10,000 lives have been sacrificed, and three quarters of Zululand has been desolated. Yet all the time the cry has been going up throughout the land, "When is the British Government going to stop the blood?" All the people of lower degree have called themselves the children of the Queen, and have earnestly desired direct British rule. It is absolutely impossible for the Zulus to settle their own affairs, as Her Majesty's government state is their policy. Mutual extermination is the only prospect. The bishop asks, When is the awful tragedy to be closed, and England to recognize her responsibilities?

A Plot to Destroy Mountjoy Prison, in Dublin, is said to have been discovered. In that prison many of the Invincibles are confined, and with them are several prisoners who belonged to the society, but have since their arrest given information to the government. The New York Herald correspondent cables the following particulars concerning the plot: "The Invincibles in the prison were engaged in clandestine correspondence with conspirators outside. Letters were found in James Mullett's cell which disclosed the plot. The prison wardens were to be bribed with money from O'Donovan Rossa's fund to convey an infernal machine into the prison. One letter contained an order for the murder of Patrick Delaney, one of the Phœnix Park conspirators, by throwing him over the balcony as he should leave the prison after mass. Delaney still remains at Mountjoy for safety. Many of the wardens have been dismissed.

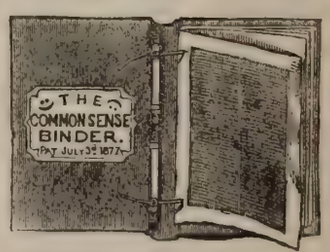
Differences Exist between the Two Irish leaders, which are causing a division in the party. Mr. Parnell and Mr. Michael Davitt are at variance in their ideas regarding the manner of conducting the coming election campaign. Mr. Davitt urges freedom in the selection of the candidates by the constituents, while Mr. Parnell and his friends insist that it is necessary for the Parliamentary party to have a voice in their selection. Still further divergence is disclosed in an article by Mr. Davitt, which appears in a socialist magazine. The editor of the magazine describes the article as "a declaration by an acknowledged champion of the Irish people that the quiescence of the Parnellite party in Parliament will not prevent the immediate reopening of agrarian agitation." Mr. Davitt proceeds to contend that the Land Act has done nothing to satisfy the real movers in the Land League agitation. He declares that he and his followers will have nothing to do with any extension of the purchase clauses of the act. He will not consent to the creation of a peasant proprietary obtained by government advances for the purpose of buying out the landlords' interest. Mr. Davitt's plan is to abolish landlordism, root and branch, by having the tenants continue the processes which have already made the landlords' property nearly unsalable.

The Value of Missionary Operations in London was the subject of an address recently made by the venerable Lord Shaftesbury, who, speaking at one of the meetings of the London City Mission, gave credit to its operations, and said that if they had not succeeded in making London a city of angels, they have, at all events, prevented it from becoming a city of devils. In the pamphlet, "Down in the Depths," recently published by the mission, the belief is expressed that, bad as London is to-day, it is, in proportion to its population, in a far better position, socially and morally, than it was fifty, forty, or even twenty years ago. Facts and statistics are adduced to show that the overcrowding is by no means so terrible as it once was, and that there has been a marked improvement in the morals and outward conduct of the people.

Vol. VI. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1883, with complete index. Price $3, including postage: ten per cent less to ministers and the trade.

"The Treasury of David," by C. H. Spurgeon. A few copies of two volumes, handsomely bound in cloth, of the above valuable work are on sale at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office, at $2.50 per volume. They are Vol. III and Vol. IV. Vol. III. contains comments on Psalms 53 to 78; Vol. IV. on Psalms 79 to 103. They contain an original exposition of that portion of the Book of Psalms, a collection of illustrative extracts from the whole range of literature, a series of homiletical hints upon almost every verse, and lists of writers upon each Psalm. Also by the same author, "John Ploughman's Talk, or Plain Advice to Plain People," in stiff paper cover, price 25 cents. Postage paid.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.



NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address in the United States on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 6 Bible House, New York.

In the year 1836 there resided in New Hampton, N. H., a family, the head of which belonged to a type of men rarely met with in our great cities, and which is, as time passes, becoming rare in the country districts. At the close of the last and during the first half of the present century they were to be found in every village and large town, especially in New England, men of deep religious feeling, scrupulously upright in all their dealings, caring but little for public or political affairs, except in cases in which conscience was involved; men of the Bible, troubled by none of the modern criticism or modern doubts as to inspiration, but accepting the whole book reverently, and making it the guide of their lives. Those men were the backbone of the Church. They were men who, had occasion demanded, would, like the Pilgrim Fathers, have sacrificed, without hesitation, their homes and fortunes, counting them well sacrificed if, by the loss, they gained liberty of conscience to worship God according to their principles.

Such homes as those men made, have often been described, and novelists and newspaper writers have held them up to ridicule on account of their austerity and gloomy sanctity. They have dwelt on the dulness of their Sundays, the sternness of home rule, the reprehension of "innocent pleasures," the edict forbidding the theatre, concert, and billiard-room, and above all "the narrow and illiberal" creed of the Calvinistic theology, which formed the centre and essence of religious thought and pervaded the home atmosphere. So were the Puritans derided; but from them, as from these New England Calvinists, have descended men who are to-day in the van of the battle against evil in the world, and who are conscious that to their early training, strict and stern as it was, they owe their preservation from youthful sins and the strength and force of their religious principles.

BIRTH AND EDUCATION.

In that New Hampton household was born on April 19th, 1836, a child whose name is now an honored one, not only in the chief city of culture and thought, where he resides, not only through his native land, but in the great cities of Europe, where his works are read and valued. The grave deacon had been for many years an enthusiastic supporter of foreign missionary work and an ardent admirer of the devoted men who left home and country to preach the Gospel of Christ to those who sit in darkness. One heroic man especially had won the good deacon's respect, the pioneer American missionary, Adoniram Judson. To that man the deacon tendered a tribute of homage by naming his infant child for him. The boy was named Adoniram Judson Gordon, and there is reason to believe that the pious father offered many prayers that he might prove worthy of the name given to him. It is certain that in many characteristics of his religious life and work, and notably in his interest in foreign missionary work, Dr. A. J. Gordon has been and is a living testimony of the power and influence of early training and of the truth of the scriptural maxim, "Train up a child in the way that he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it."

A change of heart in the boy was, as might be expected under such Puritan training, attended with much serious law-work—deep conviction and penitence. But at the age of sixteen the young man knew and felt in his inmost soul that he had been accepted of God through faith in Christ, and that the Saviour had fulfilled to him the promise, "To as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God . . . which were born . . . of God." He made a profession of his faith, and was received into membership by the rite of baptism in the church of his native town. This happy issue was distinctly attributable to the effect of home training blessed by the Spirit of God, and it is recorded for the encouragement of parents who realize their responsibilities and are anxious to fulfil them.

COLLEGE LIFE.

Almost immediately after uniting with the church a powerful influence began to make itself felt in the young convert's mind, moving him to preach the Gospel. That often happens in like cases, but in young Gordon's mind the impulse was not stifled by worldly cares or diverted by worldly ambition. It grew and strengthened with the years, until it became a settled purpose, and ended in a complete consecration of his life to the Lord's use and service. He entered a preparatory school with the distinct object of fitting himself for a theological training in college. Thence he went to Brown University, Providence, R. I.

In such an institution there is often more danger to stability of purpose than in business life. The prizes which may be gained in the legal and other professions hang glittering before the eyes of the earnest student, who is peculiarly liable to be tempted by the acquisition of learning to devote his knowledge and talents to a pursuit more remunerative in wealth and station than that of preaching the Gospel.

A young man of mental power devoting himself to the work of the ministry deliberately foregoes the prospect of social advancement, the honors of diplomacy, and the much-coveted sweets of official life. He turns his back on the judge's seat, the senatorial chamber, and the White House, and in the place of those prizes, what can he hope to attain? Before him is a life of comparative poverty, a life of labor involving as much visiting as a physician performs and as much public speaking as is required of a lawyer in full practice; innumerable discomforts and discouragements, and in the end to leave the world without realizing a fortune or making any mark in national history. How many young men have entered college intent on ministerial labor, and have, after associating with young men preparing for other professions, turned aside, moved by such considerations. But none of these things appear to have weighed on the New Hampshire youth. He entered with zest, even while a student, into active Christian work, teaching in the Sabbath-school and helping in missions in the neighborhood around.

Probably there is no better method of keeping an unwavering purpose and resisting the allurements of the world and of the power which addresses ambitious young men in the words, "All these things will I give thee," than that Mr. Gordon pursued in taking his recreation from study in active Christian service. Among his classmates and companions of that period were several names which have since become eminent. Notably are those of Dr. Wayland Hoyt, of Philadelphia, Dr. Duncan, of Rochester, Dr. Abbott, of San Francisco, and Hon. Ethan Allen, of New York.

FIRST PASTORATE.

In 1860, at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Gordon graduated. He proceeded to Newton Theological Seminary for a more special course of training for ministerial work. Before the completion of his studies there he had already entered upon his life's labor, by accepting, at the earnest solicitation of the people of Jamaica Plain, the pastorate of their Baptist Church. His ordination took place in June, 1863, and until the year 1869 Dr. Gordon continued his work in the same church. It was a period of quiet, unobtrusive usefulness. The preaching of the Gospel was accompanied by the blessing of God; the congregation largely increased, and many additions were made to the church.

REMOVAL TO BOSTON.

At the close of his seven years' labors at Jamaica Plains Dr. Gordon received a call from the Clarendon Street Baptist Church, of Boston. The prospect there was full of opportunities for arduous and effective labor. It was a "down-town church," which had once been prosperous, but had declined, owing to the movement, which has taken place in most of our cities, of the population from the business streets to the suburbs. Dr. Gordon, however, accepted the call, and went to his new sphere with the expectation of doing vigorous and energetic work. He was not disappointed in that expectation nor in the results. A new edifice was erected in the south end of the city, which was soon filled with worshippers. A deep, earnest spirituality pervaded the place, and the membership was doubled. The church itself, too, has become endeared to thousands as their spiritual birthplace, for it was in that building that the inquirers' meetings were held in connection with Mr. Moody's Tabernacle work. At various times revivals commencing from within the church have brought in large numbers of converts.

Under Dr. Gordon's pastorate the church has become a power in the city. "Like pastor like people," is an adage of which the Clarendon Street Church is a conspicuous illustration. The energy and spirituality for which Dr. Gordon is celebrated has been communicated from the pulpit to the pews. The church is distinguished by its aggressive Christian spirit, perpetually at work seeking to carry the influences of Christianity into the homes and hearts of the careless and indifferent; aiming not at proselyting from other churches, but at attracting those who are strangers to the power of the Gospel. It has availed itself of the social movements of the times, Dr. Gordon rightly believing that such influences can be and ought to be wielded more effectually by Christian people than by mere moralists. Such a movement is the temperance cause, into which Dr. Gordon entered with all his might. The in connection with the Clarendon Street Church has been so earnestly conducted as to bring into its fold a large number of persons whose lives were being ruined by the rum-curse.

Another institution with which Dr. Gordon is identified ought also to be mentioned as an illustration of his practical philanthropic views. This institution is "The Boston INDUSTRIAL HOME."

The inauguration of this home arose out of an imperative necessity realized in connection with reformatory work. The drunkard who desires to reform is often without employment and without such a character as would enable him to obtain it. Others, again, are in occupations in which temptation besets them at every turn. In both cases the difficulties which stand in the way of reformation—difficulties inseparable from debased appetite and moral weakness—are increased by outward circumstances. In such a position men sincerely desirous of quitting their evil courses have fallen in despair. Considering this difficulty from a practical standpoint, a large house, to which another was subsequently added, was hired. There, men broken down and impoverished by intemperance were received, and were provided with employment on the premises. They were thus enabled to support themselves in board and lodging while efforts were being made to effect their permanent reformation. After a period of rest and retirement they were assisted to procure suitable employment.

The Industrial Home has been very successful, and a large number of men have been helped toward sobriety and self-support by this institution, in which they passed the crisis of their lives. Not a few have entered it ruined in health, morals, and reputation who have come out of it, not only reformed, but converted. The success of this experiment of linking self-support with reform work has attracted the attention of philanthropists elsewhere, and the example has been since imitated in other States. The Boston Home is now to some extent a public institution, the philanthropic public having recognized the value of the work it is doing, and has aided in its support and acquired a share in its management.

At the recent National Temperance Convention held at Saratoga, N. Y., Dr. Gordon was invited to preside. He delivered an address on the scriptural view of prohibition, which was so cogent and conclusive in its arguments that the National Temperance Society decided to publish it in pamphlet form.

The Clarendon Street Church has also established a colored church in Boston, which it largely supported until it became so prosperous that it was able to maintain a minister of its own race, and now draws but little assistance from the mother church.

These are but a small part of the enterprises and avenues of usefulness which radiate from the church over which Dr. Gordon has presided now fifteen years. Evangelistic work, city missionary, and other efforts have been inaugurated and kept in motion by the church, while at the same time care has been taken that these outlying activities should not drain the church of its vitality. An evidence that this effect, which would be nothing short of a disaster, has not resulted, is apparent in the fact that the weekly prayer-meeting is one of the largest in Boston. This is an unerring test, for the weekly prayer-meeting has been rightly described as the thermometer of spiritual vitality in a church. Dr. Gordon is an

and like most students of prophecy is a firm believer in the pre-millennial advent of Christ. In the fall of 1878 he took a prominent part in the Prophetic Conference held in the Church of the Holy Trinity, New York. There are few who were present at that conference who will ever forget the fervent address he delivered there on "The First Resurrection," or the rapt attention in which he held the vast audience which hung breathless on his lips. The climax of the sessions was reached when, in the sonorous tones of his powerful voice, Dr. Gordon closed his address with these words: "Profoundly holding that we are nearer to the glory than to the sufferings, we would that that glory were rising on our larger vision and daily kindling more and more our hope and expectation. At all events, we wish that it were possible for the Church to keep the Second Advent as near to her spiritual consciousness as she keeps the First Advent; and that, as by the reminiscence of a historic faith, Christ is evidently set forth crucified in the midst of her, so by the transfiguration of a prophetic faith He might be constantly beheld appearing to her with His saints in glory. Surely there is enough of sorrow and woe in the present world to make us long for His coming, and enough in the promises and admonitions which He has left behind to make us hope for it. The night is far spent; the day is at hand. At each succeeding watch we hear the mighty challenge of the great sentence, 'Behold, I come quickly.' As watchmen keeping guard with Him over the city of God on earth, we, at least, ought to be wakeful enough to give back the answer, 'Even so, come, Lord Jesus,' and faithful enough to believe that in doing so we are sounding no meaningless watchword and putting up no useless prayer. I hold up before your eyes the glowing beatitude with which my theme is crowned, 'Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection; on such the second death hath no power.'"

AS AN AUTHOR

Dr. Gordon is well known on both sides the Atlantic. In 1872 he issued the volume entitled "In Christ," in which he dealt with one of the deepest and tenderest themes of the Gospel—the believer's union with his Lord. Its divisions show the author's recognition of the many-sided aspects of this precious doctrine, and how completely it enters into every element of the Christian's life. They are: Crucifixion in Christ; Resurrection in Christ; Baptism into Christ; Life in Christ; Standing in Christ; Prayer in Christ; Communion in Christ; Sanctification in Christ; Glorification in Christ. Dr. Gordon intended the book to be an aid to meditation, and very excellently it fulfils that purpose, being devout as well as suggestive. It is now in its fifth edition, and has been reprinted and largely circulated in England.

A volume of twenty sermons appeared in 1880 under the title "Grace and Glory." They cover a wide range of Christian life and thought, and are, withal, so simple that the child in Christ may understand and feed upon them. Among the most characteristic and impressive of these sermons are the following: "Faith and Fruitfulness;" "Jesus Christ at Home;" "Prophecy at the Tomb of Christ;" "Spiritual Near-Sightedness;" "The Sign of the Son of Man;" "Christ Calming the Heart;" and "The Virgin's Lamp." In the last-mentioned sermon Dr. Gordon gives a very lucid and impressive exposition of his belief in the pre-millennial coming of the Lord.

"Congregational Worship" was the title of his next work. Dr. Gordon's design in writing it was to urge Christian congregations to take a more direct part in the worship of God's house.

Last year appeared

"THE MINISTRY OF HEALING."

This is the most argumentative and scholarly of all Dr. Gordon's works. In it he takes the position that there is no evidence of the age of miracles having ceased with the apostolic age. That in the present day there is existing and growing, not only in the world, but in the Church also, a dangerous tendency to explain away the supernatural, and to look askance on any declaration of direct answer to prayer for healing or deliverance. Yet, as he shows with logical force, we are daily witnessing in conversion a greater miracle than that of healing the body. Nevertheless, they who pray that God will cure the soul of sin shrink from praying that He would cure the body of disease, though the contact of the divine and the human is closer in the former case than in the latter.

Having disarmed opposition by this line of argument, Dr. Gordon proceeds to give important testimony to the reality of the miracles of healing. This includes: The Testimony of Scripture; of Reason; of the Church, Ancient and Modern; of Theologians; of Missions; of Experience; and of the Healed. The concluding words of the volume reveal at a glance the spirit in which the book is written, which we may add is the spirit in which all of Dr. Gordon's ministerial work has been performed—the desire to be of service to others without counting the cost to himself, either of labor or reputation. Thus he writes: "Oh, ye countless victims of pain and disorder, who have never consecrated either your souls or your bodies to the service of Him who made them, hear all of you the voice of Him who speaketh from heaven, saying, 'I am the Lord that healeth thee.' And if the promises of God and the teachings of Scripture and the testimonies of the healed set forth in this book might throw one ray of hope or alleviation into your sick-chambers, it would repay amply the pains we have taken in its preparation, and more than compensate us for any reproach we may incur for having borne witness to a doctrine of which many as yet can hear only with impatience and derision."

Dr. Gordon's latest work is "The Twofold Life; or Christ's Work for us and Christ's Work in us." While it is written for the benefit of all Christians who may read it, it is especially intended to enlighten those who are in danger of looking "upon the salvation of the soul as the goal rather than as the starting point of faith"—for those who "have settled into a condition of confirmed infancy." These, who form a proportion of appalling dimensions in the Christian churches of our time, Dr. Gordon endeavors in this work to lead to contemplate and seek after "a second stage in spiritual development, distinct and separate from conversion; sometimes widely separated in time from it and sometimes almost contemporaneous in time with it—a stage to which we rise by a special renewal of the Holy Ghost, and not merely by the process of gradual growth."

In this, as in the other works from Dr. Gordon's pen, a prominent feature cannot fail to be noticed. There is an absence of dogmatism, a childlike spirit of docile following and dependence on the Spirit's teaching. There is all the courage of conviction; but with that there is a recital of the steps which have led to the conviction which have sufficed for himself, but which he leaves others to judge of for themselves. This "spirit of sweet reasonableness," as Matthew Arnold appropriately designates it, is too often absent from the writings of Christians, especially Christians whose views of "the higher life" and of "the healing by faith" are in harmony with his. There is no denunciation of those who differ from him, no derision of them, no doubts cast on their sincerity or their piety, but a simple, logical statement of his own convictions and his reasons for holding them. This gentle Christian spirit gives a powerful charm to Dr. Gordon's books as to his sermons.

We trust that Dr. Gordon may long be spared to continue his labors in Christ's cause, and that God's blessing may continue to attend him.

[Dr. Gordon's works are published by Mr. Howard Gannett, Tremont Temple, Boston, Mass.]

A Remarkable Faith Cure is Reported from Pittsburg, Pa. A despatch telegraphed from that city on March 13th says: "Miss Mary Hilliard, who belongs to a well-known East End family, has been lame for twenty years, and has been unable to walk unless she wore a boot and steel rod fastened to her waist. On Sunday she visited the house of a friend, took off her boot, and joined with three or four others in prayers for her recovery. At the conclusion of the prayers she started for home, leaving her boot and steel supporter in the house. She walked without difficulty, and has since walked freely. She says the best physicians in London and New York pronounced her case hopeless, and that her instantaneous recovery is due to nothing but prayer."

An Extraordinary Rate of Interest on a Dollar was recently paid by a Wisconsin statesman. He was born in the State of New York, but went West when he was seventeen years old. He had in his belt $1200 and $99 to pay his expenses on his way out. He wanted another dollar, and borrowed it of his brother. In a few years he began to accumulate. He made profitable speculations in timber-lands, and his wealth increased. Recently he returned to his old home in St. Lawrence County, N. Y., where he found his brother in straitened circumstances. Debt had got the best of him, and to satisfy a mortgage his home was about to be sold. "What is the amount?" asked the Western brother. "Twelve hundred dollars," answered the other, with a face as long as the Signal Officer's report. "Oh, brace up," said the Wisconsin statesman; "I'll pay you what I owe you, which, with the interest, will be enough to straighten this matter out." "But," said the former, "you don't owe me anything." "Yes, I do," he replied. "You remember lending me $1 when I first went West; well, here it is with returns," and he counted out $1500. "Every dollar I took away with me has brought me $1500 in return. If you ever get hard up, let me know, and I'll help you out again." Few men regard their obligations in that light, or pay them so readily. If Christian men considered in the same way what they owe to Christ, how different would be their service. Paul had occasion to remind Philemon of the fact (Phil. 19).

[A vast audience filled the Tabernacle last Sunday morning. The building has seats for five thousand persons, but fully seven thousand were there, occupying the aisles, platform steps, the corridors, and gallery stairs, anxious to catch the sound of the preacher's voice. The front of the galleries was decorated with flowers, and the platform looked like a veritable flower-garden. The large organ behind was covered with clusters of beautiful roses.]

Here are Mary Magdalen and Christ just after His resurrection. For four thousand years had been killing people and dragging them into his cold palace. He had a passion for human skulls. For forty centuries he had been unhindered in his work. He had taken down kings and queens and conquerors, and those without fame. In that cold palace there were shelves of skulls, and pillars of skulls, and altars of skulls, and even the chalices at the table were made of bleached skulls. To the skeleton of Abel he had added the skeleton of all the ages, and no one had disputed his right until one Good Friday, about eighteen hundred and fifty-one years ago, as near as I can calculate it, came to the door of that awful palace, rolled back the door, and went in, and seizing the tyrant threw him to the pavement and put upon the tyrant's neck the heel of triumph.

A GRIM AND GHASTLY TYRANT

Then the mighty stranger, exploring all the ghastly furniture of the place, and walking through the labyrinths, and opening the dark cellars of mystery, and tarrying under a roof the ribs of which were made of human bones—tarrying for two nights and a day, the nights very dark and the day very dismal, he seized the two chief pillars of that awful palace and rocked them until it began to fall, and then laying hold of the ponderous front gate hoisted it from its hinges, and marched forth crying, "I am the Resurrection!" That event we celebrate this Easter morn. Handelian and Beethovean miracles of sound added to this floral decoration which has set the galleries and the platform abloom.

There are three or four things which the world and the Church have not noticed in regard to the resurrection of Christ. First,

OUR LORD IN GARDENER'S ATTIRE.

Mary Magdalen, grief struck, stands by the rifled sarcophagus of Christ, and turns around, hoping she can find the track of the sacrilegious resurrectionist who has despoiled the grave, and she finds some one in working apparel come forth as if to water the flowers, or uproot the weeds from the garden, or set to reclimbing the fallen vine—some one in working apparel, his garments perhaps having the sign of the dust and the dirt of the occupation.

Mary Magdalen, on her face the rain of a fresh shower of weeping, turns to this workman, and charges him with the desecration of the tomb, when lo! the stranger responds, flinging his whole soul into one word which trembles with all the sweetest rhythm of earth and heaven, saying, "Mary!" In that peculiarity of accentuation all the incognito fell off, and she found that instead of talking with an humble gardener of Asia Minor she was talking with Him who owns all the hanging gardens of heaven. Constellations the clusters of forget-me-nots, the sunflower the chief of all, the morning sky and midnight aurora, flaring terraces of beauty, blazing like a summer wall with coronation roses and giants of battle. Blessed and glorious mistake of Mary Magdalen. "She supposing Him to be the gardener." What does that mean? It means that we have for every-day work, in every-day apparel. Not on Sabbath morning in our most seemly apparel are we more attractive to Christ than we are in our every-day work dress, managing our merchandise, smiting our anvil, ploughing our field, tending the flying shuttles, mending the garments for our household, providing food for our families, or toiling with weary pen, or weary pencil, or weary chisel. A working-day Christ in working-day apparel for us in our every-day toil. Put it into the highest strain of this Easter anthem, "Supposing him to be the gardener."

If Christ had appeared at daybreak with a crown upon His head that would have seemed to suggest especial sympathy for monarchs; if Christ had appeared in chain of gold, and with robe diamonded, that would have seemed to be especial sympathy for the affluent; if Christ had appeared with soldier's sash and sword dangling at His side, that would have seemed to imply especial sympathy for warriors; but when I find Christ in gardener's habit, with perhaps the flakes of the earth and of the upturned soil upon His garments, then I spell it out that He has hearty and pathetic understanding with every-day work, and every-day anxiety, and every-day fatigue.

Roll it down in comfort all through these aisles; roll it in comfort to all these galleries. A working-day Christ in working-day apparel. Tell it in the darkest corridor of the mountain to the poor miner. Tell it to the factory maid in most unventilated establishment at Lowell or Lancaster. Tell it to the clearer of roughest new ground in Western wilderness. Tell it to the sewing woman, a stitch in the side for every stitch in the garment, some of their cruel employers having no right to think that they will get through the door of heaven any more than they could through the eye of a broken needle which has just dropped on the bare floor from the pricked and bleeding fingers of the consumptive sewing girl. Away with your talk about hypostatic union, and soteriology of the Council of Trent, and the metaphysics of religion which would freeze practical Christianity out of the world; but pass along to all nations that they may touch the hem of it and feel the thrill of the Christly brotherhood. Not supposing the man to be Cæsar, not supposing him to be Socrates, but "supposing him to be the gardener."

Oh, that is what helped Joseph Wedgwood, toiling amid the heat and the dust of the potteries, until he could make for Queen Charlotte the first royal table service of English manufacture. That was what helped James Watt, scoffed at and caricatured, until he could put on wheels the thunderbolt of power which roars by day and by night in every furnace of the locomotive engines of America. That is what helped Hugh Miller, toiling amid the quarries of Cromartie, until every rock became to him a volume of the world's biography, and he found the footsteps of the Creator in the old red sandstone. Oh, the world wants a Christ for the office, a Christ for the kitchen, a Christ for the shop, a Christ for the banking house, a Christ for the field, a Christ for the garden, while spading and planting and irrigating the territory. Oh, of course, we want to see Christ at last in royal robe and bediamonded, a celestial equestrian mounting the white horse, but from this Easter of 1884 to our last Easter on earth we most need to see Christ as Mary Magdalen saw Him at the daybreak, "supposing Him to be the gardener."

Another thing which the Church and the world have not noticed in regard to the resurrection of Christ is that He made His first post-mortem appearance to one who had been the seven-deviled Mary Magdalen. One would have supposed He would have made His first posthumous appearance to a woman who had always been illustrious for goodness. There are saintly women who have always been saintly, saintly in girlhood, saintly in infancy, always saintly. In nearly all our families there have been saintly aunts. In my family circle it was saintly Aunt Phebe; in yours saintly Aunt Martha or saintly Aunt Ruth. One always saintly. But not she was the one spoken of in the text.

While you are not to confound her with the repentant courtesan who made her long locks do the work of towel at Christ's footwashing, you are not to forget that she was exorcised of seven devils. What a capital of demonology she must have been. What a chorus of all diabolism! Seven devils—two for the eyes, and two for the hands, and two for the feet, and one for the tongue. Seven devils. Yet all these are extirpated, and now she is as good as once she was bad, and Christ honors her with the first posthumous appearance.

WHAT DOES THAT MEAN?

Why, it means for worst sinner greatest grace; it means those lowest down shall come, perhaps highest up; it means that the clock that strikes twelve at midnight may strike twelve at midnoon; it means that the grace of God is seven times stronger than sin. Mary Magdalen the seven deviled became Mary Magdalen the seven angeled.

It means that when the Lord meets us at last He will not throw up to us what we have been. All He said to her was "Mary!" Many people having met her under such circumstances would have said: "Let me see, how many devils did you have? one, two, three, four, five, six, seven. What a terrible piece you were when I first met you." The most of the Christian women in our day would have nothing to do with Mary Magdalen even after her conversion, lest somehow they be compromised. The only thing I have to say against women is that they have not enough mercy for Mary Magdalen. Christ put all pathos, and all reminiscence, and all anticipation, and all pardon, and all comfort, and all heaven into one word of four letters, "Mary!" Mark you, Christ did not appear to some Bible Elizabeth, or Bible Hannah, or Bible Esther, or Bible Deborah, or Bible Vashti, but to Mary; not to a Mary against whom nothing was said; not to Mary the mother of Jesus, not to Mary the mother of James, not to Mary the sister of Lazarus, but to a seven-deviled Mary.

There is a man seven-deviled—devil of avarice, devil of pride, devil of hate, devil of indolence, devil of falsehood, devil of strong drink, devil of impurity. God can take them all away, seven or seventy. A few weeks ago I rode over the new cantilever bridge that spans Niagara—a bridge 900 feet long, 859 feet of chasm from bluff to bluff. I passed over it without any anxiety. Why? Because last December twenty-two locomotives and twenty-two cars laden with gravel had tested the bridge, thousands of people standing on the Canadian side, thousands standing on the American side to applaud the achievement. And however long the train of our immortal interests may be we are to remember that God's bridge of mercy spanning the chasm of sin has been fully tested by the awful tonnage of all the pardoned sin of all the ages, church militant standing on one bank, church triumphant standing on the other bank. Oh, it was to the seven-deviled Mary that Christ made His first post-mortem appearance.

There is another thing that the world and the Church have not observed in regard to this resurrection, and that is, it was

THE MORNING TWILIGHT.

If the chronometer had been invented and Mary had as good a watch as some of the Marys of our time have, she would have found it was about half past five o'clock A.M. Matthew says it was in the dawn; Mark says it was at the sun-rising; Luke says it was very early in the morning; John says it was while it was yet dark. In other words, it was twilight. That was the o'clock at which Mary Magdalen mistook Christ for the gardener. What does that mean? It means there are unlifted, shadows of mystery that are hovering. Mary stooped down and tried to look to the other end of the crypt. She gave hysteric outcry. She could not see to the other end of the crypt. Neither can you see to the other end of the grave of your dead. Neither can we see to the other end of our own grave. Oh, if there were shadows over the family plot belonging to Joseph of Arimathea, is it strange that there should be some shadows over our family lot? Easter dawn, not Easter noon.

Shadow of unanswered question! Why were they taken away from us? why were they ever given to us if they were to be taken so soon? why were they taken so suddenly? why could they not have uttered some farewell words? why? A short question, but a whole crucifixion of agony in it. Why? Shadow on the graves of good men and women who seemed to die before their work was done. Shadow on all the graves of children because we ask ourselves why so beautiful a craft launched at all if it was to be wrecked one mile outside the harbor? But what did Mary Magdalen have to do in order to get more light on that grave. She had only to wait. After a while the Easter sun rolled up, and the whole place was flooded with light. What have you and I to do in order to get more light on our own graves and light upon the graves of our dear loved ones? Only to wait.

Charles Fifth of Spain with his servants and torches went down into the vault of the necropolis where his ancestors were buried, and went deeper, further on until he came to a cross around which were arranged the caskets of his ancestors. He also found a casket containing the body of one of his own family. He had that casket opened, and there by embalmer's art he found that the body was as perfect as eighteen years before when it was entombed. But under the exploration his body and mind perished. Oh, my friends, do not let us morbidly struggle with the shadows of the sepulchre.

WHAT ARE WE TO DO?

Wait. It is not the evening twilight that gets darker and darker. It is the morning twilight that gets brighter and brighter into the perfect day. I preach it to-day. Sunrise over Père le Chaise, sunrise over Greyfriars Churchyard, sunrise over Greenwood, over Woodlawn, over Laurel Hill, over Mount Auburn, sunrise over every country graveyard, sunrise over the catacombs, sunrise over the sarcophagi where the ships lie buried. Half past five o'clock among the tombs now, but soon to be the noonday of explanation and beatitude. It was in the morning twilight that Mary Magdalen mistook Christ for a gardener.

Another thing the world and the church have not observed; that is, Christ's

PATHETIC CREDENTIALS.

How do you know it was not a gardener? His garments said He was a gardener. The flakes of the upturned earth scattered upon His garments said He was a gardener. How do you know He was not a gardener? Before Easter had gone by He gave to some of His disciples His three credentials. He showed them His hands and His side. Three paragraphs written in rigid or depressed article. A scar in the right palm, a scar in the left palm, a scar amid the ribs—scars, scars. That is the way they knew Him. That is the way you and I will know Him.

Ay, am I saying this morning too much when I say that will be one of the ways in which you and I will know each other—by the scars of earth: scars of accident, scars of sickness, scars of persecution, scars of hard work, scars of battle, scars of old age. When I see Christ's resurrected body having scars, it makes me think that our remodelled and resurrected bodies will have scars. Why, before we get out of this world some of us will be covered with scars all over. Heaven will not be a bay into which float summer yachts after a pleasuring, with the gay bunting and with the embroidered sails as fair as when they were first unfurled. Heaven will be more where men-of-war come in from Trafalgar and Lepanto, men-of-war with masts twisted by a cyclone, men-of-war struck on all sides by seventy-four pounders, men-of-war with decks scorched of the shell. Old Constitutions, old Constellations floating in discharged from service to rest forever. In the resurrection Christ credentialed by scars. You and I will be credentialed, and will recognize each other by scars. Do you think them now a disfigurement? Do you think them now a badge of endurance? I tell you the glorious thought this morning, they are going to be the means of heavenly recognition.

RESURRECTION IN BEAUTY.

There is one more thing that the world and the Church have not noticed in this resurrection of Christ, and that is that Christ from Friday to Sabbath was lifeless in a hot climate where sanitary prudence demanded that burial take place the same day as death, and where there was no ice to retard dissolution. Yet, after three days He comes up so healthful, so robust, and so rubicund Mary Magdalen takes Him for a gardener. Not supposing Him to be an invalid from a hospital, not supposing Him to be a corpse from the tomb, but supposing Him to be the gardener. Healthful by the breath of the upturned sod, and by a perpetual life in the sunshine.

After Christ's interment every cellular tissue broke down, and nerve, and artery, and brain, were a physiological wreck, and yet He comes up swarthy, rubicund, and well. When I see after such mortuary silence such radiant appearance, that settles it that whatever should become of the dead bodies of our Christian dead, they are going to come up, the nerves restrung, the optic nerve reillumined, the ear drum avibrate, the whole body lifted up, without its weaknesses and worldly uses for which there is no resurrection. Come, is it not almost time for us to go out to meet our reanimated dead? Can you not hear the lifting of the rusted latch?

Oh, the glorious thought, the glorious consolation of this subject when I find Christ coming up without any of the lacerations, for you must remember He was lacerated and wounded fearfully in the crucifixion—coming up without one. What does that make me think? That of us except our wounds and our imperfections. Christ went into the grave exhausted and bloodless. All the currents of His life had poured out from His wounds. He had lived a life of trouble, sorrow, and privation, and then He died a lingering death. His entire body hung on four spikes. No invalid of twenty years' suffering ever went into the grave so white and ghastly and broken down as Christ, and yet here He comes up so rubicund and robust she supposed Him to be a gardener.

Ah! all the side-aches, and the head-aches, and the back-aches, and the leg-aches, and the heart-aches we will leave where Christ left His. The ear will come up without its heaviness, the eye will come up without its dimness, the lungs will come up without oppressed respiration. Oh, what races we will run when we become immortal athletes! Oh, what circuits we will take when all earthly imperfections subtracted and all celestial velocities added we shall set up our residence in that city which, though vaster than all the cities of this world, shall never have one obsequy!

Standing this morning round the shattered masonry of our Lord's tomb, I point you to a world without hearse, without muffled drum, without tumulus, without catafalque, and without a tear. Amid all the cathedrals of the blessed no longer the Dead March in Saul, but whole libretti of Hallelujah Chorus. Oh, put trumpet to lip and finger to key, and loving forehead against the bosom of a risen Christ. Hallelujah, Amen! Hallelujah, Amen!

The Cry of "Water in the Mine" Alarmed two hundred men who on April 5th were at work in a mine worked by the Albright Wilmington Coal Company, near Braidwood, Ill. The influx of the water was discovered by a mule-driver, who immediately left his mule, rushed to the top, and reported it to the superintendent, who went below and aroused the men. A great number of them were frantic with fear, and they ran for the cages, three hundred yards distant. By the time they reached the cages the water was above their waists. On reaching the top some of them fell to the ground from exhaustion. There was no need to entreat the men to make use of the means of escape; when they realized their danger they left everything and ran to the shaft. Preachers of the Gospel do not find their message have the same effect, though it is more urgent, the danger more terrible and certain, and the way of escape more reliable (Heb. 6 : 18, 19).

The Conversion of an Eminent New York publisher in his boyhood was thus described by the Rev. S. M. Hammill, the veteran principal of the well-known boys' school at Lawrenceville, N. J. He relates that the late Rev. William Scribner, elder brother of Charles Scribner, the publisher, was converted while a student at Lawrenceville. "He came to me," says Mr. Hammill, "and said: 'I have found the Saviour, and I wish you would tell my companions.' I said to him: 'William, you had better tell them yourself. It will do them and you both good.' He stood up and said: 'My dear schoolmates, you have perhaps not understood why I have not been out upon the playground as much as usual for some days past. I have been seeking the salvation of my soul, and trust I have found my Saviour, and wish to tell you how much joy I have.' After prayers William came to me and said: 'I wish you would speak to my brother Charles, and pray for him.' I promised to do so. Like Andrew the Apostle, he was desirous that his brother should see Jesus. In a few days Charles, his younger brother, was indulging a good hope of an interest in Christ."

Two Men Lost in a Cave for Fourteen Days were rescued on March 31st. On that day a party were exploring the cave under Lookout Mountain, near Chattanooga, Tenn., and had penetrated about three miles from the entrance when they were startled by deep groans in close proximity to them. They hastened forward, and discovered the forms of two men lying prostrate on a shelf of rock. The men were unable to articulate a word, but could only give vent in sobs to their joy at rescue. After being removed to the outside world, the men said that they entered the cave on the morning of March 16th. They had a small lantern and a bottle of oil. While exploring, one of them stumbled and fell; the lantern fell from his hand into the water, and the bottle containing the oil was broken. They had no other means of making a light. They groped their way back a few hundred feet, but found the undertaking useless, as they were in danger of falling over unseen precipices. They could hear the trickling of water, and crawled toward it, and by lowering their hats by means of strips torn from their clothing into the crevice they obtained a small supply of water from time to time. They remained at this spot about three days, and, driven to desperation by hunger, made another effort to escape their terrible doom. About the fifth day they threw themselves down in hopeless despair to meet their awful fate, and were unable to move from that time until rescued. The story of the miserable condition of the lost men helps us to realize what would have been the fate of our race had not God sent His Son to the rescue (Psalm 119 : 176).

TWO HOSPITAL BEDS.

By C. H. Spurgeon.

"THERE never was such an affliction as mine," said a poor sufferer, restlessly tossing in her bed in one of the wards of a city hospital. "I don't think there ever was such a racking pain."

"Once," was faintly uttered from the next bed.

The first speaker paused for a moment; and in a still more impatient tone resumed her complaint.

"Nobody knows what I pass through. Nobody ever suffered more pain."

"One," was again whispered from the same direction.

"I take it you mean yourself, poor soul! but—"

"Oh, not myself! not me!" exclaimed the other; and her pale face flushed up to the very temples, as if some wrong had been offered—not to herself, but to another.

She spoke with such earnestness that her restless companion lay still for several seconds and gazed intently on her face. The cheeks were now wan and sunken, and the parched lips were drawn back from the mouth as if in pain. Yet there dwelt an extraordinary sweetness in the clear gray eyes, and a refinement on the placid brow, such as can only be imparted by a heart-acquaintance with Him who is "full of grace and truth."

"Oh, not myself! not me!" she repeated. There was a short pause, and the following words, uttered in the same low tone, slowly and solemnly, broke the midnight silence of the place:

"And when they had plaited a crown of thorns, they put it upon His head, and a reed in His right hand; and they bowed the knee before Him, and mocked Him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! And they spit upon Him, and took the reed and smote Him on the head. . . . And they crucified Him, and parted His garments, casting lots. And sitting down, they watched Him there. And they that passed by reviled Him, wagging their heads. And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'"

The voice ceased, and for several minutes not a syllable was spoken. The night nurse rose from her chair by the fire and mechanically handed a cup of barley water, flavored with lemon-juice and sugar, to the lips of both sufferers.

"Thank you, nurse," said the last speaker.

"'They gave Him gall for His meat: and in His thirst they gave Him vinegar to drink.'"

"She is talking about Jesus Christ," said the other woman, already beginning to toss restlessly from side to side. "But," added she, "talking about His sufferings can't mend ours—at least not mine."

"But it lightens hers," said the nurse.

"I wonder how."

"Hush!"

And the gentle voice again took up the strain:

"'Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows. He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed.'"

The following day, as some ladies visiting the hospital, passed by the cots, they handed to each a few fragrant flowers.

The gentle voice was heard again: "'If God so clothe the grass of the field which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall He not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith?'"

A few days passed slowly away, when, on a bright Sabbath morning, as the sun was rising, the nurse noticed the lips of the sufferer moving, and leaning over her she heard these words: "'Going home! I have fought the good fight. I have finished my course. I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the Righteous Judge, shall give me at that day.'" Her eyes closed, and the nurse knew that the hand of death was grasping the cords of life. A moment more and all was over.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Marvel Wrought through a Tract.—Mr. Dobie related at a recent meeting: "I called at a house not long ago where a woman was lying ill in bed. Her face was bright, and the tones of her voice were clear and melodious. Evidently there was something which caused her spiritual nature to triumph over the ills of her body. When I asked how she was, she replied, 'Oh, I am so very happy.' 'How so?' I inquired. 'What makes you so cheerful?' She then said, 'About a month ago, on a Sabbath afternoon, a tract on John 3: 16 was handed in at the door. When I read it the way of life through Jesus Christ became so very plain to my mind that I at once accepted Jesus Christ as my Saviour, and have walked in fellowship with Him rejoicing ever since. As I lie here alone my heart seems too full to contain its joy.'"

Good Proof of a Great Change.—Mr. Clyde said: "The gable of a house in which a Mizpah brother lived in Glasgow was lately blown in during a terrible storm of wind and rain, and all his furniture was destroyed, except a few chairs. He rescued his wife and children with great difficulty. When I visited him he was thanking God for His kindness in saving his dear ones from injury and death. A drinking man, who lodged with him, said to me, 'James is thanking God for His goodness; if it had been me that had gone through what he has, I would have drowned my sorrow in drink. He is a changed man, that is clear.' James himself says that during the trying time, when he was taking his family one by one through the gap in the fallen gable, he was crying in his heart, 'Lord, help and keep me in this time of trouble.' God heard and answered his prayers, as He always will those of any sinner who, conscious of misery and weakness, cries to Him for succor in the name of Christ the Saviour."

An Antidote to the Fear of Napoleon.—Mr. Maughan relates: "When Napoleon I. was preparing to make war against Russia the news of the vast army which was to invade their country reached the Czar and his court. It threw them into a state of intense excitement. In the midst of the prevailing agitation one of the princes was quite calm and composed. This was noticed, and the Czar's attention called to it by one of the prince's enemies. The least difference in the conduct of one person from that of others caused suspicion to fasten on that person. The Czar Alexander called the prince before him, and demanded an explanation of his calmness when all the rest of the court were heated and excited with fear. The prince put his hand into his bosom and pulled out a copy of the Holy Scriptures. As he was going to open it the book fell to the ground, and opened at the Psalm 91: 1, 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.' When the prince read this, the Czar was satisfied, the enemy of the prince confounded, and God was honored by the prince's faith in the divine promise."

Pitying a Street Preacher.—Mr. Dobie Said: "I called upon a woman not three weeks ago who drew my attention to a neighbor, who was at one time a church member and sang in the church choir, but who then never attended church nor meeting for want of time. What made the Christian woman whom I was visiting speak about her to me was that one day her neighbor had heard me speaking on the street about Jesus to a crowd of people, and she had come to my friend and said, 'Is it not sad, a decent-looking man like Mr. Dobie preaching on the street?' Her only idea of street-singers and preachers being that they were somehow on a level with street ballad singers and 'patter' speakers. With some trouble she was persuaded to come to our meeting, where she was converted to Christ. Now we have the joy of seeing her attend the meetings and the church as well, bringing her family with her. She was brought up among rumsellers, and some of her relations refuse to speak to her, and other of her friends mock her, calling her a hypocrite. Notwithstanding this, she says, 'I can't help what they say. I must speak for Jesus. I am so joyful.'"

An Open-Air Preacher before the Magistrates.—"An open-air preacher gathered a large crowd at a street-corner, and was arrested by the police on the charge of obstructing the thoroughfare. When he was brought before the magistrates, he asked, 'Do you really mean business?' 'Yes, of course we do,' was the answer. 'Well, before we enter into business, let us pray.' There and then he fell on his knees and poured out his heart to God in fervent prayer. The chairman directed the policeman to stop him. The officer consequently pulled his sleeve gently, saying, 'You had better stop now.' 'No, no,' was the reply. Then they appealed to a clergyman who was in the court to stop him, but he replied, 'No; you have started him, I will not try to stop him.' When he did stop, he said, 'I am ready for business now.' The magistrates looked at each other, then directed him to go to another room. An old gentleman then rose from his seat, and with tears streaming down his face, said, 'We have often had this man before us for being drunk and disorderly, but never for preaching; let us dismiss him.' The others silently assented, and the man was called in and told that he was free to go."

A Convict's Unsuccessful Appeal.—"A Young man stood before a judge, condemned to death. For the first time he realized that soon the bright sun of day would no more shine for him, that the beautiful flowers, the green grass, and all the pleasures of this world would be no longer his to enjoy. Oh how his heart swelled with agony at the dread thought which entered his soul, and he exclaimed, 'Where will my future life be spent?' With a smothered, heart-breaking cry he fell on his knees and pleaded with the judge for mercy. The judge replied, 'What I have passed I cannot alter.' Did that cold reply silence the condemned man? No! Again he besought the judge for mercy, but still he got the same reply, 'What I have passed I cannot alter.' With a frenzied look the young man gazed upon his young wife with his child in her arms, sitting in the gallery with the rest of his friends. 'All, all, lost to me through drink!' As this thought rushed through his mind, with a breaking heart he appealed for the third time to the judge for mercy. The judge rose from the bench saying, 'I cannot change the sentence; remove the prisoner.' Justice had to be satisfied; there was no pardon from men for this young man, and he paid with his life the penalty of his sin."

Reconciled Over a Death-Bed.—"A Father and mother had an only son. The father and son could not agree, but were always quarrelling, till at last the son was ordered to pack up and leave the home of his boyhood. When her darling had left the mother was stricken to the heart, and her health failed by degrees, till at last she took to what proved to be her death-bed. When death drew near she entreated her husband to grant her one request. He, anticipating what it was, steadily refused, but finally her earnest pleadings prevailed. The next morning the father went to his office and wrote a letter to the son, asking him to return home to see his mother die. It was late at night when the young man reached his old home. The door of his mother's room was open; the father stood at the bedside, and the son hesitated for a few moments, and then entered. The father turned his back to him, and walked to the fireside without a word of greeting. After saluting her son, the mother entreated him to make peace with his father. After long pleading, the son humbled himself, and father and son clasped hands over the mother's bed. She took both their hands in her own and kissed them; then pressing them to her bosom, she passed to be with Jesus. With her life she reconciled them. So with His life and by His death Christ hath reconciled us to God. 'He gave His life for us.'"

THE SECOND ADVENT.

ITS CERTAINTY AND UNCERTAINTY.

By Dr. A. J Gordon.

The Event Clearly Revealed—The Misconceptions Anticipated by Scripture—The Event Explicitly Described—Bridal Love would have Precluded Error—What is Involved in the Personal Coming—The Date Unrevealed—Why the Uncertainty is Beneficial—The Present Duty.

We are not called to watch for Christ's second personal coming as a merely possible or remotely probable occurrence. Never are we admonished that we know not whether our Lord shall come, though we are admonished that we know not the hour of His coming. On the contrary, the Scriptures are crowded with statements of the certainty, of the literalness, of the visibility, and of the personality of His return to the earth. And, lest there should be any mistake, reiteration comes in to enforce assertion, and emphasis to enforce reiteration. "This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." "The Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout." It must be evident, from these texts, that inspiration anticipated the denials, refinings, and from which this doctrine should suffer, and so provided against them. For a bare repetition of these texts furnishes the best possible answer to all the various theories of a figurative or spiritual advent.

"The destruction of Jerusalem was the coming of Christ," says one. "When Titus descended upon the doomed city, with the shout of his Roman legions, then was the promise fulfilled." "The Lord Himself shall descend," repeats the Word of God. "The occurrence of death is Christ's coming to receive His people," says another. "This same Jesus shall so come," reiterates the Holy Scripture. "The diffusion of the Gospel, and the gradual transformation which it effects in human civilization, is the coming of the Redeemer," says another. "The Lord Himself shall descend," still resounds the Word.

All this is plain, and yet, alas! that the Master has need again to convince His servants of His continued personality; that they have so diffused Him into history, so confounded Him with death, so dissipated Him into a vague and shadowy presence that we can almost hear Him saying to them, as of old He did to His disciples when they mistook Him for an apparition: "Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself." Jesus has not lost His identity, or so merged it with history, or with providence, or with death, that we must look in these things for His coming. "I will come again," He says. "Behold I come quickly." And this 'I,' which is the sacred seal of personality, "that by which one knows and is to be known throughout eternity," He has never lent or transferred to another—except only to the Holy Spirit, who is one and co-equal with Himself. He did come, invisibly and spiritually, in the advent of the Comforter. But His visible, bodily return still remained as an unfulfilled promise.

Still further is the real and personal return of Christ enforced by the explicit descriptions of the event given in the Scriptures. It is not simply the same Jesus—no substitute, no commissioned messenger, no typical event—but He "shall so come in like manner" as He went. He went up visibly, from eager eyes that recognized Him as the veritable Lord; from outstretched hands that had handled Him as the Word of life, and as He was parted from them "a cloud received Him out of their sight." And so shall He return, visibly, personally, gloriously. "Behold He cometh with clouds, and every eye shall see Him, and they also that pierced Him."

All this, if heeded and pondered, is calculated to keep us from the error so especially prevalent in these times—the error of spiritualizing the substance and reality out of Christ's promises. Reason always allegorizes the grand realities of Scripture when it touches them; but the heart is a rigid literalist. Its affections are never content with shadows, or semblances, or substitutes. If the Church had always kept for her absent Lord, she would never have admitted even the suggestion of an impersonal advent. It must be suspected that only a fondness for this present world, and an indifference to the glorious hope of the Church, could ever have begotten such a thought. What we dread, or dislike to believe, we easily dissipate into vagueness and unreality. The unbelieving, to whom Christ's coming means only judgment and terror, would naturally wish to forget it, and explain away its reality. But what of her of whom the apostle wrote, "I have espoused you unto one husband, that I may present you as a chaste virgin to Christ?" Will the bride with the letter from her betrothed husband in her hand, saying, "Surely I come quickly," admit the suggestion that He means simply that He will send some mysterious stranger to bring her to Himself, or forward some kindly provisions for rendering her comfortable and contented with His absence, so that she shall be less inclined to "love His appearing," and to look for it?

"Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation." He shall come to save from the world those whom He is now saving in the world; to complete their redemption, to present them "faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy," and to usher in the marriage of the Lamb. He shall come to right all wrong, to consummate all good; to remove the curse from our groaning earth; to wipe away all tears from off all faces; to silence pain, and to swallow up death in victory. No promise is more constantly repeated, as none is more sacred than this. If Christians shall cease to wait for their returning Lord, creation groaning and travailing together in pain will not. If those whom He has redeemed with His precious blood do not rejoice with singing at every sign of His approach then "let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof. Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein; then let all the trees of the wood rejoice before the Lord: for He cometh, for He cometh to judge the earth."

PERSONAL COMING?

"If I know not that God is a person, I know not that I am a person," said a great theologian. We may say likewise: If I am not sure of Christ's personal return, I am not sure of my personal vision of His face. If I am not certain that He shall "appear in glory," I am not certain that I shall "appear with Him in glory." His identity at the advent with the man of Nazareth, the man of Calvary, the man of Olivet, is the pledge of my own identity at that day. All reality, recognition, reunion, remembrance, and fellowship in the resurrection state seem to me to be involved in the question whether He who shall come is the same Jesus, or only some shadowy substitute, or some veiled and providential manifestation of His presence.

"Blessed," therefore, "be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who, according to His abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead." The personality that survived the grave has survived all the intervening centuries unchanged and unchangeable. And when His appearing shall be ushered in, it will be that of the man Christ Jesus, the same holy face, the same pierced hands, the same gracious voice, as at the first. This, then, is the doctrine to which the Scriptures commit your faith. You may believe in Christ coming in temporal judgment, coming in the crises of history, coming in the triumphs of Christianity, coming in the article of death; but do you believe and confess "Jesus Christ coming in the flesh," in that veritable body of flesh and bones which He carried up into heaven? This was the confession of apostles and martyrs and reformers; and this is the creed that needs to be emphasized anew in an age so given to spiritualizing and attenuating the plain and literal facts of Scripture.

of Christ's second coming is absolutely unrevealed. "Why should we watch for an event of whose date we are entirely ignorant?" is a question often asked. That is the very reason why, according to the Scripture, we should watch for it: "Watch, therefore, for ye know not the day nor the hour." There is the same dogmatic uncertainty in regard to the time of Christ's second coming, as there is dogmatic certainty in regard to the fact. The date is as truly an inspired secret as the event is an inspired revelation. "Know ye not?" is a question which Christ and the apostles are constantly asking. And we find the words always applied to something so distinctly revealed that there should be no excuse for being ignorant of it. But when the question of the date of Christ's second advent is raised, we find just the opposite language used: "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in His own power." "But of that day and hour knoweth no man, no, not the angels of heaven, but my Father only."

And it is because of this ignorance of the date of the Lord's appearing, that we are so earnestly enjoined to watch; or, to reverse the statement, we may suppose that God withholds the revelation of this secret in order to train His Church in watchfulness and hope and vigilant expectation. For have you never reflected that the union of a certainty and an uncertainty constitutes the very strongest motive to activity? The sight of the firm, rocky shore gives hope and courage to the drifting mariner; but the unknown shoals and the unsounded depths lying between make him exceedingly careful in guiding his course, lest he be wrecked. What is known inspires confidence; what is unknown begets circumspection.

If the date of Christ's return were as certain as the fact of it, the expectant watchfulness and carefulness, which he enjoined upon His disciples in view of the event, could hardly have been maintained. Had He told them, for example, that He would certainly come back, and that His coming would be exactly two thousand years from His ascension, how impossible it would have been for His Church to keep her lamp trimmed and burning, in perpetual anticipation of His return, and her loins girded about in diligent occupying till He should come! Wisely did He join with the declared certainty of His advent, the explicit uncertainty as to its time, that so the returning Bridegroom "might live in our faith and hope, remote yet near, pledged to no moment, possible at any; worshipped not with the consternation of a near, or the indifference of a distant certainty, but with the anxious vigilance that awaits a contingency ever at hand."

Up, therefore, Christian! Trim your lamp; let its beams shine forth to meet and mingle with the first advancing rays of the bright and morning star. And let its light meantime show you the way to every path of self-denial, to every work of faithful service and testimony, and to every avenue of holiness and purity of life. Thus, with girded loins, with busy hands, with uplifted eyes and with radiant faces, may you be ready to meet your descending Lord, and to exult in His glorious appearing, saying, "Lo, this is our God; we have waited for Him, and He will save us: this is the Lord; we have waited for Him, we will be glad and rejoice in His salvation."

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Senate has Passed Mr. Blair's Education bill with important amendments. The total amount appropriated out of the National Treasury to assist the States in which illiteracy prevails is reduced from $105,000,000 to $77,000,000, and the rate of progression is changed. The first year's expenditure is to be but $7,000,000, the second year $10,000,000, the third $15,000,000, and each year after that $2,000,000 less, until the eighth year, when, with an expenditure of $5,000,000, the appropriations are to cease. As originally introduced the first year's payment was to be $15,000,000. The money is to be used to supply school privileges to children without distinction of race or color, and the schools aided are to be unsectarian. No State is to receive more from the grant in any one year than it expended on the common schools in the preceding year. The bill so amended was sent to the House, where it is expected some of the amendments will be rejected.

A Second Inquiry into the Circumstances of the loss of the Jeannette is in progress in Washington. A sub-committee of the House Committee on Naval Affairs has the investigation in hand. The inquiry was ordered in consequence of charges made by Dr. Daniel F. Collins, who alleged that his brother, Jerome J. Collins, who accompanied the Jeannette expedition as meteorologist, was unfairly treated by Captain De Long and some of the officers of the Jeannette, and also that material facts connected with the expedition which the public ought to know were suppressed at the previous inquiry. Several of the survivors of the expedition were examined last week by the committee, and testified to facts not before made public, which were exceedingly painful. They stated that there was jealousy between the captain and the officers, and that Mr. Collins was harshly treated. Also that the provisions supplied to the expedition were unfit for food, though Mr. Bennett and the Government had paid liberally for them. One of the sailors intimated that there was unnecessary delay in commencing the search for De Long, and that if it had been commenced earlier, it was possible, though not probable, that he and his party might have been rescued. It may be hoped that Lieutenant Danenhower and Engineer Melville when they give evidence will be able to contradict these startling and grave allegations.

The House of Representatives Adopted on Friday the report of the committee appointed to investigate the charges made by ex-Speaker Keifer against General Boynton. That report declared that Keifer had failed to substantiate the charges. Only two votes were recorded against adopting the report. That closes the question so far as the House is concerned, and Keifer, having made the charges in Congress, cannot be punished in the courts. That constitutes a strong reason why the character of the man should be made known through the press. Keifer has been Speaker of the House; he aspired to be the leader of the Republican party there during the present session, and it is stated that he is seeking a renomination to Congress. Every man who is concerned in nominating a candidate in that district of Ohio, and every voter in that district ought to consider well the reports of the two committees which have had the ex-Speaker under investigation. If after doing so they consider that he will be a fitting representative for them, then the public will do them no injustice in appreciating their character.

The Project for Giving the Public Increased telegraph facilities through the Post-Office has been advanced a stage. The Senate Committee on Post-Offices has reported the postal telegraph bill. Two important provisions have been added to it by the committee. The first authorizes the contracting company to employ the postmaster as its agent and operator at any postal telegraph office where the telegraphic receipts are insufficient to pay the salary of an operator and to pay him a commission not exceeding fifty per cent on the charges on the messages transmitted from the office. The second requires the Postmaster-General to secure provisions in the contract which shall protect postal telegrams against discrimination in the order of transmission in favor of telegrams received at such of the company's offices as are not operated under the provisions of the bill.

Forest Fires Devastated Large Areas in several counties of South Carolina last week. A telegram from Columbia, S. C., dated April 12th, states that the destruction of houses, valuable timber, fencing, growing crops and live stock was the most widespread ever known in the history of the State. It is impossible to estimate the amount of damage, but it will aggregate many hundred thousands of dollars. In Kershaw County the fires were especially terrific, sweeping over a thickly settled territory and destroying houses, timber, and fencing for many miles. It was with great difficulty that the flourishing town of Camden was saved, it being for twenty-four hours surrounded on all sides by the flames. Large numbers of cattle and hogs feeding in the woods were roasted alive. Three churches escaped destruction in a remarkable way. Antioch Church is surrounded by heavy pine forests, and just before the fire reached it the flames divided and went around it, coming together on the opposite side, and sweeping on without harming the church. At Mt. Zion the flames acted in a similar manner, passing close around the church but without injuring it. At Pine Tree Church the fires passed under and around the building, burning straw, wood, and lumber around it, but doing no injury to the church itself. At Sandy Grove the fire went through the churchyard, burning all the fencing, railing, and sheds around it and in the cemetery adjoining the church, but no harm came to the church.

The Floods in Louisiana have Receded.—At the close of last week Major Stickney reported to the Secretary of War that the river had fallen three feet at Vicksburg, one and seven tenths at Natchez, one at Baton Rouge and one at New Orleans from the highest point. The backwater or overflow in Tensas and Concordia has fallen from eight to twelve inches or more in the upper part. At the head of the Atchafalaya the water has fallen nearly a foot. The situation is more encouraging than could have been expected two weeks ago, and it seems very probable that a cotton crop may be raised in Tensas and Concordia. Immediate danger for the remaining levees is rapidly passing, and it is not probable that any other breaks in levees will occur.

The Pocahontas Mine, the Scene of the Explosion of March 13th, in which one hundred and fifty men were killed, was opened on April 10th. A party of miners were engaged in removing the timbers and débris until the shaft, etc., were left comparatively unobstructed. The exploring party then penetrated several hundred feet into the mine. The air was very foul and the stench sickening, but no traces of after damp were discovered. On the way two bodies were discovered and brought out. The terrible character of the explosion was shown by the condition of the bodies. They were horribly mangled, and presented a most revolting spectacle when exposed to the light of day. Only one single limb remained on the mutilated trunk of one of the bodies. The head, both legs, and an arm had been blown off. The other corpse was terribly distorted, and neither of them could be recognized by any of the crowd who were anxiously looking for the remains of lost relatives, friends, or acquaintances. Fifty-four more bodies were found on Saturday. The bulk of the miners who were in the farther workings have not yet been reached.

The Inquiry into the Wreck of the Daniel Steinmann, in which one hundred and twenty persons lost their lives, shows that the panic which succeeded the striking of the ship was the cause of so large a loss of life. The captain in giving his evidence on Thursday last, said: "We had life-belts and jackets on board in the store-room. I can't tell whether any passengers put them on. The suddenness of the shock and my duties prevented my seeing this. According to the Belgian law we are not obliged to carry life-belts, but we are enjoined to provide the best of lifeboats. The Steinmann not being a regular passenger steamer the men were not stationed at the boats. Each man had not his particular station. About nine P.M., when trying to make Chedabucto light, I went aloft myself, but saw nothing. It was thick and foggy, with rain, at that time. When I altered my course, off Jeddere, I sounded, but can't recollect the soundings; should say there were between thirty and forty fathoms. I wish to remark that the boats were in perfect order, well supplied with oars, boat-hooks, one keg of water, mast and sail complete and ready for use."

The Work of Relieving the Sufferers by the Southern and Western floods is being actively carried on by Miss Clara Barton and the Red Cross Association. The Red Cross relief steamer, Mattie Belle, was at Vicksburg, Miss., on April 10th, carrying supplies for the overflowed district below. The work done by the Red Cross Association is different in important respects from that done by the government. It is unhampered by red tape or other restrictions which prevent its ministering to every case of suffering that may appear. The Mattie Belle carries not only provisions, but has a large supply of clothing as well for needy people. She also carries what is fully as important to the poor colored people who have live stock—a supply of hay, corn, and oats.

A Converted Jew was Baptized by the Rev. Jacob Freshman on Sunday, March 23d. A large number of inquiring Hebrews were present to witness the proceedings. In the Mission Hall, 73 Allen Street, New York, the interest is increasing. On Saturday afternoons there is a great crowd of Jews present, many having to stand, while listening to sermons on "The Difference between Judaism and Christianity."

The Revival Services Conducted by Rev. Thomas Harrison in St. Louis, Mo., have now closed. Thirteen hundred persons made a profession of faith as the result of God's blessing on the special effort. The Central Christian Advocate says the last days of Mr. Harrison's work were days of power, and it appeared as if he might have gone on indefinitely with increasing influence. Many people went from curiosity, but that motive was soon absorbed in personal spiritual interest in the work which began on the first night. Mr. Harrison is now at Evansville, Ind.

The Temperance Work in New Jersey Continues with undiminished vigor. Messrs. Mabee and English hope to be in Rahway, commencing a mission by May 1st. The citizens of Montclair took possession of their new Reform Club building on April 7th. This will in future be the temperance headquarters there. Handsome and commodious rooms in the building are allotted to the Women's Christian Temperance Union, which appropriately inaugurated its new location on Thursday last, with a four hours' prayer-meeting. The local temperance workers are thoroughly in earnest, determined that no effort shall be wanting to render the movement aroused by Messrs. Mabee and English permanent.

Jerry McAuley is Anxious to Establish a home for "unfortunate" girls who are desirous of abandoning a vicious life. Since the Cremorne Mission has been opened numerous applications have been made to him by women anxious to reform, for such a refuge. Hitherto a lack of funds has prevented the enterprise being commenced, but a special effort is now being made for the purpose through Jerry McAuley's newspaper, which is devoted to the interests of the Cremorne Mission. The project is one of deep interest to the friends of morality and which appeals strongly to every Christian. Any subscriptions our readers may send us toward it will be handed to Mr. McAuley.

A Millionaire's Suicide in New York Last week disproves the popular idea that abundance of money insures happiness. On Thursday last a well-dressed gentleman signed the register at Earle's Hotel, and went to the room assigned to him. The next morning when the door of the room was opened, the guest was seen stretched on the floor with a bullet through his brain. A note found in the room stated that the wicked act had not been committed from crime nor want of money, but through mental distress and gloomy foreboding. The man averred in his note that he had not had an hour's natural sleep in four months, and believed his insomnia would lead to madness. He possessed real estate worth four million dollars. It would be well if young men starting in the race for wealth and determined to sacrifice everything to success in that pursuit would consider this suicide and remember the Master's warning, "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth" (Luke 12 : 15).

Representatives of the Blue and the Gray met in unison at Cooper Union on April 9th to forward a very worthy and graceful object. It is proposed to erect at Richmond, Va., a home for needy disabled ex-Confederate soldiers, and the men most prominent in forwarding the good work are the officers and soldiers of the Northern army. In the course of an eloquent and affecting speech at the Cooper Union meeting, General Gordon said : "As an ex-Confederate soldier who laid down his arms at Appomattox I greet you with profound pleasure. After nearly twenty years of peace I can say that the analysis of the closing times of the war showed not a conflict of principles of government, but of construction. Both armies were patriotic ; both were Republican. Devotion to liberty and the principles of the Constitution were the fountain from which both drank inspiration. Though foes in fact, we were comrades even then in having the same purpose, which will never die in an American soul." Several Northern officers also delivered fraternal speeches. It is remarkable that while the politicians who remained at home during the war looking after fat contracts, are now so industriously waving the bloody shirt, the soldiers who suffered wounds and privation and hardship are holding friendly council together. So it frequently happens in the Christian army ; the men who are most in earnest for their Saviour are generally the men most ready to be reconciled to their enemies. (Job31 : 29, 30).

A Girl Chained to the Floor of a Room for seven weeks by her betrayer at Scranton, Pa., was released on April 11th. She was living with her mother at Lewiston when she became acquainted with the man who plotted her ruin. Deceived by a promise of marriage she quitted her home and went to Scranton to his home. Finding the man did not intend to keep his promise she attempted to leave him, but he procured a stout chain, and secured her to a staple in the floor. She was kept a prisoner there for seven weeks, having nothing to eat but sandwiches, which her inhuman jailer brought in his pocket from the restaurants. At length she succeeded in making her escape, and ran barefoot through the streets to a place of shelter. It is not often that such a case of cruelty is reported, but cases occur every day which ought to deter girls from listening to men who tempt them to sin. The warnings of the Bible are clear and explicit on the subject (II Tim. 3 : 1-7).

How Paralysis was Cured by a Dog was Explained recently by Dr. H. Gibbons in the course of a lecture on "The Body and the Mind," before the Cooper Medical College, San Francisco, a full report of which appears in the Medical and Surgical Journal. Dr. Gibbons stated that a paralytic had long used crutches, one of his legs hanging dead at his side. He frequently passed through a certain gateway, taking care to keep at a safe distance from a fierce dog chained near by. While hobbling along one day the dog made a leap toward him and broke the chain. Away went the crutches and away went the cripple, leaping like a deer. The lecturer explained this and similar cases described, by the fact that paralysis is the result of the pressure of blood on one lobe of the brain, and that when the blood is absorbed or driven away by a sudden fright or excitement the muscles of the limbs regain their proper functions like a released spring. In spiritual matters sudden transformations like this from helplessness and impotency to active work for Christ have been witnessed ; but, unlike the case of the recovered paralytic, the change is not the recovery of former functions, but of new life imparted by the Holy Spirit (Ezek. 36 : 26, 27).

The Race of a Train against a Cyclone is described in the Observer of Charlottle, N. C. : "A train on the Chester and Lenoir Narrow Gauge Railroad had passed Lowerysville, and was speeding in the direction of Lincolnton, when all on board were startled by a roaring sound that could be distinctly heard above the noise of the train, and on looking back they saw an immense whirlwind tearing along the railroad track, following directly behind the train at a rapid rate. The engineer was among the first to see it, and realizing what the consequences would be should the whirlwind overtake the train, he pulled the throttle wide open, and an exciting race began. There were several ladies on the train, and they cried, while the men were wild with excitement, and called to the engineer to put on more steam. The race was kept up in this way for about five minutes, when the train turned a curve in the road. As the whirlwind struck the curve it left the railroad track, speeding its way straight on through the fields. At the time it left the track it was not more than 300 yards behind the train." Those who have witnessed the havoc caused by these tornadoes can understand the terror of the engineer and his passengers as they fled for their lives. The incident recalls the prophetic warning to the nations, which he says will yet fly at the rebuke of God "like a rolling thing before the whirlwind" (Isa. 17 : 13).

SLAYING THE SACRIFICE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And he shall kill the bullock before the Lord."—LEVITICUS 1 : 5.

The Law of the Sacrifice—A Fundamental Doctrine—The Victim Must be Slain—I. Its Death Essential—Christ's Death not a Mere Adjunct of His Life—The Result and Penalty of Sin—Necessary to Clear the Conscience—II. Effectually Prevalent—Because of the Glory of His Person—His Perfection—The Nature of His Death—III. Intensely Instructive—Shows the Claim of God—The Evil of Sin—The Love of God—IV. Energetically Inspiring—With the Spirit of Consecration—Zeal for the Salvation of Others.

YOU remember that last Sabbath day we spoke of two things vitally essential to a true sacrifice, and the first upon which we then enlarged was the laying on of the hands of the offerer upon the victim, by which he accepted it as his sacrifice, and made a typical transfer of his sin from himself to the victim.* Now, the second essential thing, of which we are to speak this morning, was this—that the victim thus bearing the guilt of the offerer must be killed ; its blood must be shed before the Lord ; nothing short of its death by violence would render it an atonement for the offerer : "He shall kill the bullock." You will find this order continually repeated whenever a sacrifice is spoken of.

I have not this morning a controversial topic upon which to debate before you. However important controversy may sometimes be, we are glad to be away from its strife, and to consider a doctrine around which true believers gather in hearty unity—a doctrine which must be taken for granted in the Christian Church, which lies at the very root of truth, and in the very heart of true religion. Without controversy, great is this mystery of godliness, that Christ manifest in the flesh must die for sin, or otherwise sin cannot be put away. You remember what the Greek said when he heard an old philosopher with hoary head and gray beard disputing upon how to live. "Goodness!" said he, "if at his age he is disputing upon that subject, when will he be able to practise his conclusions should he arrive at any?" Truly, I may say to you to whom I have so long ministered, if we are forever to be learning and never coming to a knowledge of the truth, what will become of us? If we are to have nothing but questionable matters laid before us, when shall the time come for the actual possession and enjoyment of the blessings of the Gospel? At this hour my theme is such that I speak to you without diffidence or hesitation. In this case "we believe and are sure." Concerning our Lord Jesus Christ, the great sacrifice for sin, it was essential that He should die ; for only through the blood which He shed on Calvary for human guilt can there be preached among men the remission of sins. May the Holy Spirit lay home the blood of atonement to our consciences at this time to the glory of God and our own peace!

I. Concerning the killing and slaying of the offering, our first point is that it was ABSOLUTELY ESSENTIAL.

The pouring out of the blood of the victim was of the very essence of the type. The death of Christ by blood-shedding was absolutely necessary to make Him an acceptable sacrifice for sin. "It behoved Christ to suffer." He could only enter into the presence of God with His own blood. He could not be the grain of wheat which bringeth forth much fruit unless He should die.

Remember that although there were important matters about the victim, yet nothing would have availed if it had not been slain. The Israelite brought an unblemished bullock, but the fact of its being unblemished did not make it an atonement for sin ; no doubt, many faultless bullocks and lambs still fed in the plains of Sharon. If the most perfect animal had gone away from the altar alive it would have effected nothing whatever by way of atonement. It must be unblemished in order to be an offering at all; still, its perfections did not make it a sacrifice until it was killed. No matter what could be said of that bullock, it must die, and its blood must be sprinkled upon the altar, or else the offerer has brought no acceptable oblation. All its life and its labor would not satisfy.

Nor would it be enough to bring the bullock there and dedicate it to God. Some animals which had been dedicated to the divine service were used in the drawing of the wagons which carried the sacred furniture through the wilderness; but they were not sacrifices for all that, neither did they avail for the bearing away of sin. It was indispensably necessary that the bullock should be without blemish; it was necessary that it should be voluntarily dedicated to God; but if it had not been killed, there would have been no presentation of an offering according to the divine law, nor any easing of the conscience of the Israelite. Even so, Jesus must die; His perfect nature, His arduous labor, His blameless life, His perfect consecration, could avail us nothing without the shedding of His blood for many, for the remission of sin. So far from His death being a mere adjunct and conclusion of His life, it is the most important matter connected with Him; it stands in the foreground, it is the head and front of His redeeming work. We justly value Him for His example, and for His living intercession; but in the business of atonement it is beyond all things needful that we view Him as the Lamb slain.

Now notice that this was expressly in the Jewish law-book in express words (Levit. 17: 11.) I need not quote another Old Testament text, because this is so completely to the point, and so fully covers the whole of the ground. The atonement is not the animal itself, but the blood of the animal, which blood represents its life. As to the entire Scriptures, they teem with statements of this truth.

In the Old Testament, one of the most instructive types of redemption ever given is that of the Passover lamb. When God was about to smite Egypt He promised to spare His people; and in order to their safety He bade each family take a lamb, and kill it, and sprinkle the blood upon the lintel and the two side posts of their door. Then they were to keep within the house till the morning, and the destroying angel should not touch so much as one of them. What is expressly said by God Himself about this passing-over? "And when I see the blood, I will pass over you." There was never a fuller type of the redemption of Christ, I hardly think one so full, as that of the passing-over of Israel through the blood of the paschal lamb; but the essence of that passing-over is displayed to us in this sentence—"When I see the blood, I will pass over you." God's eye resting upon the evidence of a life having been taken instead of the sinner's life, is the reason why He passes over the sinner, so that he does not die.

When Isaiah, the great evangelical prophet, spake concerning Him upon whom the Lord laid our iniquity, he mentions His death as the main cause of His glorious reward. The last verse of the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah is of the whole, and it runs thus: "Therefore will I divide Him a portion with the great, and He shall divide the spoil with the strong; because He hath poured out His soul unto death." It is a wonderful expression: it shows that or else He could not achieve the victory for us, nor share the spoil thereof. This is the verdict, not only of the Holy Ghost in the inspired prophecy, but also of all that dwell with God above, for they sing with sweet accord before the throne—"A new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof; for Thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation."

In the New Testament the passages abound which set forth the doctrine upon which we are now speaking. Look at that passage in Hebrews 9: 12. There we are told expressly, "Without shedding of blood there is no remission." There is no remission by the life of Christ, no remission by the teaching of Christ, no remission by our repentance, no remission by our faith, apart from the shedding of the blood of Christ, by whom alone sin is put away. This is negative; but in this case the negative is as strong as the most positive statement could be; for if without shedding of blood there is no remission, then we see how all-important that blood-shedding becomes. If you desire a positive statement, a sentence rises to our lips at once—"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." Observe, not the life, not the incarnation, not the resurrection, not the second coming of the Lord Jesus, but His blood, His death, the giving up of His life, is that which cleanseth us from all sin. This is that purging with hyssop whereof David speaks when he laments his sin, and yet looks to be made whiter than snow by

of his God.

My brethren, this is the cause of the saints being in heaven. In the first chapter of the Book of the Revelation, verse 5, we have the doxology, which begins, "Unto Him that loved us, and washed us from our sins in His own blood." Thus say all the glorified. Further on we are told concerning the saints, "They have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb. Therefore are they before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night in His temple; and He that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them." This is the true reading of the fourteenth verse of the last chapter of the Book of Revelation: "Blessed are they that wash their robes, that they may have the right to the tree of life, and may enter in by the gates into the city." Thus the passport to glory is the precious blood of Jesus. Access to God either on earth or in heaven is only by the blood of the Son of God.

Now and then we meet with some squeamish person who says, "I cannot bear the mention of the word blood." Such individuals will be horrified this morning; and it is intended that they should be. Sin is such that God has appointed blood to wash it away, that the very horror which the thought of it causes may give you some notion of the terrible nature of sin as God judges it. It is not without a dreadful blood-shedding that your dreadful guilt could by any possibility be cleansed. Sin-bearing, and suffering for sin, can never be pleasant things; neither should the type which sets it forth be pleasing to the observer. On great days of sacrifice the courts of the tabernacle must have seemed like a shambles, and fitly so, that all might be struck with the deadly nature of sin.

The church militant is called upon continually to commemorate the blood-shedding. So often as we gather to the Communion Table we may ask the question, "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not the communion of the blood of Christ?" At the sacred table we show the death of our Lord until He come. He says to us in express words, "This is my blood of the new testament, which is shed for many for the remission of sins." He bids you remember the blood as you drink of the fruit of the vine, saying, "This cup is the new testament in my blood." Take the blood away, and the communion of the Lord's Supper has gone; there remains nothing but the Popish mass which is so blasphemously called an unbloody sacrifice for the quick and dead.

Here let us further consider that death is of sin—"The soul that sinneth it shall die." "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." "The wages of sin is death." It was meet that the Substitute should bear a similar chastisement to that which should have fallen upon the sinner. Our Saviour did not endure annihilation, for that is not the meaning of death; neither the first nor the second death should be so explained. Jesus was not annihilated, but He bore the pain, the loss, the ruin, the separation, the overwhelming which is intended by death.

There is great comfort to my soul in this; for if the Lord Jesus has paid the capital sentence nothing remains unpaid. "He that is dead is freed from sin;" that is to say, if the law has killed the man it can ask no more of him, he must be free from further charge of guilt. When the criminal has died he has suffered the last sentence of the law, and is now beyond its jurisdiction. Our Lord Jesus has died the just for the unjust, and as that which He has borne is nothing less than death, it must cover all that is due to sin.

This death of Christ was absolutely necessary also for the clearing of the troubled conscience. An awakened conscience will never be quieted with anything less than the blood of the Lamb; it rests at the sight of the great Sacrifice, but nowhere else. A conscience smarting under a sense of sin is an unequalled fountain of misery. Let conscience once begin to scourge the sinner, and he will find it to be the most terrible tormentor out of hell. I do not know whether the prophet Isaiah was really sawn asunder by Manasseh, but we know that some of the saints suffered that torture; yet surely a saw that should gradually cut a man in halves from head to foot is a faint picture of what conscience can do when it begins to operate upon the mind with all its cutting force. What a divine atonement that must be which calms the storms of an accusing conscience and gives the soul a lasting peace.

Thus much, then, upon our first point: for many reasons it was absolutely essential that our great Sacrifice should die.

II. Secondly, we will with great delight meditate upon the fact that the death of Christ is EFFECTUALLY PREVALENT.

Other offerings, though duly slain, did nothing thoroughly, did nothing lastingly, did nothing really, by way of expiation; for the Scripture saith, "It is not possible that the blood of bulls and of goats should take away sins;" the true purification is alone found in the death of the Son of God. When our Lord was fastened to the tree, and cried, "It is finished," and gave up the ghost, He had finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness. By offering one sacrifice for sins forever the work was done, the accusing record was altogether blotted out. Why was there such cleansing power in the Redeemer's blood? I answer, for several reasons.

First, because of the glory of His person. Only think who He was! He was none other than the "Light of light, very God of very God." He counted it not robbery to be equal with God, yet He took upon Himself our nature, and was born of a virgin. His holy soul dwelt in a perfectly pure body, and to this the Godhead was united: "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." Now for this glorious, this sinless, this divine person, to die is an amazing thing. However gross the insults which sin may have rendered to the law, they must be all forgotten, since Jesus magnified the law so abundantly, and made it so honorable by His death. I believe in the special design of our Lord's atoning death, but I will yield to no one in my belief in the absolutely infinite value of the offering which our Lord Jesus has presented; the glory of His person renders the idea of limitation an insult.

Next, consider the perfection of our Lord's character. In Him was no sin nor tendency to sin. He was "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners." In His character we see every virtue at its best; He is incomparable. If He therefore died, "the just for the unjust," what must be the merit of such a death? His righteousness has such sweetness in it that all the ill-savor of our transgression is put away thereby; it is no wonder that by the obedience of such an one as this second Adam many are made righteous.

Think next, dear friends, of the nature of the death of Christ, and you will be helped to see how effectual it must be. His was a cruel doom; human malice could scarcely have invented any method of execution more sure to create pain and anguish than death by hanging on a tree, fastened by nails driven through hands and feet. In addition to His physical pain, our Lord was sore vexed in spirit. His soul sufferings were the soul of His sufferings: "He was exceeding sorrowful even unto death." Now, for the Son of God to die, and die in such a manner, was a marvel. Never martyr died crying that he was forsaken of his God; that desertion was of the Saviour's grief, and since He died thus I can well understand that He has thereby made an ample atonement for the sins of all who believe in Him.

And then think of the spirit in which our Lord and Saviour bore all this. Martyrs who have died for the faith have only paid the debt of nature a little before its time, for they must have died sooner or later; but our Lord needed not to have died at all. He said of His life, "No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down of myself." The pouring out of His soul unto death was not in the power of man until the Lord was pleased to yield Himself a sacrifice. "He gave Himself for me." Oh, it was that death of our Lord, for He went up to the cross with such willing submission that it became His throne! The thorn crown was such a diadem as emperor never wore, it was made of the ended sorrows of His people—sorrows ended by their encircling His own majestic head.

And then I bid you to remember once more the covenant character which Christ sustained: for when He was crucified we thus judge that one died for all, and in Him all died. He was not slain as a private individual, but He was put to death as a representative man. It was meet that He should die for us, seeing He had assumed the position of the second Adam, being constituted our federal Head and Representative.

III. Beloved friends, it seems to me that no one will now forbid my saying, thirdly, that the fact of the necessity for the death of the Lord Jesus is INTENSELY INSTRUCTIVE.

Listen while I repeat the lessons very briefly; you can enlarge upon them when you go hence to meditate in solitude.

Must the victims die? must Jesus bleed? then let us see what is claimed by our righteous God. He claims our life; He claimed of the offering its blood, which is the life thereof; He justly requires of each of us our whole life. We must not dream of satisfying God with formal prayers or occasional alms-deeds, or outward ceremonies, or a half-hearted reverence. He must have our heart, and soul, and mind and strength—all that makes our true self, the life of our being.

Next, must the sacrifice die? then see the evil of sin. It is not such a trifle as certain men imagine. It is a deadly evil, a killing poison. God Himself in human form took human guilt upon Him; the sin was none of His, it was only imputed to Him, but when He was made sin for us, and bare our iniquities, there was no help for it, He must die! Even He must die! It was not possible that the cup should pass from Him. Who, then, will take pleasure in transgression? Will not every man who loves his own life arouse himself to fight against iniquity?

Next learn the love of God. Behold

HOW HE LOVED YOU

and me! He must punish sin, but He must save us, and so He gives His Son to die in our stead. I shall not go too far if I say that in giving His Son the Lord God gave Himself, for Jesus is one with the Father. We cannot divide the Substance though we distinguish the Persons; thus God Himself made atonement for sin committed against Himself. The church is "the flock of God which He hath purchased with His own blood."

Next, learn how Christ has made an end of sin. Sin is laid on Him and He dies; then sin is dead and buried; if it be sought for it cannot be found. Speak of finality, this is the truest and surest finality that ever was or shall be. "If a man die, shall he live again?" Not as before. If Christ died, what is there after death? Nothing but the judgment, and lo! he comes to that judgment: "being raised from the dead he dieth no more, death hath no more dominion over him." This is our joy because neither sin nor death can have dominion over us for whom Christ died, and who died in Him. Christ has made an end of sin. His one offering has perfected forever the set-apart ones.

These are but a few of the great lessons which we may learn from the necessity that the Sacrifice should be slain. I pray you learn them well. May they be engraven on your hearts by the Holy Ghost.

IV. And so I shall close by saying that this blessed subject is not only full of instruction, but it is

ENERGETICALLY INSPIRING.

First, this inspires us with the spirit of consecration. When I think that I could not be saved except by the death of Jesus, then I feel that I am not my own, but bought with a price. I remember reading of Charles Simeon, the famous evangelical clergyman of Cambridge, that he was one day thrown from his horse, and was fearful that he had sustained serious injury. When he had recovered from the force of the fall, he stretched out his right arm, felt it, and finding that there was not a bone broken, he consecrated that arm anew to the living God, who had so graciously preserved it. Then he examined his left arm and found it all right, and so held that up, and dedicated it anew unto the divine service. He did the same with his head, his legs, and his whole body. As I was thinking over this subject I felt as if I must go over my body, soul, and spirit, and dedicate all to that dear Saviour by whose blood I am altogether redeemed from death and hell. "Bless the Lord, O my soul; and all that is within me, bless His holy name."

Next, this truth should create in us a longing after the greatest holiness, for we should say, "Did sin kill my Saviour? Then I will kill sin! Could I not be saved from sin except by His precious blood? Then, O sin, I will be revenged upon thee! I will drive thee out by the help of God's Spirit. I will not endure thee nor harbor thee. I will make no provision for the flesh. As sin was the death of Christ for me, so Christ shall be the death of sin in me."

Does not this inspire you with great love for the Lord Jesus? Can you look at His dear wounds and not be wounded with love for Him? Are not His wounds as mouths which plead with you to yield Him all your hearts? Can you gaze upon His face bedewed with bloody sweat and then go away and be ensnared with the world's painted beauties? Heard you ever of a wooer dressed in such robes of love as those which Jesus wore? Did ever love use such sacred means to win the beloved heart as Christ hath done? What can any one of us do but answer Him thus—

"Here, Lord, I give myself away,
'Tis all that I can do"?

Do you not think that this solemn truth should inspire us with great zeal for the salvation of others? As Christ laid down His life for us, should we not lay ourselves out for perishing souls, and, if necessary, lay down our lives for the brethren? Should we not practise self-denial in our labors to bring men to Jesus? Should we not joyfully toil and cheerfully bear reproach, if by any means we may save some?

Methinks if this subject should go home to our hearts it would be beneficial to us in a thousand ways, and make us better soldiers of the cross, closer followers of the Lamb. I pray that God the Holy Ghost may place it in the centre of our souls, and keep it there. It will bring with it

PEACE AND REST.

Why should we be troubled, since Jesus died? It will fill our mouths with praises. Hallelujah to the Lamb that was slain, who has redeemed us by His blood! It will draw us into closer communion with Him. If He loved us and died for us, we must live with Him, and in Him, and to Him. Surely it will also make us long to behold Him! Oh for the vision of the Crucified! When shall we see the face that was so marred for us? When shall we behold the hands and feet which bear the nail-marks still, and look into the wounded side bejewelled with the spear-wound? Oh when shall we up and away from all our sins and griefs, for ever to behold Him shine and see Him still before us? Oh when shall we be "Far from a world of grief and sin,

With God eternally shut in"?

Till then our hope, our solace, our glory, our victory, are all found in the blood of the Lamb, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

MAJOR-GENERAL SIR G. GRAHAM, V.C., K.C.B.

Major-General Sir Gerald Graham, K.C.B., who commanded the British force recently acting against Osman Digma in the Eastern Soudan, is the son of the late R. H. Graham, Esq., M.D., of Eden Broads, Cumberland. He was born in 1831, received his military education at Woolwich, and entered the Royal Engineers in 1850. He served in the Crimea against Russia in 1854–55, and was present at the battles of Alma and Inkerman. He led a ladder-party to the assault of the Redan, for which he was awarded the Victoria Cross, the coveted distinction alike of general and private soldier, for it is awarded only for some special feat of personal valor. He was twice wounded during the campaign. In 1860 he went to China, and served at the assaults of Tangku and the Taku forts, and was present at the surrender of Pekin. He was also wounded during this campaign. His merit was so conspicuous, that in 1881 he was promoted to be major-general, and in the autumn of the following year was appointed to the command of the Second Brigade of the Egyptian Expedition. He was present at the engagements of El-Magfar and Tel Mahuta, the two actions of Kassassin, in the first of which, with 1700 men, he beat off an attack of 10,000 of Arabi's foliowers, and at the battle of Tel-el-Kebir.

For his services in the campaign he received the thanks of the British Parliament, and when peace was restored was left in charge of a brigade at Cairo. When, on Baker Pasha's defeat on February 4th, this year, the British Government decided to send an expeditionary force to Suakim to relieve the beleaguered garrisons of Sinkat and Tokar, General Graham was appointed to the command. The success of his arrangements, his victory at Teb, and subsequent occupation of Tokar, are now all well known. Mr. Gladstone has paid a graceful tribute in the House of Commons to the manner in which he has performed his task.

His second battle with the Arabs of the Soudan was fought on March 13th. Fighting began soon after daybreak, resulting in the complete rout of the enemy and the capture of Osman Digma's camp at the Tamasi wells. As at El Teb, the Arabs hurled themselves against the British squares with dogged and fanatical bravery, inflicting heavy losses upon the British forces, and sustaining great slaughter themselves in what proved an exciting and terrific struggle. General Graham married the daugher of George Durrant, Esq., of Elm Hall, Suffolk, and widow of the Rev. G. B. Blocker, Rector of West Rudham, Norfolk.

THE LATE PROFESSOR EZRA ABBOT, D.D., LL.D.

The distinguished scholar whose portrait appears on this page, died at Cambridge, Mass., on March 21st, aged sixty-four years. He had been for many years a sufferer from asthma and an internal disorder which had reduced his slight frame almost to a skeleton. In spite of his suffering, however, he continued to the last his prodigious literary labors. He was probably the greatest of all our scholars, and in his particular department—that of Biblical literature—it would be difficult to find his equal in the whole world. His knowledge of books was thorough and accurate, and his acquaintance with ancient manuscripts, especially those of the Greek Testament, was unrivalled. His profound learning was a marvel, astonishing all who knew him, and especially those who, having known him by repute, came for the first time into his presence. The small, emaciated man, whose modest bearing and slow hesitating speech led strangers to hold him in small esteem, it was difficult to make people believe was really the Dr. Abbot, the giant of learning.

His industry must have been prodigious. The vast stores of knowledge he had amassed and the singularly minute and exact acquaintance with ancient literature he possessed, proved that he must have toiled continuously and utilized every minute of his time. His disposition was kind in the extreme. The bulk of his literary work was given gratuitously to others, and brought him no public credit. His aid was solicited by scholars here and in Europe, and he would undertake, without hesitation, to read the proof-sheets of a work by some author almost unknown to him, and devote weeks and months to correcting them and verifying their statements. On one occasion he actually read over two hundred pages of Greek in order to be absolutely certain that an assertion contained in one sentence was accurate.

He leaves behind him comparatively few great works as monuments of his genius and learning, but he will be more missed than many better known authors. He spent his life in service for others, content that they should enjoy honor and fame while he remained unknown.

In editing jointly with Dr. Hackett the American edition of Smith's Bible Dictionary, in revising and completing Hudson's Greek and English Concordance of the New Testament, and in contributing articles on his special department of knowledge to encyclopædias, Dr. Abbot did work of immense value. He was also one of the foremost of the American revisers of the New Testament, and was able to render valuable aid in that task. It will be a long time before scholars find a man so able and so willing to aid them in their work.

Dr. Abbot was the son of a farmer, was born at Jackson, Me., on April 28th, 1819, and graduated in 1840 at Bowdoin. He afterward taught school for five years at Machias, Me. He was subsequently appointed Assistant Librarian of Harvard College, and in 1872 was made Bussey Professor of New Testament Criticism and interpretation in the same institution.

THE LATE BISHOP KAVANAUGH,

Of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

The Rev. Hubbard Hinde Kavanaugh, D.D., who died on March 19th, and whose portrait appears on this page, was one of the most remarkable and best known of Methodist bishops. He was born in Clark County, Kentucky, in 1802. At the time of his death he was eighty-two years of age, had been sixty years in the ministry and thirty years a bishop. He was a grandson of Dr. Thomas Hinde, famous among the early Methodists of the West. The future bishop commenced life as a printer, but his zeal and piety early recommended him to the Methodist Church for ministerial work. He joined the church at the age of sixteen, and five years later he was one of the regular itinerant preachers. In 1832 he attended the general conference as a delegate from the Kentucky Conference. He was also a member of the general conferences of 1836 and 1844. He fully sympathized with his Southern brethren in their attitude on the slavery question, but since the war he has been one of the most prominent in cultivating fraternal relations, preaching at Round Lake and other places. A fine portly man in appearance, he was also a pulpit orator of remarkable power, gifted with a voice singularly musical and sonorous, and his eloquence would stir a congregation to the highest pitch of enthusiasm or melt it to tears. Dr. Kavanaugh, though living more than fourscore years, so lived, that now he has gone to the grave thousands mourn that he should have been called away.

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

Mr. S. Hewitt, of Ashland, Cass Co., Ill., thus describes his experience of the Lord's healing in a letter to Miss Carrie F. Judd, which she publishes in her Triumphs of Faith.

"About the first of February, 1883, I was called to Jacksonville, Ill., on business; while walking the street I slipped and fell, but did not think it anything serious at that time. On returning home I found that my left arm was injured. In about two days from the time I fell I was taken with a chill and laid upon my bed; my arm swelled badly, erysipelas set in, and it rapidly grew worse. At this point amputation was thought necessary by some. For three weeks my arm laid on a pillow, perfectly helpless; I could not move it without assistance.

"During this time a revival meeting was being held near my home, and many of the Lord's people came in to see and pray with me, and we were blessed together. The subject of faith healing was brought before me, and the testimony of those healed was read to me from time to time, that my attention might be drawn to the subject. But it all seemed for some one else and not for me.

"About the last of February some of the praying ones were with me all day, reading to me and instructing me on the subject of faith healing. I was very slow to believe in regard to my own case. I believed God was able and willing to heal any one who would believe for it, but yet it seemed to me I could not thus believe.

"About the usual time for service in the evening, one came to me all ready to go to the meeting, and said, 'Brother Hewitt, I believe the Lord wants to heal your arm before we go to church.' I said, 'I don't know whether He does or not.' He said, 'Will you try to believe?' As my arm lay there helpless on the pillow with all its corruptness right before my eyes, I said, 'Do you want me to believe that it is instantly made well?' He answered, 'Yes,' I replied, 'That looks difficult, but by the grace of God I will believe.'

"He then engaged in prayer, I praying with him and the others. My thoughts seemed to cling to the great helplessness of my arm, but after a little my soul took wings and I was greatly blessed. Then by the help of the Lord I laid my faith down on the promise, and the next moment I found myself sitting up in bed.

Removing all the wrappings from my arm, I thrust my hand to the injured spot and found all the soreness gone, and my soul was abundantly blessed.

"The morning following the doctor came. Finding me up, he was much surprised. When I told him the Lord had healed me he desired to see my arm; rolling up my sleeve he turned to my wife and said, 'You have no more need of me.'"

ADA RAYMOND'S LAST BALL.

(See Illustration.)

IN a fashionable mansion, in a room where on every side were signs of wealth and luxury, sat a young lady of about eighteen. In her hand she held a card of invitation to a ball, to be given at a friend's house that evening. A few weeks before, Ada Raymond had accepted it with high glee, and had counted the days which must elapse before the day fixed. But in the interval a momentous event had occurred. One of her most intimate friends fell ill. "Only a cold," was the verdict given on her case. But the cold became pneumonia, that dread scourge of our Eastern cities, and, two weeks ago, Ada Raymond had seen her friend lie still in death. A clergyman was present at the time, who said to Ada, as she knelt weeping at the bedside, "Death comes to all, but he has no terrors for those whom Christ has saved."

Ada made no reply at the time, but the words sank into her heart, and led to serious thought and prayer. She was seeking light, and somehow the ball so eagerly anticipated seemed to lose its glamour; and, on the whole, she wished she had not promised to go.

There was also another cause for uneasiness. The previous night Ada Raymond had a dream. It had such a painful, terrible vividness belonging to it, that, try as she would, she could not banish it from her thoughts; it haunted and followed her wherever she went, making her miserable and unhappy, a feeling quite new to the petted, spoiled daughter of fashion. But her dress was ready, and her friends would be disappointed if she did not go, and finally she resolved that she would be there. She had no mother to consult, and her father was a man of the world, who, if she told him the circumstances, would prescribe the ball "to drive away the blues."

A modern ball-room is not a place where an anxious soul is likely to be at ease. The careless, the frivolous, even the vicious soul can find pleasure there. Ladies appear there in dresses which are an offence to modesty if not to decency; the music is of the most exciting kind, and the modern dance appears as if it were expressly designed to promote sensuality. A soul "hungering after righteousness," anxious to "depart from evil," finds in a ball-room the very surroundings most antagonistic to its progress toward light and truth.

Ada Raymond looked around her, looked at her own reflection in a mirror, and shuddered. She made her way to a conservatory opening out of the ball-room, and sat down to think. But soon a young gentleman to whom she had promised a dance came in search of her, and found her place of concealment. As she rose to accompany him her agitation became extreme. Her face was stained with tears, and she trembled from head to foot. Her partner saw and sympathized with her. He placed her gently in the seat from which she had risen, and said, "Let me send a friend to you, you seem to be unwell."

"No, do not send any one to me," said Ada, "I shall be better presently, and then I will go home. I cannot dance to-night."

In a short time Ada recovered, and begged her partner to conduct her to the hostess that she might make her excuses and depart. They found the lady sitting a little apart from her guests among the plants which decorated the approach to the ball-room. The lady, a florid, voluptuous beauty, looked keenly at Ada's pale face and swollen eyelids, and inquired anxiously the cause of her distress. But Ada could not explain then, and was only eager to leave the scene of frivolous pleasure. It was not difficult to obtain that permission, for a face so woebegone as Ada's, the hostess was not anxious to have among the guests, chilling their gaiety. Her cavalier accordingly conducted her to a carriage, and she was soon in her own room at home.

She sat for some time lost in thought, from which she was aroused by the entrance of Janet, a pious old Scotchwoman, who had been her nurse and who still remained in Mr. Raymond's household, held there by her love of Ada and Ada's love of her.

"And how is it, my purty bairn, ye have returned so soon; dinna ye feel well?"

"O Janet, I am miserable, wretched, and unhappy. I want you to pray for me. I dreamed last night that I died, and that an angel came and carried me to heaven. The place was so beautiful, and every one was so happy, and my mother was there; but just as I was going to kiss her a stern angel came between us and said to me, 'Hence, you have no right to be here,' and he hurried me out through the golden gates. O Janet, I cannot describe my feelings as I left the beautiful scene and heard the soft music and saw angels everywhere around. Suddenly I found myself standing on the brink of an awful precipice. I cannot describe the horrors I saw below, although I can see it now—O Janet, what can it mean?"

"That the gude Lord could see ye was being drawn awa fra Him by the giddy whirl of pleasure, and so thought He would show ye in a dream what ye might expect if ye did na follow Him. It was a warning, my sweet; listen to it noo."

"Janet, will you pray for me?" asked Ada.

"That I will, my sweet, but just you pray for yoursel'; the gude Lord would rather hear you." There in the solitary hours, when all others of the household had gone to rest, the two women prayed—Ada for peace and pardon, Janet that she might find it. The rays of morning still found Ada on her knees; though she had dismissed Janet, she herself had not gone to rest, but with her mother's Bible open before her she knelt and prayed for light. That night was the turning point in her life. Before another day had passed she had given her heart to God, and had turned her back forever upon the pleasures of the world.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Favored Sinner.

MR. WALDRON pleading with John Morley was a spectacle sad and strange. The despicable fellow who had desolated a home, who had corrupted and stolen away the wife of the bookseller, wanted to come home to enjoy himself as if his sin had been slight; and his father wanted to receive him. Mr. Waldron showed some sense of the irreparable wrong his son had done by asking the bookseller's consent to the sinner's return, but even he did not realize as he should have done how vile his son was. So it seemed to the gentle girl who listened to the aristocrat's appeal.

Hester's work had fallen from her hands; and the faint color in her cheeks faded altogether away.

"Do you hear me?" asked Mr. Waldron, when the silence grew insupportable.

"I hear you," muttered John Morley again.

"Then why do you not answer me?" he cried impatiently. "I need not have spoken to you at all about my son's return. But tell me that you will give your consent to his coming back to me; after all these years."

"And she?" whispered the husband, with bloodless lips and a face as of one upon the point of death from some slow torture.

"I know nothing of her," was the short answer. "I am not talking of her, but of my son"—

He paused suddenly, for Hester had left her seat, and placed herself at her father's side, with her hand resting fondly and protectingly on his arm.

"You are talking of your son," she said in hurried tones, "and of your own desolation; but you do not think what it has been here, in this home, to me, to my father. You have no right to speak of desolation to us; you, who have had your duties and your pleasures as before. Look at my father if you wish to see what your son has done. Look at me. We have had no laughter, or smiles, or joyful words, not one, these nine years. If he is to come home again, why may not she? Has she not repented, do you think? Would it be impossible to bring back our banished one as well as yours?"

"It would be impossible," answered Mr. Waldron, in a low voice.

"Would it be impossible, father?" she continued. "If she came back, as his son comes back, penitent, and suffering, and broken-hearted, could we not take her in, the poor, contrite creature? I think of her often," and Hester's voice almost failed her. "Is it impossible?"

"She can never come back," replied John Morley.

"Oh! it is not right," cried Hester, in her young energy of passion; "why should you receive your son back, if we cannot forgive her? If he comes back forgiven, why should not we open our door to her?"

"You are a child yet, Hester," answered Mr. Waldron.

"Yes," she said, "but there are some things hidden from the wise and prudent, which are revealed to babes. I would not receive one, and cast out the other. If she should ever come back, broken-hearted and penitent, be sure I will not turn away from her."

She spoke with a kind of gracious hardihood at which Mr. Waldron would have smiled any other time, but he was too deeply in earnest just now to be moved by anything apart from his purpose. He had made it a point with his conscience to obtain John Morley's permission for the return of his son; and as yet he had said nothing which could be construed into consent.

"Hester," he said, for John Morley looked like one half stupefied, "my son is truly repentant, and he implores your father to forgive him, and to suffer him to return home. He knows nothing, and has known nothing for years, of that unhappy woman. If we could discover her we would do everything in our power to repair the past, as far as it ever can be repaired. Tell me, Hester, is your father Christian in prolonging the exile of my boy?"

His voice and attitude were full of entreaty, which had relinquished all the harshness of a claim. He listened for Hester's answer as for a sentence which would be the doom of his son. John Morley himself raised his lustreless eyes, and fastened them upon his daughter.

"My father will not banish him from his home," she said, with a singular and solemn sweetness in her tone; "what are we that any of us should refuse mercy to another? Are we not bound to forgive, who have been forgiven of God?"

"No, no!" cried her father, "you do not know what the wrong is, Hester. I cannot do it. He has cursed all my life. They have almost, if not quite—I do not know yet whether they have not quite—destroyed my soul! These nine years I have caught no passing glimpse of God's mercy. I have been the song of the drunkard; I have been exceedingly filled with contempt. Do not let me see him, Hester; I could not look into his face, and both of us live after it."

Like Mr. Waldron, he was appealing to Hester, as if upon her depended the sentence which would be final. She stood silent for a minute looking tenderly into his face, with tears in her clear, gray eyes; and when she spoke there was a scarcely perceptible tremor in her voice, though her answer was steady and definite.

"He must come home," she said; "he would come, sooner or later, if you withheld your consent. But he must not run the risk of meeting you. He must promise never to enter our chapel, or pass up and down this street, and then you will never see him. Let him come home if he will, but he must not intermeddle with us. You would consent to that, father?"

"Yes," he answered, reluctantly.

"And you, Mr. Waldron?" she continued. "Do you understand our condition, and will you agree to it? If he will but keep away out of our sight he will not greatly stir our old grief. You agree to it?"

"Yes, yes!" he replied, eagerly; "he shall never come across your father, Hester. God bless you, child! But shall we never see you? Will you not come down sometimes to see us, as you used to do. Could you not forgive my son well enough to speak to him, and tell him that you have forgiven him? You remember him, Hester?"

"I remember him well," she said, sighing; "I have not much to remember. Yes, I forgive him, and I forgive her also. Only I do not wish to see him again. But if I knew where she was, I would seek her out, and let her know that I had not deserted her."

"You will feel differently when you are a woman," said Mr. Waldron.

Hester shook her head, with a faint smile in her eyes, and went back to her chair and her sewing. There followed a silence which told Mr. Waldron plainly enough that it was time to go. He looked round the room, dark, shabby, and bare, with the wear of nine years upon it since he had last stood within its walls. He glanced at John Morley, upon whom a premature old age had fallen, more decrepit than that of years. Hester herself, pale, subdued, and womanly, bore a burden of years which had pressed hardly upon her in the passing. He saw the work of his son for whom he had been pleading; and his heart felt heavy in spite of his success. His own home might lose the light cloud which had overshadowed it, but what could ever chase away the thick gloom which had fallen upon this hearth? He had attained his purpose; but he went away saddened, and occupying his shrewd head with schemes for the welfare of John Morley and Hester, which had little chance of fulfilment.

Robert Waldron's long banishment of nine years had not been without alleviation or enjoyment. He had satiated his restless love of travel, which had been the fever of his youth; and now, at the age of thirty-three, he felt quite willing to settle down into the luxurious order of an English home, and to enter upon the pleasant occupations of an English gentleman. His father had by no means misrepresented wilfully his condition as one of remorse and contrition; he was convinced that his son was repenting in sackcloth and ashes for that long past sin, which was kept so vividly in mind by himself and John Morley.

Nor had he been altogether deceived in this matter. There were seasons when Robert Waldron's volatile nature was plunged into profound depths of self-reproach, very closely allied to repentance. At these times, having no reticence, he appealed to his father for sympathy, and made him the confidant of all the prickings of his conscience. But it was many years since he had seen Rose; and but for the mystery of her utter disappearance, which kept alive a sort of interest in her fate, he would long ago have ceased to think of her. He wished to be at peace with both the world and himself; and therefore the recollection of his former folly stung him at times into a kind of paroxysm of regret and compunction.

The difficulty of obtaining permission to visit Aston Court served to aggravate his home-sickness. He very well understood the point his father made of asking John Morley's consent; and in this he had more consideration for the injured husband than had Miss Waldron, who felt her dignity infringed by the idea that her family should stand upon such terms with that of a tradesman. Readily enough Robert acquiesced in the conditions laid down by Hester. He promised to avoid any contact with John Morley, and never to go to the chapel where he worshipped, nor into the street where he dwelt. Having bound himself by these promises, he turned his face homeward with all the gladness which his emotional temperament experienced in at last gaining a long-delayed pleasure.

It was with a very keen feeling of delight that he caught the first glimpse of the formal front of his father's house, with its dark background of trees. Mr. Waldron, a sturdy, hale old man not much aged since he had seen him last, was walking up and down the terrace in expectation of his arrival, and Robert called impetuously upon the coachman to stop, and sprang from the carriage to receive his welcome. The father and son held one another's hand, in the strong, stern grasp which is the acme of Anglo-Saxon emotion, and gazed without speaking into each other's face.

Mr. Waldron could not suppress a thrill of pride in this fine, handsome man, no longer a youth, whom he could call his son; and for a few minutes his satisfaction was both profound and untroubled. Yet, as second thoughts came, he felt a little disconcerted, for he had been picturing to himself a feeble, broken-spirited, shame-faced prodigal, coming back with the mournful confession in his mouth, "Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee."

True, there was a moisture in Robert's fine eyes, and his mustache rose and fell with the tremulous motion of his lips, but there was the rude glow of health and the sun-burnt hue of travel on his face. Beyond this and below it there was an indefinable air of general self-complacency, not in offensive obtrusiveness—it was no more than the gentlemanly self-approbation of one who for the time being has no special reason for diffidence—yet it was certainly very far removed from the mien of the prodigal, who needs the best robe brought forth, and shoes put upon his feet, and a ring on his hand. All these Robert had supplied for himself.

He embraced his sister with the same affectionate agitation which he had shown in meeting his father; and he expressed with warm, quick feeling his delight in being at home. There had not been so lively a dinner hour at Aston Court since he had left it. Miss Waldron herself became almost gay, and laughed short little spurts of laughter, like the first efforts of a fountain to play, after its pipes have long been closed up. Nor did she in her self-righteous pharisaism feel one pang of sorrow for that poor woman whom her profligate brother had led to her ruin.

Mr. Waldron found his taste and enjoyment of humor and repartee returning, and forgot that his son was a sinner, until Miss Waldron left them alone in the dining-room. They drew up their chairs before a comfortable fire; and then there came one of those pauses full of satisfaction, when the heart is gathering to itself all the pleasures, rare and fleeting, of the first moments of reunion. Robert's face was shining with unclouded happiness, when his father broke the pleasant silence.

"Robert," he said, sharply; and the son looked up to see his smile vanished, and his face overcast.

"Yes, father," he answered, in some amazement.

"Robert," repeated Mr. Waldron, "I was not prepared to see you so light-hearted. This is not what your letters led me to expect. I have a hard question or two to ask you, my boy, and it is as well to ask them first as last."

The air of gay and tender sentiment fled from Robert's face, which he turned partially aside from his father's keen scrutiny.

"First of all," he said, "you must tell me ruly, Robert, what has become of that poor irl?"

"Father, I don't know," answered Robert, n a tone of irritation; "I can only repeat what have said already. She left me at Falaise, five nonths after we went away, and I have never eard a word from her or of her since. I have one everything a man could do for my own eace of mind; but I could never find the lightest trace of her. It was not that I wanted o see her again—we had been too miserable to- ether for that—but I wished to make a pro- ision for her. I would have given a good deal, ither of time or money, to make sure she was ot in want."

"Robert," remarked Mr. Waldron, after a ause, "I thought you were a repentant man."

"So I am," cried Robert, hotly; "there are imes when I could cut off my right hand, if hat would undo what I did. But I cannot feel ike that always; it would have been unnatural o feel like that to-day, when I see you and my ister again. Perhaps to-morrow I shall have ne of my fits, and then you will see if I am not epentant. Why will you not let me enjoy my- elf while I can?"

"But I do not understand fits," said Mr. Waldron, who had pursued an even tenor of un- motional life, both public, social, and re- igious; "a man is a penitent until he obtains ardon. Then he becomes a religious man and member of the Church, and steadily fulfils his luty toward God and man. There is no need f fits. Are you seeking pardon?"

"Not just at this moment," he answered; ut his light tone changed to one of respect, as e caught sight of Mr. Waldron's anxious face. 'Dear father," he added, "I never was any- hing but a graceless fellow, not worthy of your nxiety. But if you mean, have I ever prayed o God to forgive my sin toward Rose, and to ave her from further evil—why, there have been whole days when that prayer alone has gone up rom my heart to Him."

His voice faltered, and his changeful eyes vere filled for a moment with tears.

"I wish to heaven," he cried, as he recovered rom the transient sadness, "I could do some remendous penance, and have done with it. But what will satisfy you—you and God? I ave been away nine of the best years of my ife, and I have done all I could to atone for my ault; and I am ready to do everything you can uggest. Why cannot we let by-gones be by- ones?"

ABSTINENCE FOR THE SAKE OF OTHERS.

S. S. Lesson for April 27, 1 Cor. 8. Golden Text, Phil. 2 : 4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Abstinence from Intoxicants and Narcotics—More than a Personal Question—Pernicious English Influence in India and China—Knowledge that Puffs up—Love that Builds—The Evil of Paul's Time—Paul's Argument—A Plea for the Weak—Responsibility for the Fall of Others—Clean Hands Needed for God's Work—The Might in Intercession—Paul's Spirit of Self-Renunciation.

"LOOK not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." Charity . . . "seeketh not her own" (1 Cor. 13 : 5). Christ pleased not Himself (Rom. 15 : 3). It was Paul's reproach to the generality of Christians "all seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's" (Phil. 2 : 21). The question of abstinence from

might be included—is no longer a personal question. In our own land, more than any other, souls and bodies by the thousand are falling victims to the drink; in China, through English instrumentality, souls and bodies by the million are being ruined by opium. The evils of drink are greatly increasing on the Continent of Europe, and the brutalizing influence of this baneful self-indulgence and that of smoking tell terribly upon the morals and religion of professedly Christian countries. Lunatic asylums, prisons, and graves fill rapidly in consequence of these things. In India who never used intoxicants until English influence was brought to bear upon them, are now, in common with other castes, encouraged to drink by the government license system, and untold evil is being done by it. What then is the true position of Christians with regard to these things? Are we to go with the multitude to do evil? God forbid! Setting aside the question whether or not these things are good for us individually, from either the moral, physical, or spiritual point of view, let us consider whether the use of them on our part helps to drag our brethren out of the mire or encourages them to wallow in it.

In our chapter Paul contrasts love with knowledge, knowledge puffeth up, but love buildeth up [Greek], buildeth up, not ourselves only, but other people. "And if any man thinketh that he knoweth anything, he knoweth nothing yet as he ought to know." How often we have heard moderate drinkers declare how much they knew of the evils of drunkenness, but that for themselves they were ordered stimulants by doctors, and they should think it very wrong to abstain; they knew how to take it in moderation. Puffed up by their own knowledge of how much drink they might take with impunity, they condemn the weakness of the poor hapless drunkard. And some poor tempted servant with no such knowledge has thought, "If my master, who is such a respected Christian man, thinks it right to use stimulants, how much more should I, who make no such profession!" And the poor servant, having no such power of self-control, becomes a poor drunkard, robs his master's cellar, leaves without a character, and ends either in a prison or a poorhouse! The knowledge which puffed up went no way toward saving the poor tempted one.

How many families we have known in which one half, in some cases the whole family, has fallen through drink! If we visit the prisons, the lunatic asylums, the courts and alleys of our large towns, and search out the cause of thousands who are mad, thousands who are paupers, thousands who are out of work, thousands who are outcasts upon our streets, the reason will be found, in nine cases out of ten, in the habitual use of intoxicants and narcotics. And none of these victims began by excess! Puffed up by the knowledge, as they thought, of their own strength, they fell, and there was none to help them. But

LOVE BUILDETH UP.

That which no other power in all the universe has accomplished, love has done. Jesus has made a way by which the poor lost drunkard, and harlot, and opium slave may be redeemed from their sin and its misery, even from the very taste and desire of that which has enslaved them, as well as from its physical consequences His love "buildeth up" a temple of the Holy Ghost out of the veriest ruin which rum, uncleanness, or opium have made. For us, His followers, His representatives, the members of His body, what is becoming? Paul, in writing to the Corinthians, deals with the question of meat offered to idols. In the prevalent polytheism current among the Greeks of his day, a large proportion of the food which appeared on the table was that which had been offered in sacrifice to idols. He demonstrated clearly that an idol was nothing, that meat offered to idols could in itself neither do good nor harm; a man knowing this could eat it with impunity. But how about those who had not such knowledge, and whose weak conscience might be defiled? The apostle says, "Take heed lest by any means this liberty of yours become

A STUMBLINGBLOCK TO THEM THAT ARE WEAK.

For if any man see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple, shall not the conscience of him which is weak be emboldened to eat those things which are sacrificed to idols; And through thy knowledge shall the weak brother perish, for whom Christ died?" The same reasoning may apply to anything in which we may "put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in our brother's way" (Rom. 14 : 13). If by our example some young man, or some weak, nervous woman, some workman or needlewoman is tempted to make use of stimulants, and then succumbs to their increasing power and becomes a drunkard, dare we say that we are guiltless, dare we say we are innocent of the perdition of our weak brother or sister for whom Christ died? As living sacrifices, as living, not unto ourselves but unto Him which died for us and rose again (II Cor. 5 : 15), it no longer belongs to us to regulate what we shall eat or what we drink. We are not our own, but bought with a price, and He has commanded by His apostle, "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God" (1 Cor. 10 : 30). We can understand believers who have received pardon for their past sins but who have never yet yielded themselves in living sacrifice to God, still continuing the use of intoxicants by force of habit. But where the Holy Ghost has driven a man to make and all he has, and to yield it up entirely to God, believing that He takes possession, we cannot see it possible for such an one to continue the use of intoxicants in a land like ours. "Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died. . . . For meat destroy not the work of God. . . . It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak." So speaks the Holy Ghost by Paul.

The heart of Jesus is ever to seek and to save the lost, to go out after the lost sheep until He find it. We cannot do this until our own hands are clean, not only from that which is absolutely sinful, but that which may hinder another. Gehazi had no power to awaken the Shunamite's child (II Kings 4 : 31; 5 : 20–27) while the love of money still reigned in his own heart. The disciples had no power to cast out the unclean spirit from the child while the thought of which among them should be the greatest was occupying them (Mark 9 : 18–33). The Shunamite felt that the power of God was not in Gehazi; the father of the child testified to Jesus about His disciples, "They could not cast him out." No power but the power of the living God will ever fully overcome the power of Satan through the drink. Human efforts are poor things at best, but there is a which will do more than years of effort, as has been fully proved by the whiskey war in America. But how can we pray in faith about this matter, unless in our own lives we are entirely clear? Thank God, in answer to the prayers of many, great progress has been made in a few years as regard public opinion in this matter, and especially the opinion of the Christian public. We are thankful to find that in England at least, as has long been the case in America, the majority of truly spiritual ministers of all denominations are on the side of total abstinence. But we need more of the out-and-out spirit of Paul, who, looking beyond man altogether, sees Christ wounded in the house of His friends, and says, "When ye sin so against the brethren and wound their weak conscience, ye sin against Christ." Whenever a weak conscience has been wronged by the act of a Christian, Christ Himself has been wounded by His own disciple. Paul contemplating such a possibility, says, "Wherefore if meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no meat while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend." Paul could trust God for his strength, his health, and all which might be affected by his renunciation of any meat which was offered to idols; he was ready to give up even that which was wholesome and nourishing. Shall we scruple to give up that which is doing such deadly work around us? Let us with Paul be ready to renounce everything which may stand in the way of others, let it cost us what it may.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Another Difficulty in Egypt Arose Last Week in the resignation of Nubar Pacha, the Khedive's Prime Minister, who was unable to work in conjunction with Mr. Clifford Lloyd, the English representative. Nubar Pacha, who is really the most capable of Egyptian officials, has now been induced to withdraw his resignation. Mr. G. W. Smalley, cabling to his journal, says that Nubar, though friendly to England, personifies Egyptian hostility to the reforms which England is pledged to execute. Mr. Clifford Lloyd has been resolutely attacking abuses regardless of etiquette or routine. To accept Nubar's resignation would have brought the English Ministry face to face with the situation it has so long struggled to evade. To accept Mr. Lloyd's would mean the abandonment of all reforms. The Cabinet characteristically contrived to avoid either alternative. Sir Evelyn Baring, under pressure from the Home Government, has succeeded in coaxing Nubar to retain office by the promise of ostensible deference to Egyptian susceptibilities, assuring Mr. Lloyd in the mean time that the real power as before will remain with him.

General Gordon's Situation at Khartoum causes serious apprehension. The English Government has sent him imperative orders to retire from the city as speedily as possible. He succeeded on April 1st in sending a despatch to the British Minister in Egypt, which states that a mutiny had broken out against him in the city, and that on March 25th he disarmed 250 Bashi Bazouks who were the chief offenders. The following day he shelled the rebel camp on the Blue Nile, killing forty of the enemy. March 27th the rebels fired upon Khartoum from the village opposite. But this they were soon forced to evacuate, losing fifty-nine men in the engagement, and the Bashi Bazouks occupied the village and held it until March 30th. On that day the rebels returned in force and drove them out, but then retired themselves. The White Nile district is quiet. The Khartoum market is well supplied. The Mahdi has sent the rebels six guns. General Gordon estimates that the rebels about Khartoum number fully 2000.

A Dynamite Agent was Captured in England on April 11th with bombs on his person. Some months ago a warning was sent to the British Government that a dynamiter was on his way to England. A watch was set, and it was discovered that a man named Daly, alias Denman, who answered the description of the dynamiter, had arrived at Birmingham and taken lodgings in a suburb with a clerk named James Egan, who is the ex-secretary of the local branch of the Land League. There Daly remained until Wednesday, April 9th, when he went to Birkenhead, closely followed by a detective and two Irish constables. On Friday, as he was re-booking at the railway station for Birmingham, he was arrested by the officers who had been following him. Three explosive bombs were found in his pockets exactly like those used in destroying the railroad depot in London recently. He also carried several bottles containing a substance believed to be nitroglycerine. Egan was arrested at Birmingham on the charge of being an accomplice of Daly and of having explosives in his house for an unlawful purpose. He maintained the utmost coolness, and had nothing to say. A sackful of documents were found in his possession which, it is stated, implicate the Land League in the dynamite plots.

The Bill Extending the Franchise in Great Britain passed its second reading in the House of Commons on April 7th. That stage is usually the severest battle-ground of a measure. The subsequent course is to debate each clause of the bill in committee. The second reading was passed by a vote of 390 to 210, which shows that on home questions the Gladstone ministry still maintains its strength in the House. Mr. Gladstone was sufficiently recovered to take part in the debate, and in the course of his speech he said it was a good thing for the State that the largest number of capable citizens should possess the franchise. He defended the extension of the franchise in Ireland as an act of right and justice. A large number of intelligent mechanics and small tradesmen will be allowed to vote if the act passes, but the agricultural laborers who will also be admitted by it to the franchise are, for the most part, uneducated men.

The Outrages on the American Missionaries in Armenia were the subject of an interrogation addressed to the British Cabinet on April 7th in the House of Commons. The representative of the State Department in the House said the department had not received precise information regarding the American schools, but it was aware that American missionaries had been attacked near Bitlis and had been prevented from opening a school at Injeh-Soo, and had also learned that the schools at Van had been closed. The American Government, he said, had thanked the British Charge d'Affaires for the aid he had rendered General Wallace, United States Minister at Constantinople, in the matter. He also stated that Lord Dufferin, British Ambassador to Turkey, has impressed upon the Turkish Government the necessity of ameliorating the condition of affairs in Kurdistan and East Anatolia.

The French Military Operations in Madagascar are to be resumed. The French Prime Minister informed the Chambers on April 9th that the negotiations with Queen Ranavalona's government had been broken off, owing to the ill-will of the Malagassies. General Miot, who started for Madagascar that day, goes under orders to occupy several more points on the north-west coast, the object being to affirm the treaty rights of France. This policy necessitates a re-enforcement of the troops at present in Madagascar.

A Colleague for Mr. H. M. Stanley is Being sent to the Congo by the King of the Belgians. He is an Italian named Lieutenant Massari. It is stated that he does not go to supersede Stanley, but to aid him in founding new stations in the interior. In the course of an interview with a reporter, Lieutenant Massari said that the expedition could not become a Belgian enterprise, the king having given positive assurances that it should continue neutral, all nationalities to have unlimited facilities for commerce.

The Death of Charles Reade, the Famous novelist, is announced. He expired in London on April 11th, at the age of seventy. Mr. Reade was an author whose works were read more extensively in this country than those of any novelist beside Dickens. They differ from the ordinary romance in the fact that Mr. Reade was anxious in writing them to influence public opinion against social and political abuses. In one case—that of the novel entitled "Hard Cash"—Mr. Reade succeeded in promoting legislation to protect sane people whose relatives from interested motives attempted to imprison them in lunatic asylums. Mr. Reade was a man of generous dsposition, giving freely to any case of real need brought under his notice, but he is said to have been somewhat implacable and pugnacious in temperament.

The Prince of Wales has been Visiting the abodes of the London poor. The excursion was made with the object of qualifying him for his labors on the commission of inquiry into the condition of the dwellings in the worst quarters of London. The Prince, describing his visit afterward, said the condition of the people, or rather of their dwellings, was "perfectly disgraceful." His Royal Highness was apparently profoundly impressed with the misery and poverty he witnessed. If he has a reflective mind he could not fail to have remarked the startling contrast between the miserable abodes of the people who pay the taxes and the luxuriant palaces in which the royal personages live who are paid out of the taxes. His own share is more than five hundred thousand dollars a year. It may be hoped that the impressions of his visit will not be obliterated by the dissipations and excitements of fashionable life. If he take up the cause of the poor with the zest with which he enters into less worthy pursuits, the commissioners may be so stimulated by his example that the poor may no longer be obliged to live in a condition which the Prince rightfully characterized as "perfectly disgraceful."

A Prominent Jewish Banker in Russia has been exiled to Siberia. The New York Herald states that M. Natanson, the banker in question, has established and mainly supports several free schools in Warsaw. Recently the order was issued by M. Apuchtyn, the Government Curator of Schools, that all studies should be given out in the Russian language. M. Natanson being informed of this, immediately called on M. Apuchtyn, begging him not to lay this burden on the school, and saying that even if the Russian language were made compulsory he thought the Polish should not be suppressed, as it was the daily language of the people. He also asked that the decrees should be given in writing. M. Apuchtyn replied that in a few days he might receive the written resolutions. But in two days after this interview a kibitka stopped before Natanson's door, taking him for a start toward Siberia, tearing the peaceful gentleman from his family, his banking interests, and numerous young students who were being educated at his expense and now find themselves without a guardian. In a country where such outrages are committed by the government, and where the people are not protected by law, it is not surprising that irreligious people become Nihilists.

The Last Words of the Baroness Rothschild, who died in London recently, were: "Remember the poor." This lady, who was the widow of the late Baron Lionel Rothschild, the eminent Jewish financier, was the centre of a large and fashionable circle of the aristocracy. The Earl of Beaconsfield was a frequent visitor at her house, and crowds of celebrities British and foreign, peers, diplomats, legislators and men of letters might be met under her roof. Nevertheless her energies, time, and money were consecrated to the welfare of the poor. Free schools, free kitchens, free hospitals, all came within her range, and to all she gave largely. She had great energy of character, and it was all at the service of others. Her last thoughts were of the friendless and destitute.

A Grand Confederation of Temperance Societies is projected in England with the object of securing united action in legislative and other directions. The London Christian says: "Could this be done, such is the hold temperance principles have taken upon society, that nothing could withstand their influence. The British Temperance League, the United Kingdom Alliance, Good Templars, Sons of Temperance, and several other societies were represented at a conference held to promote the union, and a committee formed to consider the basis of further action in the matter. Divided, the forces ranged on the side of total abstinence are comparatively weak; united, they will carry their triumphs into the very heart of the enemy's citadel."

"The Treasury of David," by C. H. Spurgeon. A few copies of two volumes, handsomely bound in cloth, of the above valuable work are on sale at The Christian Herald office, at $2.50 per volume. They are Vol. III and Vol. IV. Vol. III. contains comments on Psalms 53 to 78; Vol. IV. on Psalms 79 to 103. They contain an original exposition of that portion of the Book of Psalms, a collection of illustrative extracts from the whole range of literature, a series of homiletical hints upon almost every verse, and lists of writers upon each Psalm. Also by the same author, "John Ploughman's Talk, or Plain Advice to Plain People," in stiff paper cover, price 25 cents. Postage paid.

It is not often that the dispensers of patronage make so wise an appointment or show sagacity so profound and statesmanlike as was shown in sending across the Atlantic as Governor-General of Canada the distinguished statesman whose portrait, with that of his wife, adorns this week the first page of The Christian Herald. The name of the Earl of Dufferin will long be an honored one throughout the Dominion. During the six years in which he represented his sovereign in her American colony his impartiality and equity were attested by the singular unanimity of the applause he won and of the regrets with which his departure was crowned. There are no dissentient voices when his praises are repeated.

The consenting and spontaneous movement of all the municipalities of a vast province, "as large, as important, as flourishing," to quote Lord Dufferin's own words, "as many a European kingdom," which was aroused to do honor to a ruler who had parted with the substance of power, who had no patronage to bestow, nor even any social favors to distribute, cannot be explained away. Lord Dufferin beyond all question displayed in a high degree the qualities which are needed in a Constitutional ruler, and without any adventitious aid from birth or tradition conquered popularity, and, what is more, the affection of a great community.

When we remember that in 1872 at the time his appointment was announced the name of Lord Dufferin was known only to a few Canadians, that he did not attempt to win favor by profuse expenditure, that the community he came to rule was intensely democratic, divided by bitter party feuds, and at the time discontented with the policy of the mother country, we cannot refrain from acknowledging that the tact and geniality of the Governor-General worked wonders. His administration of Canadian affairs was the triumph of his career, and though in the diplomatic sphere he has since added to his laurels, yet the six years he spent on this side the Atlantic form the epoch of his life by which he is best known and which render his name so popular in the New World.

Frederick Temple, Earl of Dufferin, is, as he is proud to declare, an Irishman. Though not born in that country, his family is Irish, his early life was passed in Ireland, and all his family associations are with Ireland. It happened that he was born in Florence, Italy, but whenever he has had occasion to speak of himself he has been careful to let it be known that he is an Irishman. He is now fifty-eight years of age, having been born in 1826. He was educated at Eton and Christ Church, Oxford. In 1849 he was appointed one of the Lords-in-Waiting on the Queen, but the young man had too much brain and too much force of character to rest content in a position, the duties of which could be performed by any high-born youngster who had the soul of a lackey, and he therefore resigned the post after a very brief experience. He was drawn toward a diplomatic career, and in 1856 was specially attached to the mission to Vienna, undertaken by Lord John Russell.

One of the striking personal characteristics of this versatile nobleman, Lord Dufferin, is his

and as a literary man and orator, he has proved himself a worthy descendant of Richard Brinsley Sheridan, who was one of his maternal ancestors. In 1859 Lord Dufferin made a cruise to the Northern Seas in his schooner yacht, the Foam, and his "Letters from High Latitudes," under which title he published an account of his journey, display the wit and humor characteristic of the man and his race, which afterward rendered his speeches so popular. The illustrations on our front page are of incidents narrated in that book.

LAPP AND ICELANDIC LADIES.

Between the portraits of Earl and Countess Dufferin are sketches of Lapp and Icelandic ladies, among whom the Earl spent some time when visiting their country. He says: "It was in the streets of Hammerfest that I first set eyes on a Laplander. Turning round the corner of one of the ill-built houses, we suddenly ran over a diminutive little personage in a white woollen tunic, bordered with red and yellow stripes, green trousers, fastened round the ankles, and reindeer boots, curving up at the toes like Turkish slippers. On her head—for notwithstanding the trousers she turned out to be a lady—was perched a gay parti-colored cap, fitting close round the face, and running up at the back into an overarching peak of red cloth. Within this peak was crammed—as I afterward learned—a piece of hollow wood, weighing about a quarter of a pound, into which is fitted

THE WEARER'S LOCK OF HAIR.

"Hardly had we taken off our hats, and bowed a thousand apologies for our unintentional rudeness to the fair inhabitant of the green trousers, before a couple of Lapp gentlemen hove in sight. They were dressed pretty much like the lady, except that an ordinary red nightcap replaced the queer helmet worn by their companion; and the knife and sporran fastened to their belts, instead of being suspended in front as hers were, hung down against their hips. Their tunics, too, may have been a trifle shorter. None of the three were beautiful."

ENTERTAINS PRINCE NAPOLEON.

While Lord Dufferin was in Iceland he met Prince Jerome Napoleon (Plon Plon) at the celebrated boiling springs called the Geysers. Lord Dufferin thus describes the entertainment: "Having heard of the anticipated arrival of the Prince and his suite, my first care was to order coffee for the tired Frenchmen; and then, feeling that long residence having given us a kind of proprietorship in the Geysers, we were bound to do the honors of the place to the approaching travellers, I summoned the cook, and gave orders that he should make a holocaust of all the game we had, and get under way a plum pudding whose dimensions should do himself and England credit."

At length the party arrived, "as merry a group of Frenchmen as it might ever be one's fortune to fall in with. My old friend Count Trampe presented me to the Prince, and encouraged by the gracious reception which His Imperial Highness accorded me, I ventured to inform him that 'there was a poor banquet toward,' of which I trusted he, and as many of his officers as the table could hold, would condescend to partake. A few minutes afterward I received him as a guest within my tent.

"Although I never had the pleasure of seeing Prince Napoleon before, I should have known him among a thousand, from his remarkable likeness to his uncle, the first Emperor. The same delicate, sharply-cut features, thin, refined mouth, and firm, determined jaw. The Prince's frame, however, is built altogether on a larger scale, and his eyes, instead of being of a cold, piercing blue, are soft and brown, with quite a different expression. The dinner went off very well, as every dinner must do where such agreeable companions are the convives." The meeting with the Prince is shown on our front page.

THE INTENSE COLD OF SPITZBERGEN.

In August, 1856, Lord Dufferin's yacht Foam skirted the inhospitable coasts of Spitzbergen. Of this bleak and inhospitable land Lord Dufferin says: "No description can give an adequate idea of the intense rigor of the six months' winter in this part of the world. Stones crack with the noise of thunder; in a crowded hut the breath of its occupants will fall in flakes of snow; the snow burns like caustic; if iron touches the flesh it brings the skin away with it. Even in the height of summer the moisture inherent in the atmosphere is often frozen into innumerable particles, so minute as to assume the appearance of an impalpable mist." While here the party killed and Lord Dufferin thus relates the story:

A LARGE POLAR BEAR,

"As Mr. Wyse was pacing the deck, his attention was suddenly attracted by a white speck in the water, swimming across from Prince Charles's Foreland—the long island which lies over against English Bay. When first observed, the creature, whatever it might be, was about a mile and a half off—the width of the channel between the island and the main being about five miles. Some said it was a bird, others a whale, and the cook suggested a mermaid. When the fact was ascertained that it was a bona fide bear, a gun was fired as a signal for us who were ashore to return; but it was evident that unless at once intercepted, Bruin would get to land. Mr. Wyse, therefore, very properly determined to make sure of him. This was a matter of no difficulty; the poor beast showed very little fight. His first impulse was to swim away from the boat; and even after he had been wounded, he only turned round once or twice upon his pursuers. The death wound was speedily given, and the honor must be divided between the steward Grant and the mate Mr. Wyse." (See frontispiece picture.)

COMMISSIONER TO SYRIA.

In 1860 Lord Dufferin's diplomatic talents were again called into requisition. A Mohammedan massacre of Christians took place at Damascus, and the French and English Governments intervened to stop the atrocities. The first business was to ascertain the exact facts and then to place them before the Sultan with such a protest as would secure the Christians for the future his powerful protection. Lord Palmerston was then in office, and valued so highly the talents of Lord Dufferin that he appointed him a commissioner to Syria, and in this capacity he acted with great firmness and Christian consideration. For his services on that occasion he was nominated on his return a K.C.B. (Knight-Commander of the Order of the Bath).

Four years later Lord Dufferin was made a member of the Liberal administration. Lord Palmerston was Premier, and as the Secretary for India was a member of the House of Commons, some member of the House of Lords was needed to represent the department in that chamber, to answer questions and to explain its policy. The position was offered to Lord Dufferin, and accepted.

It was in 1872 that he received the high honor of being appointed

GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF CANADA.

It was at a very critical time that Lord Dufferin arrived in Canada. The people were at heart loyal to the British Government, and their attachment to the throne was, and still is, more enthusiastic than that of Englishmen in England. But their feelings had been deeply wounded. The Liberal party in England, which was the dominant one at the time, had failed to cultivate friendly relations with the Dominion. In fact, one or two of the leaders of that party had displayed a want of sagacity as well as of tact in speaking publicly in disparaging terms of the value of Canada as a part of the British Empire. They had done nothing to induce the Canadians to organize for self-defence. Had they appealed to the loyalty of the people there would have been an enthusiastic response which would have astonished them, but no such appeal was made. Mr. Gladstone plainly intimated that if Great Britain, in order to retain Canada, must support an army to defend it, he would prefer to abandon it. Only on condition that the Dominion cost Great Britain nothing to protect did he believe the tie connecting it with the mother country should be maintained.

As is usual in all cases of dispute, there was much misunderstanding. The Canadians in their just resentment exaggerated the importance and suspected the spirit of Mr. Gladstone's utterances, while the Gladstone Cabinet utterly misunderstood the temper and disposition of the people of Canada. If at that time some obstinate, priggish, domineering nobleman had been sent to Canada, the breach would have been widened and possibly there would have been a permanent rupture between the two countries. As it was, Lord Dufferin was sent, and his delicacy, geniality, and matchless tact healed the wounded susceptibilities of the Canadians on one side, while he enlightened the British Cabinet on the other. His one desire was to serve the Dominion, and he shrank from no toil nor trouble which promised to achieve that purpose.

A colonial governor who is eager to obtain substantial power and the immediate pleasure of popularity is greatly tempted to take a part in the politics of the country he is selected to rule. This is in contravention of the policy of the mother country, but the temptation is not always resisted. It is not so easy to conquer the confidence of the whole people by holding the balance even between contending parties, by practising conciliatory and moderating arts, and by training the colonists to look up to the Imperial Government not as a meddlesome and censorious power, but as kindly, tolerant, just, and wise. As Lord Dufferin said in a public speech at the close of his term of office, he had

and his faith never wavered. It would be impossible here to give even a summary of the events of Lord Dufferin's administration, nor could we describe even the more prominent, such as the Pacific Railroad scandal, in the space at our disposal, with that fulness of detail which could alone place them fairly before the reader. Some idea of the success of his government may, however, be gained from that of the Province of Ontario, presented to him on his departure from Canada. It is part of the joint address presented on September 5th, 1878, to the Governor-General at the citadel, Ontario, by seventy-four municipalities. The address was beautifully illuminated by a Guelph artist. The title-page is, indeed, an exquisite specimen of artistic skill. At the top is a representation of the Parliament buildings, and the dates 1872–1878—being the years marking the period of his Excellency's administration in Canada. Below this again are the royal and Canadian arms blended, with the Irish shield and Scottish lion on either side. The beaver occupies a place at the bottom of the page, while the two lower corners are formed by illuminated representations of Niagara Falls, and of a steamer "shooting the rapids." The following is an extract from the address:

"Permit us to assure you that our mission is a sad but also a pleasing one—sad, inasmuch as we are mindful that the ties which have linked you in affectionate union with us for the past six years are about to be severed; and pleasing, in that we have the opportunity, before you leave, of placing in your hands the evidence that those whom we represent are not forgetful of their duty as loyal people toward the Viceroy whose rule has been signalized by so many examples of remarkable tact and executive ability. It is not our intention to indulge in expressions of fulsome adulation or address you in terms capable of being construed as meaningless flattery. Such, we are aware, would be but a doubtful compliment to your superior taste. We desire rather, in the simple but eloquent language of the heart, to tender your Excellency, on behalf of the people of Ontario, their unqualified approval of your career as Governor-General of Canada, accompanied with the warmest personal regard for your Excellency and the illustrious Countess of Dufferin.

"While admiring the ease, firmness, and efficiency displayed in the discharge of your important State duties, we have not failed also to appreciate the lively interest you have taken in whatever was calculated to promote the prosperity of the several provinces, or aid in the material and intellectual improvement of the people. It has been your study to become thoroughly acquainted with the character, the resources, and requirements of all classes, and the kindness of heart which you have manifested in visiting the habitations of the poor, even in the most remote territories, will not prove the least of the many triumphs which you have achieved in Canada.

"Our scientific and educational institutions, encouraged by your generous bounty, have acquired fresh vigor from the impetus which a liberal appreciation of their merit is always sure to impart, and we cannot but advert to the fact that innocent amusement, so essential for the preservation of 'a sound mind in a sound body,' has received your Excellency's indorsation.

"Under your wise supervision Canada has made rapid advancement, and we feel convinced that many real blessings will be the outgrowth of your zeal, eloquence, and administrative talent."

Lord Dufferin now occupies the difficult and responsible post of MINISTER TO TURKEY.

The deplorable condition of that government, and the difficulty of keeping the Sultan to the performance of his engagements renders the office anything but a sinecure. It is no mean tribute to Lord Dufferin's diplomatic abilities that during the present Egyptian complication he has been able to prevent the Sultan making an anti-English demonstration in Egypt.

In another way, too, the British Government proved their high estimation of his prudence and statesmanship. They confided to his hands the task of reorganizing the Egyptian Government. Lord Dufferin was summoned from Constantinople to Alexandria, and there held numerous conferences with the Khedive and his officials, the result of which was the system of government now in operation. That it should work smoothly at first was scarcely to be expected in the disorganized condition of the country.

Lord Dufferin has the reputation of being a considerate employer and a devoted friend. His life is fashioned according to the precepts of the Word of God, and his desire for the success of philanthropic enterprises, and especially for the spread of the Gospel of Christ among the nations of the earth, is practical and profound. In his present position he has opportunities of promoting the cause of missions and in many ways using the influences he undoubtedly possesses over the Sultan for good, and especially for the removal of the obstacles existing to the spread of Christianity in the Turkish dominions. It may be hoped that God will show him his duty in these matters and enable him to perform it.

THE COUNTESS OF DUFFERIN.

Harriet Georgina, Countess of Dufferin, is the eldest daughter of the late Captain Archibald Rowan Hamilton, of Killyleagh Castle, County Down, Ireland. The present representative of the Hamilton family is Major Hamilton, D.L. The Countess of Dufferin has often been mistaken for the authoress of the popular ballads, "The Lament of the Irish Emigrant," "I'm Sitting on the Stile, Mary," and "Katty's Letter," but we believe these truly Irish productions were written by her distinguished mother-in-law, a lineal descendant of Sheridan. The Countess is the great-grandniece of Archibald Hamilton Rowan, who once occupied a large space in the public eye. He loved his country not wisely, but too well, for he was involved in became a leader among the United Irishmen, was prosecuted on an ex-officio information by the Attorney-General for Ireland for the publication of a libel alleged to be seditious, and imprisoned for two years, from the larger part of which punishment he escaped in an open boat to France, and having lived for some years in that country and also in America, returned to Ireland, having obtained from the king a complete and honorable pardon.

In the Countess of Dufferin personal charms and domestic excellence are combined with much grace and affability of manner, and among her achievements not the least is that of winning the heart of the chivalrous and gifted Dufferin, to whom she was married in 1862. She is two or three years younger than her husband.

HER FIRST MISSTEP.

Learned critics are in our day very anxious to convince the world that the Bible is an obsolete book. They teach that it belongs to the literature of an Eastern nation, that many of the histories it contains are Jewish myths and legends, and that its injunctions and commands were intended for the Jews only and have no application to this nineteenth century. The attentive reader of the daily newspaper, however, cannot fail to remark how different a world this would be if the book the critics call obsolete were more read and heeded. The daily record of sin and sorrow makes one's heart ache. To what small dimensions would that black record sink if the teachings of the Bible were carefully studied and if people took for the guide of their lives the book our scholars are so anxious to banish to the topmost shelves of our libraries. A case in point, which happily ended with less serious consequences than follow in thousands of similar instances, is reported among the proceedings of a New York police court, in the Herald of April 16th. The shame and humiliation which fell on a respectable family might have been avoided had the fallen one remembered the wise king's warning, "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise" (Prov. 20 : 1).

A lady—if appearance and costly garments indicate social position—attracted attention in First Avenue on Monday night by staggering along with a baby in her arms. When at last she fell to the sidewalk a woman rescued the infant and sent for Policeman Newman. The unconscious mother was locked up in the Fifth Street station house. The child, a beautifully dressed boy, jumped and crowed when placed on the sergeant's desk, and seemed equally happy when an agent of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children arrived to take care of him.

The mother, looking pale and sorrowful, was yesterday brought up in the Essex Market Police Court. Baby was also there, playing with a big policeman's whiskers. The prisoner, in a low voice, gave her name, age (she is but twenty-two years), and residence to the justice.

A well-dressed young man there whispered to Justice White: "She is my wife; it is her first misstep; it will never happen again, judge."

"You seem to be very respectable people," said the Court after the story had been told. "How did it happen this time?"

Hesitatingly, and with great embarrassment, the lady replied: "I hardly know how it happened. I never drank a drop before in my life. I went to pay a visit to a friend in Jersey City on Monday and she made me drink two glasses of wine. I came over the ferry all right, but when I got out of the cross-town car my head went around and—but thank God baby is safe."

Tears began to choke the fair prisoner's utterance. Her husband's arm slipped lightly around her, and he said:

"Can she go, judge?"

"Yes," answered the court. "She has been terribly punished. I feel very sorry for both of you."

Then the couple stepped down; baby was once more placed in its mother's arms, and was almost smothered by her tears and caresses.

EASY DIVORCE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 20, 1884.

That there are hundreds and thousands of infelicitous homes in America no one will doubt. If there were only one skeleton in the closet, that might be locked up and abandoned ; but in many a home there is a skeleton in the hallway and a skeleton in all the apartments.

"UNHAPPILY MARRIED"

are two words descriptive of many a homestead. It needs no orthodox minister to prove to a badly mated pair that there is a hell ; they are there now. Sometimes a grand and gracious woman will be thus incarcerated, and her life will be a crucifixion, as was the case with Mrs. Sigourney, the great poetess and the great soul. Sometimes a consecrated man will be united to a fury, as was John Wesley, or united to a vixen, as was John Milton. Sometimes, and generally, both parties are to blame, and Thomas Carlyle is an intolerable scold, and his wife smokes and swears, and Froude, the historian, is mean enough because of the shekels he gets for the manuscript* to pull aside the curtain from the lifelong squabble at Craigenputtock and Five, Cheyne Row.

Some say that for

of all these domestic disorders of which we hear, easy divorce is a good prescription. God sometimes authorizes divorce as certainly as He authorizes marriage. I have just as much regard for one lawfully divorced as I have for one lawfully married. But you know and I know that wholesale divorce is one of

OUR NATIONAL SCOURGES.

I am not surprised at this when I think of the influences which have been abroad militating against the marriage relation.

For many years the platforms of the country rang with talk about a free-love millennium. There were meetings of this kind held in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Cooper Institute, New York, Tremont Temple, Boston, and all over the land. Some of the women who were most prominent in that movement have since been distinguished for great promiscuosity of affection. Popular themes for such occasions were the tyranny of man, the oppression of the marriage relation, women's rights, and the affinities. Prominent speakers were women with short curls and short dress and very long tongue, everlastingly at war with God because they were created women ; while on the platform sat meek men with soft accent and cowed demeanor, apologetic for masculinity, and holding the parasols while the termagant orators went on preaching the gospel of free love.

That campaign of about twenty years set more devils into the marriage relation than will be exorcised in the next fifty. Men and women went home from such meetings so permanently confused as to who were their wives and husbands that they never got out of the perplexity, and the criminal and the civil courts tried to disentangle the Iliad of woes, and this one got alimony, and that one got a limited divorce, and this mother kept the children on condition that the father could sometimes come and look at them, and these went into poorhouses, and those went into an insane asylum, and those went into dissolute public life, and all went to destruction. The mightiest war ever made against the marriage institution was that free-love campaign, sometimes under one name and sometimes under another.

Another influence that has warred upon the marriage relation has been

POLYGAMY IN UTAH.

That is a stereotyped caricature of the marriage relation, and has poisoned the whole land. You might as well think that you can have an arm in a state of mortification and yet the whole body not be sickened, as to have those territories polygamized and yet the body of the nation not feel the putrefaction. Hear it, good men and women of America, that so long ago as 1862 a law was passed by Congress forbidding polygamy in the territories and in all the places where they had jurisdiction. Twenty-two years have passed along and five administrations. Armed with all the power of government, and having an army at their disposal, and yet the first brick has not been knocked from that fortress of libertinism.

Every new President in his inaugural has tickled that monster with the straw of condemnation, and every Congress has stultified itself in proposing some plan that would not work. Polygamy stands in Utah and in other of the territories to-day more entrenched, and more brazen, and more puissant, and more braggart, and more infernal, than at any time in its history. James Buchanan, a much-abused man of his day, did more for the extirpation of this villainy than all the subsequent administrations have dared to do. Mr. Buchanan sent out an army, and although it was halted in its work, still he accomplished more than the subsequent administrations, which have done nothing but talk, talk, talk.

I want the people of America to know that for twenty-two years we have had a positive law prohibiting polygamy in the territories. People are crying out for some new law, as though we had not an old law already with which that infamy could be swept into the perdition from which it smoked up. Polygamy in Utah has warred against the marriage relation throughout the land. It is impossible to have such an awful sewer of iniquity sending up its miasma, which is wafted by the winds north, south, east, and west, without the whole land being affected by it.

Another influence that has warred against the marriage relation in this country has been a

with its millions of sheets every week choked with stories of domestic wrongs, and infidelities, and massacres, and outrages, until it is a wonder to me that there are any decencies or any common-sense left on the subject of marriage. One half of the news-stands of Brooklyn and New York and all our cities reeking with the filth.

"Now," say some, "we admit all these evils, and the only way to clear them out or correct them is by easy divorce." Well, before we yield to that cry, let us find out

HOW EASY IT IS NOW.

I have looked over the laws of all the States, and I find that while in some States it is easier than in others, in every State it is easy. The State of Illinois through its legislature recites a long list of proper causes for divorce, and then closes up by giving to the courts the right to make a decree of divorce in any case where they deem it expedient. After that you are not surprised at the announcement that in one county of the State of Illinois, in one year, there were 833 divorces. If you want to know how easy it is you have only to look over the records of the States. In Massachusetts 600 divorces in one year; in Maine 478 in one year ; in Connecticut 401 divorces in one year ; in the city of San Francisco 333 divorces in 1880 ; in New England in one year 2113 divorces, and in twenty years in New England twenty thousand. Is that not easy enough ?

If the same ratio continue, the ratio of multiplied divorce and multiplied causes of divorce we are not far from the time when our courts will have to set apart whole days for application, and all you will have to prove against a man will be that he left his slippers in the middle of the floor, and all you will have to prove against a woman will be that her husband's overcoat was buttonless. Causes of divorce doubled in a few years, doubled in France, doubled in England, and doubled in the United States. To show how very easy it is I have to tell you that in Western Reserve, Ohio, the proportion of divorces to marriages celebrated is one to eleven ; in Rhode Island is one to thirteen ; in Vermont is one to fourteen. Is not that easy enough ?

I want you to notice that frequency of divorce always goes along with the dissoluteness of society. Rome for five hundred years had not one case of divorce. Those were her days of glory and virtue. Then the reign of vice began, and divorce became epidemic. If you want to know how rapidly the Empire went down, ask Gibbon. Do you know how the Reign of Terror was introduced in France ? By 20,000 cases of divorce in one year in Paris.

WHAT WE WANT

in this country and in all lands is that divorce be made more and more and more difficult. Then people before they enter that relation will be persuaded that there will probably be no escape from it except through the door of the sepulchre. Then they will pause on the verge of that relation until they are fully satisfied that it is best, and that it is right, and that it is happiest. Then we shall have no more marriage in fun. Then men and women will not enter the relation with the idea it is only a trial trip, and if they do not like it they can get out at the first landing. Then this whole question will be taken out of the frivolous into the tremendous, and there will be no more joking about the blossoms in a bride's hair than about the cypress on a coffin.

What we want is that the Congress of the United States at this present session move for the changing the national Constitution so that a law can be passed which shall be uniform all over the country, and what shall be right in one State shall be right in all the States, and what is wrong in one State will be wrong in all the States.

HOW IS IT NOW ?

If a party in the marriage relation gets dissatisfied it is only necessary to move to another State to achieve liberation from the domestic tie, and divorce is effected so easy that the first one party knows of it is by seeing it in the newspaper that Rev. Dr. Somebody on April 14th, 1884, introduced into a new marriage relation a member of the household who went on a pleasure excursion to Newport or a business excursion to Chicago. Married at the bride's house. No cards. There are States of the Union which practically put a premium upon the disintegration of the marriage relation while there are other States, like our own New York State, that has the pre-eminent idiocy of making marriage lawful at twelve and fourteen years of age.

The Congress of the United States needs to move at the present session for a change of the national Constitution, and then to appoint a committee—not made up of single gentlemen but of men of families, and their families in Washington—who shall prepare a good, honest, righteous, comprehensive, that will control everything from Sandy Hook to Golden Horn. That will put an end to brokerages in marriage. That will send divorce lawyers into a decent business. That will se

UNIFORM LAW

* Dr. Talmage, in common with many critics, here censures Mr. James Anthony Froude for making the disclosures. It is, however, due to that eminent historian to say that he gives a different explanation of his motives than that suggested by Dr. Talmage of a regard for "shekels." He states that as Mr. Carlyle had selected him as his biographer and given the materials for the work into his hands, he conceived that his duty as a conscientious man was to tell the whole truth. He did it also as a matter of policy as well as of principle. Had he kept back any part, it would have been told with less accuracy by others who knew some of the facts but not all of them.—Ed.] people agitated for many years on the question of how shall they get away from each other to planning how they can adjust themselves to the more or less unfavorable circumstances.

More difficult divorce will put an estoppal to a great extent upon marriage as a financial speculation. There are men who go into the relation just as they go into Wall Street to purchase shares. The female to be invited into the partnership of wedlock is utterly unattractive, and in disposition a suppressed Vesuvius. Everybody knows it, but this masculine candidate for matrimonial orders, through the commercial agency or through the county records, finds out how much estate is to be inherited, and he calculates it. He thinks out how long it will be before the old man will die, and whether he can stand the refractory temper until he does die, and then he enters the relation; for he says, "If I cannot stand it, then through the divorce law I'll back out." That process is going on all the time, and men enter the relation without any moral principle, without any affection, and it is as much a matter of stock speculation as anything that transpired yesterday in Union Pacific, Wabash and Delaware and Lackawanna.

Now, suppose a man understood, as he ought to understand, that if he goes into that relation there is no possibility of his getting out, or no probability, he would be more slow to put his neck in the yoke. He should say to himself, "Rather than a Caribbean whirlwind with a whole fleet of shipping in its arms, give me a zephyr off fields of sunshine and gardens of peace."

Rigorous divorce law will also hinder women from

of marrying men to reform them. If a young man by twenty-five years of age or thirty years of age have the habit of strong drink fixed on him, he is as certainly bound for a drunkard's grave as that a train starting out from Grand Central Depot at 8 o'clock to-morrow morning is bound for Albany. The train may not reach Albany, for it may be thrown from the track. The young man may not reach a drunkard's grave, for something may throw him off the iron track of evil habit; but the probability is that the train that starts to-morrow morning at 8 o'clock for Albany will get there and the probability is that the young man who has the habit of strong drink fixed on him before twenty-five or thirty years of age will arrive at a drunkard's grave. She knows he drinks, although he tries to hide it by chewing cloves. Everybody knows he drinks. Parents warn, neighbors and friends warn. She will marry him, she will reform him.

If she is unsuccessful in the experiment, why then the divorce law will emancipate her, because habitual drunkenness is a cause for divorce in Indiana, Kentucky, Florida, Connecticut, and nearly all the States. So the poor thing goes to the altar of sacrifice. If you will show me the poverty-struck streets in any city I will show you the homes of the women who married men to reform them. In one case out of ten thousand it may be a successful experiment. I never saw the successful experiment. But have a rigorous divorce law, and that woman will say, "If I am affianced to that man it is for life; and if now in the ardor of his young love, and I am the prize to be won, he will not give up his cups, when he has won the prize, surely he will not give up his cups." And so that woman will say to the man, "No, sir, you are already married to the club, and you are married to that evil habit, and so you are married twice, and you are a bigamist. Go!"

A rigorous divorce law will also do much to hinder hasty and

INCONSIDERATE MARRIAGES.

Under the impression that one can be easily released people enter the relation without inquiry and without reflection. Romance and impulse rule the day. Perhaps the only ground for the marriage compact is that she likes his looks and he admires the graceful way she passes around the ice cream at the picnic! It is all they know about each other. It is all the preparation for life. A man not able to pay his own board bill, with not a dollar in his possession, will stand at the altar and take the loving hand, and say, "With all my worldly goods I thee endow!" A woman that could not make a loaf of bread to save her life will swear to cherish and obey. A Christian will marry an atheist, and that always makes conjoined wretchedness; for if a man does not believe there is a God, he is neither to be trusted with a dollar nor with your lifelong happiness.

Having read much about love in a cottage people brought up in ease will go and starve in a hovel. Runaway matches and elopements, 999 out of 1000 of which mean death and hell, multiplying on all hands. You see them in every day's newspapers. Our ministers in this region have no defence such as they have in other cities where the banns must be previously published and an officer of the law must give a certificate that all is right; so clergymen are left defenceless, and unite those who ought never to be united. Perhaps they are too young or perhaps they are standing already in some domestic compact.

By the wreck of ten thousand homes, by the holocaust of ten thousand sacrificed men and women, by the hearthstone of the family which is the cornerstone of the State, and in the name of that God who hath set up the family institution and who hath made the breaking of the marital oath the most appalling of all perjuries, I implore the Congress of the United States to make some righteous, uniform law for all the States and from ocean to ocean, on this subject of marriage and divorce.

ADVICE TO LOVERS.

Let me say to the hundreds of young people in this house this morning, before you give your heart and hand in holy alliance, use all caution; inquire outside as to habits, explore the disposition, scrutinize the taste, question the ancestry, and find out the ambitions. Do not take the heroes and the heroines of cheap novels for a model. Do not put your lifetime happiness in the keeping of a man who has a reputation for being a little loose in morals or in the keeping of a woman who dresses fast. Remember that while good looks are a kindly gift of God wrinkles or accident may despoil them. Remember that Byron was no more celebrated for his beauty than for his depravity. Remember that Absalom's hair was not more splendid than his habits were despicable. Hear it, hear it! The only foundation for happy marriage that ever has been or ever will be, is good character.

ASK FATHER AND MOTHER'S COUNSEL

in this most important step of your life. They are good advisers. They are the best friends you ever had. They made more sacrifices for you than any one else ever did, and they will do more to-day for your happiness than any other people. Ask them, and, above all,

ASK GOD.

I used to smile at John Brown of Haddington because when he was about to offer his hand and heart in marriage to one who became his lifelong companion, he opened the conversation by saying, "Let us pray." But I have seen so many shipwrecks on the sea of matrimony, I have made up my mind that John Brown of Haddington was right. A union formed in prayer will be a happy union, though sickness pale the cheek, and poverty empty the bread tray, and death open the small graves, and all the path of life be strewn with thorns, from the marriage altar with its wedding march and orange blossoms clear on down to the last farewell at that gate where Isaac and Rebecca, Abraham and Sarah, Adam and Eve parted.

And let me say to you who are in this relation, if you make one man or woman happy you have not lived in vain. Christ says that what He is to the Church you ought to be to each other; and if sometimes through difference of opinion or difference of disposition you make up your mind that your marriage was a mistake, patiently bear and forbear, remembering that life at the longest is short and that for those who have been badly mated in this world, death will give quick and immediate bill of divorcement written in letters of green grass on quiet graves. And perhaps, my brother, my sister, perhaps you may appreciate each other better in heaven than you have appreciated each other on earth.

In the "Farm-ballads" our American poet puts into the lips of a repentant husband after a life of married perturbation these suggestive words:

"And when she dies I wish that she would be laid by me,
And lying together in silence, perhaps we will agree.
And if ever we meet in heaven, I would not think it queer
If we love each other better because we quarrelled here."

And let me say to those of you who are in happy married union, have no unexplained correspondence with former admirers; cultivate no suspicions; in a moment of bad temper do not rush out and tell the neighbors; do not let any of those gadabouts of society unload in your house their baggage of gab and tittle-tattle; do not stand on your rights; learn how to apologize; do not be so proud, or so stubborn, or so devilish that you will not make up. Remember that the worst domestic misfortunes and most scandalous divorce cases started from little infelicities. The whole piled-up train of ten rail cars telescoped and smashed at the foot of an embankment one hundred feet down came to that catastrophe by getting two or three inches off the track. Some of the greatest domestic misfortunes and the widest resounding divorce cases have started from little misunderstandings that were allowed to go on and go on until home, and respectability, and religion, and immortal soul went down in the crash, crash!

AVOID FIRST QUARRELS;

And, fellow-citizens as well as fellow-Christians, let us have a divine rage against anything that wars on the marriage state. Blessed institution! Instead of two arms to fight the battle of life, four. Instead of two eyes to scrutinize the path of life, four. Instead of two shoulders to lift the burden of life, four. Twice the energy, twice the courage, twice the holy ambition, twice the probability of worldly success, twice the prospects of heaven. Into that matrimonial bower God fetches two souls. Outside the bower room for all contentions, and all bickerings, and all controversies, but inside that bower there is room for only one guest—the angel of love. Let that angel stand at the floral doorway of this Edenic bower with drawn sword to hew down the worst foe of that bower—easy divorce. And for every Paradise lost may there be a Paradise regained. And after we quit our home here may we have a brighter home in heaven at the windows of which this moment are familiar faces watching for our arrival and wondering why so long we tarry.

A Noble Work in Jaffa is being Carried on by four ladies, who have established a hospital for natives, under the charge of Miss Mangan. It was begun in a small way in the town of Jaffa by Miss Mangan and Miss Newton, who received a few sick people at their house as out-patients, and spoke to them of Christ. The work grew rapidly, and a house was taken in a more healthy situation in the suburbs, that in-patients might be received; afterward an additional ward was built. Last year 150 patients passed through the hospital, there being eighteen beds, which are always full. Of out-patients there were, last year, 11,500 attendances, 5000 being new cases. In the house family prayer is offered daily in Arabic, all the in-patients who are able being present. In addition to this work, the ladies conduct sewing-classes for women, and visit their old patients in the villages round Jaffa. The fame of the hospital has spread far and wide, and people come to it not only from the neighborhood of Jaffa, but also from Nablus (Schechem), Gaza, and the borders of Egypt.

UNPRAISED HELPERS.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, DD., LL.D.

THERE are many people in the world who are doing much good, and who are both unnoticed by the world and unconscious to themselves. They often stand in close relation to very active, conspicuous and useful people with whom their humble souls contrast themselves, to their own increase of despondency.

For instance, here is a woman, without any genius, who has a brilliant husband, a man distinguished in the councils of the nation, or on the lecture-forum, or in the pulpit, or at the bar; or a man perpetually increasing the area of known truth by his investigations, and enlarging the field of human intelligence by his publications. The good woman compares herself to this brilliant husband, and says, "Alas! I am doing nothing. What a sensation his last book made; it has gone far and wide; in many a household it is read for comfort or instruction, but I have never written a line which can be of benefit to any human being, unless it may have been in some of my poor letters." And so she depreciates herself and grows sad.

In a church an humble layman may look up at the pulpit and see his pastor, as on a throne of power, when he is using the Word of God authoritatively, and is evidently swaying multitudes into paths of righteousness. The layman says to himself, "I can scarcely lead my family in prayer, so broken is my thought, and so lame in my language. I very seldom have the courage to say a word in our prayer-meetings. I seem to have no talent in the world but the talent for money making. I can work down in my counting-house, and turn over and over dollar on dollar, and get richer and richer; but what is that compared with being rich in the souls one has brought to God in Christ Jesus?" And so he becomes discouraged.

But let these good people look on the other side.

First take the case of the wife. Why is her husband so successful a man? Simply because he has not a particle of domestic care. His wife has raised his children so that not one of them has ever given him a pang. They are ensamples to the whole flock. He can say to his people, "Follow my children as they follow Christ." Everything is at peace at home. This could not have come to pass if the good wife had not assiduously employed her practical common-sense in looking after the domestic matters. Now let her remember that while she was cheapening groceries, patching little trousers, darning her husband's stockings, mending here, saving there, smoothing yonder, often when her own heart was tired and her hands weary, she was, in all these things, clearing the field for the exercise of her husband's great ability. He could not have had half the power he wields nor half the field he occupies but for that good wife's good management. Half the glory of the crown which the Lord will give at the close of this ministry will belong to that good woman. She has done her part as faithfully as the husband has done his, and the Lord is not unmindful to forget her labor of love.

In the other case, let the layman recollect that, as times are now in the present organization of society, churches cannot be maintained without money. Land must be bought, and materials procured for the erection of ecclesiastical edifices; repairs must be made; constant attendance is required; and there must be some one who can furnish the pecuniary supplies. The pastor wants some members of his congregation who have, rather financial ability, and whose engagements allow them to do something for the church. He must never have financial cares; he must never have to think how his own support is to come, how a church debt is to be paid, how money is to be raised for repairs. It is a vicious system which rolls any of this work upon the heart of the pastor. Every man that takes any portion off leaves the soul of his pastor more alert, his intellect more elastic, his heart more ardent for the special work of edifying the saints, and of calling sinners to repentance.

There is many a blessed pastor this day who has a good time preaching the Gospel, and who may not himself know to what plain man of plodding, practical intellect he owes arrangements which make the financial affairs of his church run so smoothly as to relieve him of all care. But when the crowns come to be distributed, then the Lord will remember the layman that had uncircumcised lips, like Moses, and not forget his labor of love in that he labored for the saints.

Let us not be betrayed into misjudgments or despondencies by the appearance of things; our main audience is behind the scenes. Where there is one seeing us on earth, there are multitudes looking at us out of eternity. Little fames on earth are small indeed, but the glory of eternity is enduring.

HEALING THROUGH FAITH

By the Rev. A. J. Gordon, D.D.

A VERY able article on this subject appears in the January number of the Presbyterian Review, by Rev. R. L. Stanton, D.D., of Washington. It is good to find such a thorough and radical defence of healing through the prayer of faith in so staid and conservative a magazine. We have seen nowhere so strong and convincing an argument for this side of the question. Dr. Stanton proceeds on the inductive method, beginning with facts, and tracing these to their cause, alleging that "facts are never heresies, either in science or religion;" a reasonable proposition, we say, and one which those critics should weigh who are inclined to fly in your face at the bare mention of some extraordinary case of healing through prayer. The facts adduced are startling enough, and they are not vague or anonymous cases, either. Names and places are given, and the most rigid investigation is courted. The facts, we are inclined to think, will constitute a wall through which the objector will not be able to break at a bound, rushing on to a wild, a rampant denial of all supernatural cures in the present day. The objections to admitting that God heals the sick immediately and supernaturally in our time are very stubborn, not to say arrogant, as the discussions cited by Dr. Stanton show. But facts are stubborn things, also; and we think that when stubborn fact meets stubborn prejudice, the latter should step aside and give the right of way to the former.

We reproduce one of the most striking of these facts. It is the experience of Mrs. Mahan, the wife of Dr. Mahan, formerly President of Oberlin College, who is well known as a writer and educator. The statement is certified by Mr. and Mrs. Mahan, and by the writer himself, who heard from the lips of the lady herself. The case was done when the patient had been given up to die by the physicians, and when she was considered to be near her end.

Mrs. Mahan had a cancer in the breast, which had eaten into her lungs, and was frequently discharging blood from her mouth. The best medical authorities deemed death inevitable from this cancer, and near at hand. At the same time she had a tumor, so located as to be inaccessible to surgical operation, which also gave her great pain. This, too, was declared incurable, and equally threatening as to fatal consequences. Mrs. Mahan's attention had not been called specially to the subject of faith-healing much before this. One night, from the profuse hæmorrhage through her lungs and mouth, she thought the fatal hour had come. Dr. Mahan was then out of London, holding a protracted religious meeting, and she declined to have him called home. Regarding death to be very near, she lifted up her soul to God in prayer, substantially to this effect: that if it were God's will to take her then to Himself, she could say, "Thy will, O God, be done!" But she desired to live a few years longer, to assist her husband in certain literary work, and therefore she prayed for immediate healing, yet with entire submission. Upon the utterance of this prayer, yes, instantly, "wonder of wonders," as her written narrative says, the blood ceased to flow, all pain from both cancer and tumor at once ceased, and she fell into a quiet slumber and slept till morning. She then arose, felt entirely cured, dressed herself, went downstairs—which she had not been able to do for some time—was able to attend to her house duties and her literary work, and has had no trouble since from either cancer or tumor, both having entirely disappeared. At the time this narrative was related (1879) Mrs. Mahan had been healed some two or three years. She is still living and in good health, as her occasional letters to us bear witness.

Such instances as this are multiplying on every hand, at home and abroad, in Christian lands and in heathen lands. Since publishing "The Ministry of Healing," we have had many striking cases reported to us by missionaries on foreign fields. We believe that God is making bare His arm in the sight of all the heathen. Let us praise rather than ridicule.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

An Old Sinner's Stinging Reproof.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Deware said: "Shortly after I came to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, I was talking to an aged man, who was very careless about his soul, and was living a most wicked life. In my youthful zeal I thought it was impossible for any one not to see the truth as I had seen it. In replying to my entreaties and arguments he spoke about the hypocrisy of professors. He kept perfectly cool, but I regret to say I lost my temper; then he looked me straight in the face, and said, 'You profess to be a converted man; you look very like it now!' It was a stinging and deserved reproof. I never forgot it."

How the Clergyman's Servants were Converted.—The Rev. Mr. Boyd says: "An Episcopal clergyman kept quite a number of servants, and it was noticed that every one of them was converted soon after entering upon his service. People began to ask, 'How is it he never speaks to them directly about religion, yet his servants are all converted almost as soon as they go to the parsonage?' On inquiry, it proved to be his Christian life which was the means used by God to convert the servants. He was so bright and joyful, kind and considerate, that they felt the power of Christ flowing from his heart to theirs. Let each of us so live that we may also obtain a similar blessing to that of this clergyman. Let men take knowledge of us that we have been with Jesus, and have learned of Him."

"Quite a Curiosity!"—"A Married Couple were fearfully addicted to drink. The man was a noted street-fighter and the woman usually spent her Sabbath in the police station. One Sunday afternoon the man came to our Gospel-meeting for people in their working clothes; there the Lord met him, and made him a new man in Christ Jesus. The same characteristic which made him so zealous in the service of the evil one now made him set to work vigorously for Christ. He opened a kitchen-meeting in his own house, and conducts it himself. One after another of his friends and relations have been brought to Jesus by him. His house, which was formerly the centre of evil in his district, has now become a centre of Christian work. The influence of his changed life radiates all through the district, though, of course, scoffers laugh and say that he is quite a curiosity."

In a Cave among Gypsies.—Mr. Deware said: "My first effort in conversion work was in a haunt of gypsies, numbering about twenty men and women. They had taken up their abode in a cave on the seashore of the Western Highlands. I got very much interested in them, and wondered greatly what I could do for them. As doing in this case was better than wondering, I went to them with Bible in hand and the love of Christ in my heart, and asked permission to read a chapter to them. One or two of the members scowled, but the majority assented. I read a chapter, and then spoke a few words. On stopping, one of the men said abruptly, 'I knew your father. Are you from Perthshire?' 'Yes.' 'I am also.' That was a connecting link, two connecting links, in fact—knowing my father and being from Perthshire. This was quite sufficient to make two Scotchmen friends who met each other in a strange place. The Lord blessed my first effort, and some of these gypsies were led to yield themselves to Christ, and He has since abundantly blessed me during a long service for Him."

An Inconsistent Covenanter.—"I Have a vivid recollection of a prayer I heard once. I was visiting a poor sick woman in the country. As I stood at the door waiting for admittance, I heard the voice of a man engaged in prayer. His words were exceedingly appropriate and quite scriptural from beginning to end, not a word out of place. At the conclusion of the prayer I entered and found that the suppliant was the sick woman's brother, who belonged to the Covenanters, a body which is recognized as being very sound in doctrine; but this man was well known at fairs and markets as being one who did not restrain his passions nor curb his appetites, yet the prayer he offered was right in everything but one, namely, earnest faith. There is no use praying as a matter of form; it must be from the heart in love and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ."

A Scoffer's Sudden Death.—Mr. Bamford said: "On the last day of last year I had the privilege of speaking a word of warning and exhortation to a man who lived in the vicinity of a hall where a small body of humble, earnest Christians met for prayer. He had a bitter hatred against them, and gave them a great deal of annoyance as they went to their meetings, by scoffing, and pointing his finger at them, crying, 'There go the saints!' and such-like contemptuous sentences. Eight days after I spoke to him, he was at work, apparently in perfect health. Suddenly he turned to a fellow-workman, and said, 'I feel very ill; I will go home, and come back when I am better.' Alas! he never rose from his bed again, but passed away to appear before God, unreconciled, unwashed in the precious blood of the Lamb. Beware! do not delay, but turn to God now, lest Death should suddenly mark you for his own, and leave you without time for repentance."

A Corean Tutor's Warning.—Mr. McMicking related: "Some youths belonging to Corea, a mysterious country which lies close to China, were recently sent to Japan to study science. The teacher who had charge of them, and who knew that there were some believers in Christ in Japan, said, 'If any of you become Christians I cannot return to Corea, but must commit suicide, as I shall be disgraced.' A Corean native Christian, living in Japan, got acquainted with some of these youths, and told them of Jesus and His love. After a time they grew interested in the Gospel, felt themselves to be sinners, and gave themselves unreservedly to Christ, and confessed Him to all with whom they came in contact. They were immediately cast adrift by their relatives, and their allowance stopped, but they still trusted in the Lord, and He did not fail them. Their teacher also has been so impressed by their noble conduct that he accepted a gift of the New Testament in the Corean language, and is now inquiring into the truth of the Gospel."

Basely Robbing a Kind Host.—"I Visited a man who lives in Anderston. He was a drunkard for twenty years, but was converted to Christ ten months ago, and was the cause of much prayerful anxiety to those who knew him. When I called on him on New Year's Day, I found him in a strange state. His home consisted of a room and kitchen. Out of pure Christian charity he had taken in a couple into his room, so that they might have shelter till better times came for them. He had to go into the country for a week to do some work, and when he returned to his comfortable home, he found that his guests had basely stripped it of everything, taking even his watch and Sunday suit of clothes, so that he had nothing but the working clothes in which he was standing. The shock he got was enough to drive an unconverted man to drinking. He quietly kindled a fire, and kneeling down in the middle of his empty kitchen he poured out his complaint to God, and God heard him, and sent relief. Soon he was enabled to rise from his knees praising and magnifying the goodness and mercy of God to him, and cast himself upon His promised strength and bounty."

THE TWO RESURRECTIONS.

By the Rev. George Shipman Payson.

(From the Episcopal Recorder.)

Three Characteristics of the Millennium—Disagreement of Views as to the Two Resurrections—Will be Identical in their Nature—Believed by the Early Church—The first Resurrection as a Ground for Hope—Texts Confirming It—The Irresistible Conclusion.

THE question as to whether the next coming of our Lord is to precede or to follow the millennium, is one of the deepest interest. Its discussion leads us briefly to consider what the Scriptures teach concerning the millennium, the second advent, and the relation of these two in point of time.

I. Webster defines millennium as "a thousand years; a word used to designate the thousand years mentioned in the twentieth chapter of Revelation, during which period Satan will be bound and holiness triumphant throughout the world."

The only Scripture in which the millennium as such is spoken of is in Rev. 20: 1–8. The phrase, "a thousand years," is nowhere else employed to designate this period. This is the only place where the characteristics of the millennium are distinctly referred to in connection with that term.

It will be noticed on examining that passage that it is characterized by these notable features: (1) The binding of Satan: (2) the reign of the saints and martyrs; and (3) the two resurrections, that of the just at its commencement, and that of "the rest of the dead at its close." Concerning the first and second, premillennial and post-millennial authorities are agreed. As to the third there is serious disagreement. Post-millennial authorities claim that the first resurrection here spoken of is a spiritual one; that it does not refer to the resurrection of the body (of which Paul says, "This corruption must put on incorruption"), but to conversion, in which the soul that has been dead in trespasses and sins is raised again in newness of life.

But to this it may be replied, the two resurrections must be precisely, for both are referred to in precisely the same terms, and in almost the same breath. The fifth verse says of the martyrs: "They lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." The sixth verse adds, "But the rest of the dead lived not again until the thousand years were finished. This is the first resurrection." If the first resurrection is spiritual, then the second must be, which can only be maintained by Universalism. But if the second is literal, corporeal resurrection, so is the first. Otherwise, to use Dean Alford's expressive words with reference to this very discussion, "Scripture is wiped out as a definite testimony to anything." Moreover, if the first resurrection is not literal and corporeal, then the saints do not rise at all, for they certainly do not rise with "the rest of the dead" who are contrasted with them.

Hence there are to be two resurrections; the one of the just at the beginning of the millennial period, and the other of the unjust at its close. This was the view of the whole primitive Church, of the Apostles, of their immediate pupils, and of those who believed through them, down to the accession of Constantine, in the beginning of the fourth century. Dean Alford characterizes it as "the most cogent instance of consensus which primitive antiquity presents."

II. If we were to select from the multitude of New Testament passages, referring to the second advent of our Lord, that which is most conspicuous and definite, it would be 1 Thess. 4: 15–17: Here there is no reference to the resurrection of the wicked. But the resurrection of "the dead in Christ" is spoken of as a ground of hope, and comfort, and desire. And it is inseparably associated with the Coming of the Lord for His saints. It must be the first resurrection spoken of in the twentieth chapter of Revelation. And since this is to precede the millennium, and usher it in, therefore the second advent of our Lord is to be pre-millennial, and may occur at any hour.

This is the briefest possible outline of the scriptural argument. We may glance at a few

CORROBORATIVE TEXTS.

Our Saviour says (Luke 14: 13–14): "But when thou makest a feast, call the poor . . . and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee: for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." But why at the resurrection of the just? Why not at the resurrection simply? There are to be two; the first of the just, the second of the unjust; one to precede, the other to follow the millennium; the earlier to be associated with glory at Christ's reappearance, the later to be attended with judgment and shame at His bar.

Daniel says (12: 2): "Many from among the sleepers of the dust of the earth shall awake; these shall be unto everlasting life, but those (the rest of sleepers) shall be unto shame and everlasting contempt." This is the translation of that eminent scholar and critic, Tregelles, who says: "I have given, I believe, the most literal rendering of this verse. It speaks of an eclectic resurrection—many from among the sleepers—and the passage has been understood by the Jewish commentators in the sense that I have stated."

Paul says (1 Cor. 15: 23) of the resurrection of believers, "But every man in his own order: Christ the firstfruits; afterward they that are Christ's at His coming," and the whole chapter may be regarded as corroborating this doctrine.

Most remarkable, however, is Phil. 3: 7–11, in which Paul describes the great sacrifices which he had made, "if by any means he might attain unto the resurrection from the dead." (Revised Version.) He taught that all men should be raised. But for the resurrection of the just he strove with unflagging zeal. He invents a Greek term to describe his conception of it. Exanastasis is nowhere else employed. It has been well translated "the out-resurrection," "that which is to be out from among the dead," and in connection with the peculiar Greek construction immediately following, this clause is an exact translation. It clearly describes a special and, as Tregelles describes it, an eclectic resurrection. It is the same which precedes the millennium, and is associated with Christ's second coming. It is the "living hope" for which Peter exclaims (1 Peter, 1: 3), "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ." And it is the goal toward which the primitive Church pressed eagerly and prayerfully, and with the martyrs' zeal.

We are content to leave the argument from Scripture just here. It is irrefutable. It may be obscured by the veils of sophistry, by the dust of conflict, or by the glamor of worldliness. But nothing can destroy the fact that the Apostles, the Apostolic Church, and the early followers of Christ, lived in daily, and hourly, and eager anticipation of our Lord's return. Either the inspired teachers of the New Testament were in error here, and therefore nothing that they said can be relied upon, or else it is the privilege of all Christians in every age to live as those who look for their Lord from heaven, and "love His appearing."

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to The Christian Herald. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Trial of Strength on Mr. Morrison's Tariff bill took place in the House on April 15th. An effort was made to prevent the measure being considered, and Mr. Randall and the Republican managers had taken care that pairs were made for every absentee. The vote for considering the bill was 140 to 138. Thirty-nine Democrats voted with the Republicans and five Republicans voted with the Democrats. Counting those paired for the bill it appears that the vote for consideration was 158. That, however, does not represent the supporters of the measure, as it is probable some members who are opposed to it, voted for its consideration, believing that a measure so important ought not to be rejected without discussion. The debate promises to be a long one; more than eighty members have signified their wish to speak.

Several State Republican Conventions were held last week to select delegates for the Chicago Convention on June 3d. In Pennsylvania Mr. Blaine was declared the choice of the convention for President and Mr. Lincoln for Vice-President, and the delegates-at-large were instructed to vote for them. The convention in its platform approved President Arthur's administration, opposed tariff reduction, and recommended suspension of the coinage of the silver dollar. Nothing was said about the scheme endorsed at the previous convention for distributing the surplus. As Mr. Randall is the Democratic choice in that State, it appears that both parties there are agreed on the tariff question. In Illinois the convention declared General Logan its choice for President, and the delegates were so instructed. That convention also declared for protection. In New Jersey the delegates are left uninstructed. Some of them are said to be Blaine men, while others are for Edmunds. This convention had a special interest from the fact that the notorious Robeson made frantic efforts to be made delegate-at-large. He was defeated, and even when the convention proceeded to the election of alternates it preferred a colored man to Robeson. It is feared by Mr. Blaine's supporters that Mr. Robeson's energetic advocacy of his friend's nomination will injure that candidate's prospects, the fact of Mr. Robeson wanting any man elected to the Presidency being likely to cause the people to distrust the candidate. In Indiana also the delegates were left uninstructed, but it was understood that Senator Harrison was their first choice and after that the delegates were divided between Arthur and Blaine. In South Carolina and Alabama Arthur is the first choice.

A Deputation of Business-Men went to Washington last week to urge upon Congress the danger to business interests of continuing the silver-dollar coinage. The representative from New York carried a petition signed by two thousand prominent merchants and bankers, asking for a suspension of the coinage for two years. The deputation was received by the House Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, but the tone of the reception was not encouraging.

The Miscarriage of Justice which Led to the recent fatal riots in Cincinnati is paralleled in other great cities. The causes are not difficult to find. The Boston Transcript describes a state of affairs in that city which, bad as it is, is better than that of New York. It says: "Good easy citizens may believe that such scandalous failures of justice as brought on the revolt in Cincinnati are impossible in this community. What do the law and order workers tell us on this point? At a recent meeting of the City Council a man was elected to a responsible public trust who, as the court-records show, has been several times arrested, and has been fined not only for violating the liquor-selling laws, but also for assault. Two of the members of the Police Committee of our Common Council have lately been up for the illegal selling of liquor. A short while ago a man sat upon the jury in our Superior Criminal Court who was the real defendant in three or four criminal cases appealed to the same term; and there is always a liquor-dealer or two upon the Criminal Court juries. The officials of the League assert that bad cases of violation of the liquor law have been settled or withheld from prosecution."

Another Disastrous Tornado is Reported from the South. On April 15th a violent storm passed over parts of Alabama and Georgia accompanied by the heaviest rainfall ever known in that section. The trains on all railroads had to be side-tracked, and several trestle bridges were swept away. At Attala on the Alabama Great Southern route the depot was struck by lightning, and that and the contiguous hotel were burned. At Chipley, Ga., several lives were lost, and many persons were carried by the tornado long distances and were severely injured. The loss of property was serious.

Chief-Justice Noah Davis Delivered an Address before the Nineteenth Century Club in New York on April 15th on the subject of divorce. Judge Davis's long experience on the bench gave his opinions on the subject much weight, and his address was heard with marked attention. He advocated as a remedy for the evils, which he exhaustively summarized, the passing of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to establish a uniform rule for all the States. This he argued would do away with the common practice of people going to distant States, where the law was more lax than in their own, to obtain a divorce. He urged that divorces should not be granted for any other cause than that sanctioned by the Bible. Among the minor remedies he recommended as safeguards against fraud and collusion was a law providing that no judgment could be entered until it appeared clearly that the suit had been actually pending at least six months after service of the process. This not only to prevent frauds, but to give the parties a breathing spell for possible reconciliation, and to prevent immediate and shameful remarriage. In all cases the defendant should have the right to insist that the alleged paramour be brought in and made a party to the action, so that an unjust accusation could be met and confuted by both of the accused. And, above all, that in all such actions the State should be made a party, so that it shall be able to prevent the wrongs that are inflicted upon the public and upon children and innocent persons; and no judgment should be allowed until it appears that some lawful representative of the State has been served with a process and had opportunity to appear and resist the divorce. The judge showed, by a survey of the laws of the different States, how unscrupulous persons might, by taking advantage of the diversities, now obtain divorces from partners of whom they were weary, and contract marriages in four or five States in succession without being amenable to the law, and in some cases without the partners from whom they were divorced knowing that divorce proceedings were in progress.

Ladies who Carry Pistols have during the past few weeks attracted some attention. The New York Evening Post has been at some pains to collect the records of recent cases of homicide in which ladies have played the chief part. It mentions one day only two weeks ago in which two murders were committed by women with pistols, and in both cases the murderesses seem to have armed themselves in advance. In Hazleton, Penn., Mrs. Thomas Rees, "driven to desperation by the taunts and jeers" of Mrs. Simmons, of whom she was jealous, suddenly pulled out a pistol, and with it killed an innocent bystander, who was unwise enough to undertake to save Mrs. Simmons's life. On the same day, in Syracuse in this State, Mrs. William Ransier killed Mr. Adam Sutter, with whom she had had a good deal of trouble, and in this case, too, she seems to have armed herself in advance. In another case murder in court was averted by the judge adjourning the sitting. A lady under cross-examination was irritated by the questions addressed to her, and felt in her pocket for her pistol, and in an instant pistol barrels glittered in various directions around the court. The judge promptly adjourned, and when the court reassembled would allow no one to enter who carried a pistol. One of our most urgently needed reforms is a well-executed law against carrying concealed weapons.

Mr. Thomas G. Appleton, the Brother-in-Law and intimate friend of the poet Longfellow, died of pneumonia in New York on Thursday last. He came to this city a week before to visit his relatives here, and was about to return to Boston when seized with the illness which proved fatal. Mr. Appleton was seventy-two years of age. He was well known here and in Europe, his genial disposition, ready wit, and refined culture gaining him friends wherever he went. He wrote several works in prose and verse, prominent among them being "Fresh and Faded Leaves," "A Nile Journal," and "Syrian Sunshine." He was one of the most valued members of the distinguished circle which included Professor Agassiz, Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmers, Hon. James Russell Lowell, Sumner, and Hawthorne.

A Temperance Victory has been Achieved in Dakota. A correspondent of the New York Witness, writing from De Smeet, D. T., says: "We have just passed through a very exciting temperance campaign, in which Kingsbury County, by a majority of ninety-eight men and two hundred and twenty-two women, refused to grant license to saloons for the coming year. It snowed all the day of election, and most of the time threatened to become dangerous to travel on the prairie; yet eleven hundred men turned out, some going fifteen miles and back to deposit their vote. Two hundred and twenty-two women also went to the polls, and either by vote in a separate ballot-box or by petitions presented in person to the commissioners gave their voice for prohibition. One brave woman went seven miles in the storm and cast the only woman's vote in her township."

A Revival is Reported from Johnstown, Ohio. The Rev. James T. Minehart says in a letter recently received, that "the entire circuit from one end to the other is in a revival flame." During the past eleven weeks one hundred and sixty conversions have taken place under his preaching. "The oldest inhabitants say they have never seen such marvellous displays of God's mighty power."

The Annual Conference of the Primitive Methodist Church of America was held in Mahanoy City, Pa., from April 3d to 9th. Many ministers and delegates were present from all parts. A revival was in progress during the meetings, and about fifty souls were converted. Mrs. Shipman of England was present, and preached on Sunday morning, April 6th, at the Primitive Methodist Church. She is still suffering from the diphtheritic sore throat, which compels an almost entire cessation from preaching. Prayers are requested that the Lord will restore her to health in order that she may continue her labors as an evangelist.

Mr. Ben Hogan, the Converted Pugilist, is now laboring in Pueblo, Col., where, he desires us to say, his letters may be sent. He has been conducting evangelistic meetings in Salt Lake City, Utah, where large meetings were held in the Grand Opera House.

The Religious Work in St. Louis Commenced by Mr. Harrison's services is still continued. Dr. Tudor, of the Centenary Church, in which the revival services were held, baptized forty-seven adults on Sunday, April 16th. A newspaper correspondent in St. Louis writes: "Dr. Tudor has now a list of three hundred applicants for admission into the communion of the church. Mr. Harrison left the city two weeks ago, but the services have not been discontinued. There are daily meetings at three o'clock for prayer and praise and the interchange of experience; also at eight o'clock every night. These meetings are well attended, and much interest is felt."

Miss Jennie Smith Held Successful Revival services in the Madison Avenue Congregational Church, New York, last week. She was assisted by her zealous and indefatigable colleague, Miss Sherman. Miss Smith has been continuously engaged now for many months in revival work in various States, holding frequent meetings, some of which were all-day meetings occupying more than twelve hours. These labors have involved long railroad journeys and loss of rest. Nevertheless she shows no signs of weariness or fatigue. Yet before her cure through faith and prayer she was an invalid unable to leave her sick bed. When asked about the progress of the cottage, the fund for which was established by grateful railroad men on the Baltimore and Ohio Line, she said that the building was in course of erection. Her project of adding a wing to it for the use of disabled workers in the Lord's service who need rest for recuperation, will be carried out, if the necessary funds are received, about which Miss Smith seems to have no doubt, though she is making no effort to obtain them. She expects that the Lord will send them in some way. It appears that the immediate need is about $240.

A Fatal Girdle of Gold was Worn by an aged couple in California some time ago. The wife of a hotel proprietor at Marysville, Cal., relates the incident. She saw an Englishman and his wife come down from the mountains looking hungry and miserable, clad in garments so old and wretched that in compassion she gave the woman some decent clothing. At night they begged to have a room with good fastenings to the windows and doors, and when they were asked why they were so anxious on this matter admitted that they carried in belts around their bodies gold dust worth $10,000. They were on their way to New York, whence they intended to sail for England. The landlady advised them to send the dust by express to New York, but they refused. They said they could not afford to pay express charges, and besides could not bear to have it out of their sight. It represented years of toil, hardship, and semi-starvation. They accordingly clung to it. The landlady says: "The next news I heard of them was that they were both drowned at Virgin Bay while going from the shore in a boat to get on board the steamer. The weight of their gold belts sank them at once, while the rest of the capsized boat's passengers floated and were picked up by other boats." But for the gold so hardly won and so dearly prized the aged couple might have been saved too. So it has been with some souls. The young man who went away from Christ sorrowfully because of his great possessions has many followers (Mark 10 : 23).

A Remarkable Cure of the Opium Habit is reported from Groton, Conn. A telegram from that place to the New York Times states that a well-known lady, who has for many years taken opium in large quantities, has been enabled to discontinue its use through faith and prayer. Those who know anything of the drug are aware that a sudden stoppage of its use produces a condition in which life and reason are both in danger. The telegram in question states that this lady, though taking half an ounce of opium daily, was able to discontinue it entirely, and has felt no ill effects. Her deliverance was instantaneous, and occurred while she and several friends were pleading with God for the blessing.

A Lady's Kindness to a Tramp has Won her a fortune, according to a despatch from Louisville, Ky. It states that a young lady residing at Russellville, in that State, about a year ago showed some kindness to an aged tramp. A few days afterward the tramp sought her, and asked her for her name. He said: "You are a good girl, and I like you. Don't you know that you are the only person that has treated me with any kindness for years? They say I am old and crazy, but don't you believe 'em. I have got lots of money, and I am going to leave it all to you." The lady's mother coming in at this point, he repeated his remarks to her, and shaking hands with both ladies, left. Recently a letter was received by the lady to the effect that the man was dead, and that on his body a paper was found directing all his money, amounting to several thousand dollars, should be sent to her. Such a reward for kindness to the poor is very rare, but Christ assured us that those who succor them for His sake should in no wise lose a reward (Luke 14 : 4).

A Grateful Deed of Daring was Performed recently in Alabama. It was connected with the Everingham disaster. After the boat had been banked a roster of the crew was called, and Assistant Pilot Wingate did not answer. "Where is Wingate?" some one shouted. "Asleep, in his berth," was the answer, which horrified every one. At that time the flames had full control of the vessel, the supports of the upper deck were being eaten rapidly away, and the flames circled round and round over the hurricane deck, licking the glass of the state-room doors, and rising high above the ship's head. No sooner were the words uttered than a black form was seen rushing toward Wingate's berth and impending death. A surge, a crash, and the door gave way, and Wingate and his rescuer were seen making their way gallantly through the fire and smoke. In a few minutes, scorched and almost suffocated, they escaped in safety to the shore. It was subsequently ascertained that this deed of daring was prompted by gratitude. The negro remembered, when he heard of Wingate's peril, that some time before, his own life had been saved by Wingate. The two were together in a disaster last April when the Wylly went to pieces against the Fort Gaines bridge. He was going under for the third time when Wingate snatched him from his grave. The thought of his own deliverance sent the negro, at the risk of his life, to rescue his rescuer. He seemed to think that the man who had saved him had a claim on the life he had saved. How earnestly and devotedly would Christian men work for Christ if they realized their obligations as this negro did his (Rom. 12 ; 1).

WHAT IS YOUR LIFE?

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Suggested by the Sudden Death of H. R. H., Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany.

"For what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." —James 4 : 14.

A Sudden Death an Impressive Warning—Death Impartial—Peter Waldo's Conversion through a Death—Luther's Awakening—I. The Truth in the Text—Men Have no Foresight—The Future Wisely Veiled—Foolishness in Foresight—An Emphatic Question—Some Remarkable Deaths—The Apostolic Comparison—II. When a prince dies they toll the great bell of the cathedral that all the city may hear it, and that for miles round the tidings may spread. A royal death is a national warning. A death in any one of our families is a loud call to our own household, a call which I trust we hear; but a death in the royal family has a voice to the whole nation. A sudden death is a specially impressive warning. If men die of old age we regard it as coming in the common course of things; but when a young man is suddenly snatched away, then we understand that though the old must die, the young may die; and that no one among us may reckon upon any long day of life, since in a moment our sun may go down ere it is yet noon. So falls the grass beneath the mower's scythe, so fades the leaf from the tree. In a moment our strength is turned to weakness, and our comeliness into corruption. Then, in accents as plain as they are terrible, the Lord saith, "Because I will do this unto thee, prepare to meet thy God, O Israel!"

We have this week received fresh proof that

DEATH IS IMPARTIAL.

As the Arab proverb hath it, the black camel stops at every man's door. Sorrow has entered in at the windows of palaces, and even in the royal chamber there lieth one dead. To us also in due time shall be brought the message, "The Master is come, and calleth for thee." My ear hears a voice crying aloud, "Set thine house in order; for thou shalt die, and not live." Will not you hear it? Will any one of you refuse the voice which speaketh from heaven? Death evidently pays no respect to character, age, or hopefulness. A man may addict himself to the service of his country, but his patriotism will not protect him. He may be surrounded with a wall of affection, but this will not screen him. He may have at command all the comforts of life, and yet life may ooze out before the physician is aware. He may be tenderly beloved of an affectionate mother, and his name may be engraven on the heart of the fondest of wives, but death hath no regard to the love of women. "It is appointed unto men once to die." There is no discharge in this war; we shall all march into this fight, and unless the Lord Himself shall speedily come and end the present dispensation, we shall each one fall upon this battlefield, for the shafts of death fly everywhere, and there is no armor for either back or breast by which his cruel darts may be turned aside. I would to God that all of us retained this truth in our memories.

History tells us of Peter Waldo, of Lyons, who was sitting at a banquet as thoughtless and careless as any of the revellers, when suddenly one at the table bowed his head and died. Waldo was startled into thought, and went home to seek his God; he searched the Scriptures, and, according to some, became a great helper, if not the second founder, of the Waldensian Church, which in the Alpine valleys kept the lamp of the Gospel burning when all around was veiled in night. A whole church of God was thus strengthened and perpetuated by the hallowed influence of death upon a single mind. I suppose it is also true that Luther in his younger days, walking with his friend Alexis, saw him struck to the ground by a flash of lightning, and became thenceforward prepared in heart for that deep work of grace through which he learned the doctrine of justification by faith, and rose to be the liberator of Europe from Papal bondage. How much every way we owe to this weighty subject!

With an intense desire for our spiritual profiting I shall speak upon our text in two ways; first, let us consider the truth in the text, and, secondly, the lessons in that truth.

I. We commence with the truth in the text, upon which we have already touched. The text begins by reminding us that

WE HAVE NO FORESIGHT:

"Whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow." God has given us memory that we may look backward, and it were well if we used our memories better for remembrance, reflection, and repentance, but God has given us no eyes wherewith to pry into the future. He unveils the past to our penitence; but He veils the future from our curiosity. Dark days may be near at hand for some of us, but we do not perceive them. Let us be thankful that we do not, for we might multiply our afflictions by the foresight of them, and the prospect of evil to come might cast a gloom over pleasure near at hand. As we may feel a thousand deaths in fearing one, so may we faint under a thousand lashes in dreading a single stroke.

It is good also that our God conceals from us our earthly joys until the time for their arrival. Great prosperity may await you, and a considerable enlargement of your temporal comfort, but you do not know it; and it is as well that you should not, for you might be none the better for the prospect. Earth's goods are like bird-lime, and are fearfully apt to glue us down to things below, and prevent our soaring toward heaven. If then we could know all the pleasurable events that may happen to us we might become more worldly and more earthbound than we are.

No, we cannot see far, and those who act as if they could see into coming days behave most foolishly. Hear these people whom James describes; they boast most wretchedly; they will go into the city, they are sure they will, what is to hinder them? "To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city"—they have plenty of time, and can make a selection according to their pleasure; they can go where they like, and when they like. They see themselves with prophetic glance entering in at the city gate, and they are fully assured that they shall "continue there a year." Of course, a year that is a small matter; if they please they will stay longer. They allot themselves a lease for three, seven, fourteen, or twenty-one years, at discretion; at least they talk as if they could do so.

They are going into the city to "buy and sell;" they are sure of that too. Of course they will not be laid up with sickness; they do not fear that accident or disease will keep them away from market, or hinder the active transacting of their business. No, they are going to buy and sell, and such is their confidence in their own superior abilities that they are sure to make a profit of it; the markets cannot fall below the price which they have fixed in their own minds, neither will they make bad debts, nor incur other losses, for they have decided that they will "get gain." Hitherto they have been self-made men, and they mean to go on making themselves, until they put the finishing stroke by adding a few more thousands. They have visions of going on to fortune. Ah, ye prophets, ye are going to your graves! This is

A SURE ORACLE.

The text divides itself into an emphatic question, "What is your life?" and an instructive answer, "It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away."

First, I say, we have here an emphatic question; he asks, "What is your life?" For solidity, for stability; what is it? It will fail before a touch, a breath. Justinian, an emperor of Rome, died by going into a room which had been newly painted; Adrian, a pope, was strangled by a fly; a consul struck his foot against his own threshold, and his foot mortified, so that he died thereby. There are a thousand gates to death; and, though some seem to be narrow wickets, many souls have passed through them. Men have been choked by a grape stone, killed by a tile falling from the roof of a house, poisoned by a drop, carried off by a whiff of foul air. I know not what there is that is too little to slay the greatest king. It is a marvel that man lives at all. So unstable is our life that the Apostle says, What is it? So frail, so fragile is it, that he does not call it a flower of the field, or the snuff of a candle, but asks, What is our life? It is as if he had said,

IS IT ANYTHING?

Is it not a near approach to nothing?

St. Augustine used to say he did not know whether to call it a dying life or a living death, and I leave you the choice between those two expressions. This is certainly a dying life; its march is marked by graves. We are always dying. Every beating pulse we tell leaves but the number less; the more years we count in our life, the fewer remain in which we shall behold the light of day. While we are sitting still in this house, the earth is revolving round the sun, and bearing us all through space at an amazing rate. We are all moving, and yet we do not perceive it; even so while you are listening to this sermon you are all being borne onward toward eternity at lightning speed. What, then, is our life? That is a question which remains to a large degree unanswered and unanswerable.

Yet our text affords us what is in some aspects an instructive answer. It does not so much tell us what life actually is as what it is like. "It is even a vapor." James compares our life, you see, to a very subtle, unsubstantial, flimsy thing—a vapor. He proceeds to explain his own symbol in a sentence which is full of meaning. "It is even a vapor, that appeareth." Notice that. He does not speak of it as a substance, having a true existence, but says that it "appeareth." Vapor is so ethereal, that it may rather be said to appear than to exist. If you could reach yon fleecy cloud, you would scarcely know that you had entered it, for it would possibly appear to be the thinest of mist. The vapor which steams from your mouth, how light, how airy, it is next door to nothing; it only "appeareth." And such is this life—a dream, a vain show, an apparition of the night.

Further the Apostle says, It "appeareth for a little time." It is only a very little while that a man lives at the longest. Compare a man's life with that of a tree. There is so striking a contrast between our present short life and that of a cedar, or an oak, that to set forth the longer life of saints in the millennial age the Lord says, "As the days of a tree are the days of my people, and mine elect shall long enjoy the work of their hands." In that happy age men shall flourish long as the trees of the forest; but now a man standing beneath an oak is a mere infant compared with the boughs which overshadow him. Compare our life with the existence of this world; I mean not the present state of the earth as fitted up for man, but I allude to those unknown ages which intervened between the present arrangement and that beginning wherein God created the heavens and the earth. The long eras of fire and water, the reigns of fishes and reptiles, the periods of tropical heat and polar ice, make one think of man as a thing of yesterday. He appeareth for a little while.

The parallel is further consummated by the Apostle's adding, "And then vanisheth away." The cloud is gone from the mountain. Where is it? It has vanished away. No trace of it is left; neither can you recall it. We too shall soon be gone; gone as a dream when one awaketh. With the most of us our remembrance will be short. Many leave us concerning whom it would be a pity that they should be remembered; while many fail to live for others, and therefore their fellows speedily forget them. Amid the crowded cemetery amid ten thousand deaths no one departure can long abide in human memory. Children may bear our name, and yet a fourth generation shall quite forget that we ever sojourned in this region. Such is our life—"a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanisheth away." This is the truth; you know it, but I cannot impress it upon your hearts as it ought to be impressed; hence I invite you to join me in the prayer, "So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom."

II. Secondly, let us now learn the lessons which lie within this truth. May we read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the same.

First, if this life be unsubstantial as a vapor—and nobody can deny the fact—let us regard it as such, and let us seek for something substantial elsewhere.

> "This world's a dream, an empty show;
> But the great world to which I go
> Hath joys substantial and sincere;
> When shall I wake and find me there?"

It may be well to make the best of both worlds; but of this poor world nothing can be made unless it be viewed in the light of another. This is a poor withering life at the best, for we all do fade as a leaf. Unless we purposely live with a view to the next world, we cannot make much out of our present existence. Let us grip the eternal, and sit loose by the temporal. The jewels of eternity will glitter in our crowns when all things pass away; but the trifles of this life are as the flowers which children pluck in the meadows, which wither in their hands before they can carry them home.

In this place I suggest as your prayer that stanza of the poet in which he addresses the Well-beloved thus:

> "Show me thy face—
> My faith and love
> Shall henceforth fixed be,
> And nothing here have power to move
> My soul's serenity.
> My life shall seem a trance, a dream,
> And all I feel and see
> Illusive, visionary—Thou
> The one reality."

Next, is life most uncertain? We know it is; no one attempts to deny it. Then let us not delay. I would to God I could whisper this wisdom into every procrastinator's ear. Why dost thou halt and hesitate? If thou art desirous to be saved from the wrath to come, why dost thou put it off till a to-morrow which may never come? Awake, I pray thee! Since death is hastening, haste thou thyself until thou hast found a refuge in the cleft of the Rock of Ages, and art safe in the arms of Jesus. Since life is so uncertain, oh haste thee, Christian, to serve thy God while the opportunity is given thee;

BE DILIGENT

to-day to do those works which perfect saints above and holy angels cannot do. Thou wilt soon be where thou canst no more give alms to the poor, nor instruct the ignorant, nor visit the fatherless and the widow. Thou shalt have no opportunities for speaking to men about their souls, or winning them for Christ, when once this shadowy life has vanished away. How earnest every worker ought to be to do his work well while he has the opportunity! I have charged myself again and again—I would to God the charge had been more effectual—to preach

> "As though I ne'er might preach again,
> A dying man to dying men."

I am persuaded that if we were in possession of all the wisdom that grace will give us, we should do everything for the good of men most speedily, with deep prayerfulness, with true spiritual life, and with an entire dependence upon the Spirit of God for the blessing of it.

Is life so short? Does it only appear for a little time, and then vanish away? Then let us put all we can into it. If life be short, it is wisdom to have no fallows, but to sow every foot of ground while we can. It will be prudent to pack our little space as full as possible. Somebody said the other day of our dear friend Mr. Moody, that he was the only man who could pronounce "Jerusalem" in two syllables. It shows the activity of the man that he can speak as much in two syllables as other people can say in four; he is always at it, working for his Master double tides, rowing with both hands. Some speakers are long in delivering short sense; instead of saying much in little, they say little in much. Oh, for some one to teach them to say "Jerusalem" in two syllables! Let us put plenty of life into our existence, plenty of work into our life, plenty of heart into our work, and plenty of warmth into our heart. Oh, may God give us to live while we live! May we not only live, but be all alive.

Is life so short? Then do not let us make any very great provision for it. I have heard of certain people who are so imprudent that they never lay by anything for a rainy day, to whom I would say, "Go to the ant, thou sluggard; consider her ways, and be wise; which having no guide, overseer, or ruler, provideth her meat in the summer, and gathereth her food in the harvest." It would be a poverty-stricken world if all followed the example of improvidence which is set by certain spiritual blunderers. There is a thriftiness which we all ought to exercise; but there is no justification for laying up treasure which will never be used. Ants do not store up grain for storing's sake; they do but divide over the whole year the harvest of a month. To hoard up endless gold is

A SPECIES OF INSANITY.

If I were going a day's voyage, I should not wish to take with me enough biscuit and salt beef to last for three years; it would only cumber the boat. One walking-stick is an admirable help, as I often find; but to carry a bundle of them when going on a journey would be a superfluity of absurdity. Alas, how many load themselves as if life's journey would last a thousand years, at the least! Some men have amassed hundreds of thousands of pounds; when are they going to enjoy their wealth? They are getting more and more, and this occupies all their time; they are so busy cooking that they never have time to dine; they are so taken up with filling the wardrobe that they are all in rags. We do not want a ton weight of candles if we are only going to sit up for a few minutes. Let us be wise enough to suit the supply to the need.

Is time so short? Then do not let us fret about its troubles and discomforts. A man is on a journey, and puts up at an inn, and when he is fairly in the hostelry, he perceives that it is a poor place, with scant food, and a hard bed. "Well, well," says he, "I am off the first thing to-morrow morning, and so it does not matter." This world is an inn, and if there are certain discomforts in it, let us remember that we are not tenants for years, but only

GUESTS FOR A DAY.

Let us make the best we can of the temporary accommodation which this poor shanty of a world affords. Let us sing together—

"The way may be rough, but it cannot be long;
So let's smooth it with hope, and cheer it with song."

Must life vanish away? We know it must. What then? That vanishing is the end of one life and the beginning of another. Dear friends, may I recommend you to remember that death is the end of this life? Do not leave this life to be ravelled out at the end. I would like to have a well-hemmed life, with a finish about it. I would like to have my life inclosed with a ring-fence of completeness. Too many leave life's business in such a way that they leave endless trouble for their families; lawyers devour their substance, and their children are impoverished. See that your will is made, your debts paid, your charities distributed, and all your affairs are arranged. Set your house in order; it is your duty as a citizen; it is your higher duty as a Christian. Do all that you would like to have done if you knew you would die to-morrow.

Must this life vanish away? Then recollect it is the beginning of another. The life present melts into the life to come. What kind of life will that other be? Do you not think that if it is to be it ought to commence here? Who would like to enter heaven, could it be possible, and feel compelled to say, "I cannot join in the music, for I do not know the tune; I cannot take up the hymn, for I know nothing of the song. I cannot glorify God, for I never did so while below. I cannot adore the Lamb, for I never trusted in Him while I was on earth." You must learn the music here, or you will never sing in the choirs of heaven.

And is death quite sure to come to me? Then, as I cannot avoid it, let me face it. If there were a way of avoiding it, I might postpone all consideration of it; but since I must meet it, let me know what I am at; let me get ready for the inevitable, maybe it will become desirable. The thought of death will be one of two things to us; it will be a ghost to haunt us if we remain out of Christ, unreconciled to God, and unrenewed in heart. But death will become another thing to you if you are renewed in heart. To the Christian it is an angel beckoning him onward and upward. We do not desire to live here always. Why should we? Banished from our God, liable to sin, subject to temptation, vexed with infirmities, struggling with corruptions, O Lord, what wait we for?

"Welcome, sweet hour of full discharge
That sets my longing soul at large,
Takes off my chains, breaks up my cell,
And gives me with my God to dwell!"

Believers have everything to gain by dying. "To die is gain." We shall lose nothing which will be a loss to us. If one should take from us a jewel, but should give us another a thousand times its value, we should not regret the exchange. We lose this life, let it be such a jewel as you like, but we win the life to come, which is infinitely more precious. Beloved, instead of fearing death, we would be willing rather to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better. Why should we be unwilling to be glorified? Our departing day is

OUR MARRIAGE-DAY.

Oh, that the bells would ring it in! It is our home-coming from the school where we have been in training here below. Why are the minutes so slow, the years so long? Let the holidays, the holy days, come soon, when we shall be at home in the Father's house! "It doth not yet appear what we shall be," but it very soon will appear, and it will be no mere appearing—it will be real joy and lasting pleasure, solid, substantial, eternal, like the God who has prepared it for us from of old. It is a blessed thing to be able to go through the world thanking God for this life, but blessing Him yet more that it will land us at His right hand. Death is thus stripped of all dread; the curse is turned into a blessing. At the thought of it I feel ready to join in that rough but sweet verse—

"Since Jesus is mine, I'll not fear undressing,
But gladly put off these garments of clay;
To die in the Lord is a covenant blessing,
Since Jesus to glory through death led the way."

God grant us so to live and die that we may live to die no more, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE CHILCATS OF ALASKA TERRITORY.

So little is known of this strange tribe living on the confines of our land that the following account of them, extracted from an article by the Rev. Sheldon Jackson, D.D., who has labored in mission work among them, will be welcome to our readers:

"At the northern end of the Alexander Archipelago, between latitude 59° and 60°, amid the grandest and wildest scenery on the continent, dwell the Chilcat tribe of south-eastern Alaska. They have three ancient villages on the Chilcat River, the northernmost being Clok-won, containing sixty-five houses and five hundred and fifty-eight inhabitants. This village is situated along rapids of the river, and is supplied with an abundance of fresh fish winter and summer. At this village a branch mission station of the Presbyterian Church has been established, and a log-house and school-room erected.

"A few miles south of Clok-won is Katwaltu, with eleven houses and one hundred and twenty-five inhabitants.

"Twenty miles south of Clok-won at tide-water is Jendestaka, with sixteen houses and one hundred and seventy-one people. A few miles to the eastward of these villages, along the rapids of the Chilcoot River, is Chilcoot, with eight houses and one hundred and twenty-seven inhabitants, and near by the fishing village of Tenany, with two houses and twenty people.

"Altogether the Chilcats number a thousand souls. They are a well-formed, active, healthy race. They are great traders, being the 'middlemen' of their region, carrying the goods of commerce to the interior and exchanging them for furs, which are brought to the coast and in turn exchanged for more merchandise. Their native dress consists of dressed deer-skin, ornamented with fur and sometimes with quill embroidery, and a carved wooden hat. They are skilful carvers in wood, stone, and metals. Their wands or sticks used in sorcery, their ordinary household dishes and boxes, spoons, canes, the posts that support the roof of their houses, and many other things, are elaborately carved with the emblems of their totems or family clans. The women excel in the weaving from grasses and bark beautiful table mats and baskets of a great variety of shape and size. They are also beautiful sewers.

"They occupy large plank houses about fifty feet square. The entrance is a low door, from which steps descend to the floor. Around the four sides of the room are one and sometimes two platforms, which are used for stowing away their boxes and goods, and also sleeping. The platform on one side is curtained off for a sleeping apartment. The fireplace is in the middle of the room. The smoke from the fire curls around the room and then finds exit out of a hole in the roof made for that purpose.

"They have among them four distinct tribal families, named respectively the Cinnamon Bear, the Crows, the Wolves, and the Whales. The Crows and Bears constitute the aristocracy. These totems also exist among the neighboring tribes, much as several secret societies may exist in the same college and each of these have chapters in other colleges. A man and woman of the same totem, although no blood relation, cannot marry. The children belong to the same totem as the mother, so that it often happens in war that fathers and sons are on opposite sides."

Their customs are savage and cruel, and Dr. Jackson cites several instances of their shocking barbarity. He says: "It was our hope to have located the principal mission at the village of Clok-won, where many scenes of bloodshed have been witnessed; but unable to carry the necessary material for the buildings up the shallow river, we built on Portage Bay, and named the new station Haines, after the efficient secretary of the Woman's Executive Committee of

Native Chilcat Dress,

Chilcat School-House and Teacher's Residence, Haines, Alaska.

Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church. From the mission house fifteen glaciers are visible. As the Chilcats come more and more under the influence of the Gospel such bloody scenes as those recorded in their history will cease."

TERRORISM IN EUROPE.

An article under the above title, published in a recent number of the Contemporary Review, calls attention to the dangers which now menace society from the dynamiters. The writer, who appears to be more familiar with Russian affairs than with those of other countries, dwells with considerable force and penetration on the development of the forces which the discontented classes have adopted and are using so freely. To him it appears that the gigantic evil of a despotism such as that of the Russian Czar is a curse which palliates the use of the destructive agent; but that in countries where no such curse exists there is no justification for its use.

If he were to talk to an Irish Invincible, to a Paris Communist, or to the anarchists who meet in Justus Schwab's room in New York, he would speedily discover his mistake. All these men believe that in the countries in which they live there is oppression either of governments, or rings, or monopolies against which it is right and justifiable to adopt warfare of any kind. The arguments used by the writer to prove that when a tyrant has an army too strong to be overcome by his enemies, when warfare open and in due form cannot be waged against him, and it is at the same time a duty to strike him, then that dynamite,

"THE ACCREDITED SYMBOL OF ANARCHY,"

may be used, are precisely the arguments used by dynamiters everywhere. The men who desire to overturn society justify their course in the same way as conspirators do who want to kill a king. It is evident to every close observer of the times that we are on the verge of an outbreak which will shake the world to its centre. It is only necessary, as this writer points out, for the enemies of social order, who now act independently of each other, to organize and act in harmony, to bring to a culmination this world-wide disaffection. Who can consider these facts and at the same time diligently study the inspired prophecies without coming to the conclusion that we are now in those which we are taught that we may recognize by precisely these characteristics. If any are disposed to underrate the danger now menacing the world, let them read the following passage, which forms the opening of the article in the Contemporary Review to which we have referred:

"Time was when dynamite seemed likely to remain the exclusive patrimony of Russian revolutionists—that is to say, of Nihilists — and have no function outside the Muscovite Empire, except the innocent industrial one of exploding mines. But in the last year or two events have occurred, now in one place and now in another, which make this supposition questionable. In France, in Belgium, in Spain, in Italy, and even in England, there have been explosions of dynamite, of which the aim has been by no means industrial. It is true that the crimes committed in Europe have not as yet assumed a serious aspect, owing to the manifest want of organization in their preparation, the inexperience shown in their execution, and the defect of concerted plan by which they are all characterized.

"But may not this aspect of the matter change with time? The first step has been achieved, and it involves much; to the acts mentioned above, the significance of a policy has been imputed; dynamite has become the accredited symbol of anarchy, the banner of the extreme revolutionary party. And for a certain class of minds extreme parties will always have peculiar attractions. Will it not be possible for all revolutionary spirits who have resorted to courses of destruction and violence, to unite themselves under this banner in a single organization of a prudent and far-seeing character, which shall give a terrible concentration to these hitherto disconnected acts?"

EDWARD DAYTON'S ORATORIO.

By Mr. Charles Walton.

(See Illustration.)

Edward Dayton was endued with wonderful musical talents. He was an only son, born in Brooklyn, N. Y., and from his early childhood gave indications of the innate gift lying within him. At the age of seven he was a fair performer on the piano, and when he commenced his experiences of scholastic life he was pronounced by all to be the best player in the school. His whole soul seemed wrapt up in the exquisite art, and every moment of his spare time was given to its attainment. His progression was extraordinary, and at the age of seventeen he was regarded not only as a perfect master of the piano, but very few could equal him on the violin.

Edward was living at home with his parents in one of the broad avenues of New York's twin city; his father was wealthy, being a partner in a well-established Wall Street firm, and consequently was enabled to encourage in every way the talents displayed by his son. His mother, was a confirmed invalid, having been confined to her room for eight years, but possessed that joy and peace in suffering that only Christians can experience. She doted on her boy, and although very proud of his ability, yet her earnest prayer and longing desire was to see Edward converted and brought into the fold of Christ. It had been long decided that Edward should follow the profession for which he evinced such taste, and after leaving school he proceeded to Boston to enter into a course of study at the Conservatory of Music, an institution of which that city is justly proud. While there he made the acquaintance of Miss Mabel Searle, the daughter of one of the professors, an acquaintance which speedily ripened into an attachment and ended in marriage. Mabel was a beautiful girl, and had just entered her eighteenth year; she was an accomplished musician, and possessed a magnificent soprano voice, thus making a befitting companion for the young rising musician. After a severe course of study Edward returned to Brooklyn, bringing with him his bride, and settled down in a comfortable house near the residence of his father.

At that time Mrs. Dayton's one great wish was gratified, and she had reason to pour out her earnest thanks to an all-loving God for answering her prayers. Her son had for some time been under conviction of sin; he knew and realized his lost condition as a sinner before God, and longed to obtain full, free, and glorious salvation through our Lord Jesus Christ. At that time an evangelist from the West was holding revival services at the church where the Dayton family worshipped, and young Dayton and his wife were constant attendants. One evening the Spirit of God came down on the meeting, and they were both led to the altar, humble suppliants for divine mercy and for that new life through faith in Christ. God is always ready to hear the sinner's cry, and they were enabled to return home rejoicing in a risen Saviour and conscious that all their sins were washed away through His blood.

Edward at this time was very anxious to produce a composition of his own, and his long course of study at the Conservatory had fitted him for such an undertaking; the question was as to its character. Beethoven, Handel, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Spohr were his favorite composers, and he considered the productions of those great masters to excel all the operatic music ever written, and his great desire was to be able to produce something approaching Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" in grandeur and Spohr's "Last Judgment" in pathos. He therefore determined to write an oratorio, and chose the beautiful words of the Psalmist of the 103d Psalm for his theme. He entered into his work with great enthusiasm, and in about three months it was completed, and a grand rehearsal was arranged to be held at his house. He had acquired many friends in the profession, including several talented and well-known performers; these had all promised to attend. They were very curious to try the production, knowing as they did that Edward was more than ordinarily gifted. When the eventful evening arrived, expectation was at its height. The piece was rehearsed (see illustration), his wife at the piano and himself as first violin, and at its conclusion all were unanimous in declaring it to be very fine and worthy of the pen of some of our greatest musicians, and congratulations poured in on all sides.

The Rehearsal of Edward Dayton's First Composition.

Edward had one particular friend among the party who was considered one of the best musical critics of the day, and he was consequently very desirous to have his opinion. He had not long to wait, as his friend approached him with outstretched hand, exclaiming, "It is good, very good; but tell me, are you inspired? that solo in B flat; 'The Lord is merciful, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy,' was superb; it seemed as if the angels had composed it. Then the fuge in G sharp, 'For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is His mercy toward them that fear Him,' seemed to tell out in indescribable tones the loving mercy of God; and the grand concluding chorus, 'Bless the Lord, ye His angels,' etc., was such that one imagined the whole of heaven and earth were praising and blessing God."

Edward cordially grasped the extended hand, and replied: "The secret of my inspiration, if such you call it, lies in the fact that when I wrote that oratorio I knew for myself personally that the Lord was gracious and slow to anger, and that His mercies were as high as the heaven is above the earth, and my whole soul could bless and praise the Lord for His goodness to me. Thus was I enabled to combine realization with my poor talent, and bring out the feelings I experienced on the subject, my heart all the time so full of love to God for what He had done for me that I was enabled to enter into the full spirit of the Psalmist's words."

This was the only piece he was permitted to compose; pneumonia did its deadly work shortly afterward, and he passed away with these words on his lips: "Bless the Lord, oh my soul, and all that is within me bless His holy name." He left behind him a sorrowing widow and the universal regret that one so talented and gifted should have been thus taken away. His oratorio was never published, but kept in the family as a memento of a loving son, devoted husband, and earnest Christian.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Secret Blow.

When Robert Waldron asked his father, "What will satisfy you—and God?" he showed plainly the unutterable meanness of his soul. Such men cannot get rid of the idea that they can compound for their sins in some way. They regard every sin as having its price. Wrongdoing they think may be settled for either by some act of self-sacrifice, or the payment of money, or by doing some great work. All men have this idea more or less deeply fixed in their minds. "What shall I do?" is the first question, as a rule, of the awakened sinner realizing for the first time his sinfulness in the sight of God. But sin is a thing so heinous that it cannot so be blotted out. The broken law of God can never be repaired by any act of the sinner. Only by the sacrifice and death of the incarnate God could atonement be made.

Had this dastard of a man, Robert Waldron, realized the sinfulness of the thing he had done—had he realized the consequences of his act, the ruin of his victim, the desolation of the home he had robbed, his whimpering inquiry would never have been uttered. But such men cannot realize the consequences of their acts. Before they sink so low as to commit their sins their whole souls are blunted in their apprehension, and their sense of shame and right is lost.

It is the fashion in society—and ladies are in this respect the chief sinners—to regard a man who has stolen another man's wife as something of a hero, "a dear, dangerous, bewitching man, my dear." He is received into society, welcomed, fêted, and admired, and though his sin is known, it does not operate to his disadvantage. Yet he is the meanest and most contemptible of sinners, a creature despicable and cowardly, who knows well that the social consequences of his sin will fall on his victim while he escapes. Such men God will punish with a terrible punishment. It is doubtful whether Mr. Waldron himself rightly estimated the vileness of his son's sin, but even he was amazed and disgusted to observe that Robert had thought only for himself and wished his wickedness might be forgotten as if it had been some trivial boyish scrape. Such "bygones," as Robert called them, were too serious to be lightly regarded.

Mr. Waldron sighed heavily. This was not the repentance he had looked for, the repentance which was seemly in his son, the repentance of which he had spoken almost vauntingly to his minister. There was a doubt in his mind that Miss Waldron would be no better satisfied with its quality than himself; and Miss Waldron was something like a domestic pope—infallible and autocratic. Robert was settling down again into a quiet and self-sympathizing mood, which could look, over the mist of years, at the other actors in the sad drama of the past.

"Poor Morley!" he said; "what has become of him?"

"He is a ruined man," said his father, sternly; "you should see him to know what you have done. He is ruined in all senses, for I hear that he has no business, and is verging toward bankruptcy."

"We can help him there," exclaimed Robert, with impetuosity; "we must save him from that!"

"John Morley," said Mr. Waldron, dryly, "unless I mistake him greatly, will take no help from our hands. We are not in a position to do him any favor."

It was a point of delicacy which the elder man could comprehend, while the younger could not. There was a vigorous hardness and manhood in Mr. Waldron's nature, which would have rejected indignantly the aid of a dishonored hand; while his son would have seized the meanest help which would deliver him out of present difficulties.

"There was a little girl," said Robert, in a tone of musing.

"Hester," answered Mr. Waldron, "the sweetest girl I have ever seen. She has the face of a saint—an angel, I was going to say. I often watch her as we stand up to sing, and I have sometimes thought how greatly I should have rejoiced had God blessed me with such a daughter. Not but that Miss Waldron is everything a father could wish; I have never found any fault in her. But Hester—she used to come here occasionally—is so sweet and tender and gentle! Ah! John Morley is not altogether lost while he possesses a child like Hester."

"Little Hetty?" said Robert, absently; "I remember her now. And she comes here sometimes?"

"Not while you are here," replied his father; "I shall see her only from my pew; and Miss Waldron will meet her at her classes; that must suffice."

The old man sighed as if over a lost pleasure; but he smiled once more as he looked at the face of his only son. The hard questions he had intended to ask, if there were any more, had slipped out of his mind, and Robert was not one to remind him of them. The evening took again the brightness of its first welcome, and the welcome of the prodigal was not further clouded by ill-timed retrospections.

For a few days Little Aston was busy with the return of Robert Waldron. The old story was raked up and sifted with keen comments and discussions. Already the details of the ancient scandal were almost lost in obscurity; and some persons were not sure that it was merely the step-mother of Hester Morley who had left her husband's house and never been heard of since.

But Robert Waldron, handsome, young, and rich, could not remain under censure. His father had never been a favorite, for he had come among them as a stranger and dissenter, and had held himself aloof from a town in which he had no manner of interest. But the young squire, as Robert was called, had been a boy in their streets, had frequented their shops, and had made boyish acquaintance with many of them. It was natural to him to make himself popular. Besides this, now he was come back after his long absence, he attended the parish church, instead of going to the chapel, to which Miss Waldron's carriage drove every Sunday in irritating pomp. The vicar, with his three elegant and marriageable daughters, welcomed him cordially. The small gentry of the neighborhood paid him homage as the most travelled, the most cultivated, and the most agreeable personage in their narrow world. He was no longer one among the million, as when he was swallowed up in the gulf of London, or in the stream of tourists which flooded the Continent. He found himself the chief man of the place; and he enjoyed the distinction. The woman who had suffered at his hands would have been scouted had she returned, even in penitence.

For a few months the pleasure of being flattered and courted by all about him was sufficient for Robert Waldron; and he gave himself up to it with the zest of one who had for some time been a stranger to such tokens of esteem. But there was a secret fetter chafing him. He could not bear to think that there was one street of the town where he must not set his foot, and one house which he must not pass. There was the galling and bitter feeling of not being free to go where he would. He had his hours of sentimental memory, and moments of regret which would not die, though it slept for long periods; and in both of these moods he longed to see again the house where John Morley dwelt, and from which he had stolen away Rose.

A feverish desire possessed him from time to time to meet John Morley himself, and to judge with his own eyes whether he had wrought so great a wrong to him as his father described. Hester, too, stood before his memory as the grave, fair, pleasant child, of whom he had been so fond, and who had loved him with such childish devotion. The mere fact that he was prohibited from entering the chapel where his father and sister worshipped made it seem the most desirable place to attend; and he chafed every Sunday when they set out to their early service, leaving him behind for the later hours of the church. He grew to listen with morbid attention to the tittle-tattle of chapel affairs which had formerly bored him so much, that he might catch the name of John Morley or Hester—names which stung him with a not altogether unpleasant pain.

It was not in Robert Waldron's nature to resist and master the inclination which had taken possession of him. He had never conquered any caprice. He began to haunt the street stealthily in the long dark nights of winter, after the shutters of the houses were put up, and there was no light except that of the far-apart lamps. It was an old-fashioned street, reminding him of those in foreign towns; and at night, when he was recognized by none, in his great coat buttoned up to the chin, and his felt hat drawn over his face, he came now and then upon the scenes which amused him, and enlivened the dull routine of his country life.

But of the home of John Morley there was nothing to be seen except the dark walls and closed doors and windows. It stood in the darkest part of the street, in the middle distance between two lamps, and never did a single gleam of light appear upon its black front. Sometimes he remained in the doorway of an empty house opposite, smoking his cigar, while he awaited some token of the interior life; but there came none. All was black and still as a grave. It became at length a necessary penance to him to haunt the mournful dwelling, and keep a sentinel's watch upon its doors and windows. He would leave the comfort and repose and shelter of his father's house to march with heavy steps to and fro before this house which he had made desolate, with a vague sense of atoning for his sin by his voluntary exposure to discomfort almost amounting to pain, at the same time that he was satisfying his own capricious curiosity. It was little else than the purposeless disquietude of a purposeless nature.

The habit grew upon him so strongly that when Mr. and Miss Waldron went up to London, upon the re-opening of Parliament, he stayed behind—for a few days only, he said, not caring to confess to himself the whim that bound him to the place. He soon fell into a daily routine, ending every night, when it was darkest, in patrolling the forbidden street, and smoking his cigar under the closed window of the room where Rose had left all the traces of her habitation in that house. The shutters of that window were always closed, but Robert knew nothing of that. He could not run the risk of passing it by daylight.

He was sauntering past the silent house one night, a little later than usual, dreaming vaguely, as he was wont to do, of the life within, with his arms folded, and his head bowed down, when there fell suddenly upon him, how or whence he knew not, a blow which felled him instantly to the ground! He made a faint effort to defend himself and to cry for help; but before he could do either, the blow, savage and revengeful, fell heavily upon his head, and he felt nothing more. He lay motionless and lifeless upon the pavement in the dark corner where John Morley's house stood, and at an hour of the night when there were few passers-by.

When Robert Waldron opened his eyes again, feebly and with pain, he saw only a strange room, dimly lighted by a shaded candle set upon a table at the foot of the bed upon which he was lying. A face he did not know was turned toward him with the evident solicitude of one who was watching for the first sign of returning consciousness. It was the face of a young man of about four and twenty, frank and pleasant, with a professional look upon it that spoke unmistakably of a medical student. A small case of instruments lay upon the bed close to his hand, while his fingers gently pressed Robert Waldron's pulse. He closed his eyes again in a stupor of bewilderment and exhaustion, but in an instant a cup was held to his lips.

"Drink," said an authoritative voice; "it is a cordial that will revive you."

The draught fulfilled its work so well that he reopened his heavy eyelids and gazed vacantly about him. He was lying in bed in a large low chamber which he had certainly never seen before; his head was bound up tightly with fillets of linen, but when he attempted to raise his right hand to feel it, he was compelled to relinquish the effort, with a groan of pain.

"A dislocation of the shoulder," said the stranger, as if replying to a question, "and some heavy contusions about the head; done with a blunt instrument, a poker or large hammer. Do you think you can speak to me now?"

"Yes," answered Robert, faintly.

"You ought not to speak at all," said the young medical man, in a tone of regret; "but I'm only passing through this town, and I must go on in the morning. So we must make the best of our circumstances. Tell me all you can recollect before this blow."

"Where am I?" asked Robert.

"Can't tell you," was the reply; "I found you on the pavement, and I knocked at the nearest door to ask for help. The people here don't know you. Are you a stranger, like myself?"

"Stop a moment, let me think," said Robert.

It seemed an almost insurmountable difficulty to recall the events of the night; but after a while he remembered where he had been standing when the savage and sudden attack was made upon him from behind. He tried to turn his head upon the pillow so as to bring his mouth nearer to the stranger's ear.

"What is their name?" he whispered.

"I don't know," said the stranger; "there is an old man, and a girl—very good-hearted people. They don't know you; so most likely you don't know them."

"Couldn't you find it out?" he asked, feverishly.

"Well, there are some book-shelves yonder," replied his attendant, "and I'll look to please you. But you must keep your strength to tell me what complaint to make at the police-office. You must have been set upon savagely."

"Find out the name," urged Robert, faintly.

His brain ached too much for any clear thought; yet he watched eagerly while the stranger took a book from the shelves upon the wall and brought it to the light. It was bound in crimson morocco, richly embellished, with the edges of the leaves gilded; but upon opening it, it proved to be nothing but an old dog-eared fairy book, with some of the pages torn, and all of them soiled with frequent reading.

"This is odd," said the student; "they must be lavish with their gilding and book-binding here. There is no name in it; but I'll find another. I chose one of the handsomest-looking."

He brought a second volume to the light; a Bible, fastened with silver clasps. He opened the front page, and read in a cautious undertone, with a glance toward the closed door, "Hester Morley, from her loving mother, Rose Morley."

Robert Waldron shut his eyes, and turned his bruised and aching head toward the wall, trying to realize his position; but thought was impossible to him. There was only one thing clear to his mind, that nothing must be found out about him either in the house or the town. He slowly gathered together his strength, and without turning to the medical student, he asked, "Shall I be laid up here long?"

"That depends upon yourself," was the answer; "be calm, and a few days may see you well enough to give your evidence safely. Fret and fume, and you'll have brain fever. In the mean time, what shall I say to the police?"

"Nothing," said Robert.

"Nothing?" repeated the stranger; "you were all but murdered, man! You'll have a near touch yet; I wish I could stop and see you through it."

"Stop!" said Robert; "I'm rich enough to make it worth your while. Say nothing about me in the town, and don't let anybody, doctor or nurse, come near me. I must not be known here. Do you understand? Not a soul must know about this."

He spoke with violent and warning pains in his throbbing temples, but he uttered these sentences emphatically, and with intense anxiety. The young man had leaned over him to catch his labored tones, and continued to look searchingly into his face when he had done. "Ah!" he said, "some mystery, is it? Well, well, I'm willing; so set your mind at ease. You'll have enough to do to keep yourself calm. Neither doctor nor nurse shall come near you, unless there is more danger than I foresee. And your own mother would hardly know you. There—be satisfied. I'll take care of you."

Robert Waldron scarcely heard the end of this speech, for a heavy stupor, whether of sleep or insensibility, crept over him again. There were intervals during the next forty-eight hours in which his mind tried to struggle toward some lucid thought and memory, but all in vain. He had a dim perception of seeing always the same good-tempered, masculine face about him and of hearing the same gruff but not unpleasant accents whenever a voice penetrated to his brain; and he felt himself handled by strong skilful hands. But as to where he was, or who he was, or how he had been brought to this condition, or how long he had been in it, not a single ray of intelligence came across him. With no sensation except that he was all head—and that a bruised and aching head—Robert Waldron lay under John Morley's roof; while the housekeeper at Aston Court ascribed his absence to one of his sudden whims, and his father and sister believed him quietly and safely at home.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

S. S. Lesson for May 4, 1 Cor. 13 : 1-13. Golden Text, Rom. 13 : 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The State of the Corinthian Church—The Gifts of the Spirit—Love Lacking—The Point at Issue—God's Claim on the Body—Love Absolutely Indispensable—The Exhaustless Love—Its Characteristics—Cannot be Provoked—Not Censorious—The Only Infallibility—The Time of Perfecting.

"He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him" (1 John 4 : 16). This is the consummation of Christ's redemption work. But our God must prepare His dwelling-place for Himself; the Corinthian Christians, to whom Paul was writing about divine love, were already saved and sanctified, "But ye are washed, but ye are sanctified, but ye are justified in the name of our Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God" (1 Cor. 6 : 11); and this last clause is evidence that they had received the Holy Ghost. Moreover, they were enriched by the grace of God in Christ Jesus "in all utterance, and in all knowledge . . . so that they came behind in no gift" (1 Cor. 1 : 4-7). By the Spirit was given unto them "the word of wisdom," "the word of knowledge," "faith," "the gifts of healing," "the working of miracles," "prophecy," "discerning of spirits," "kinds of tongues," "the interpretation of tongues" (1 Cor. 12 : 8-10). With this the Spirit of God had given them great liberty, and the church of Corinth was full of life, "When ye come together, every one of you hath a psalm, hath a doctrine, hath a tongue, hath a revelation, hath an interpretation" (1 Cor. 14 : 26). But with all this life they yet self was still uppermost, and another spirit than that of Christ actuated them. The question of condemnation was fully settled; they were sanctified; sin, as far as their consciences recognized it, no longer had dominion; and yet there were contentions among them, yet they were carnal, and walked as men (1 Cor. 1 : 11; 3 : 1-4); they still needed to be reminded that they were not their own masters. The Apostle writes, "Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are" (1 Cor. 3 : 16, 17).

THE POINT AT ISSUE

between them and God was always the same, the possession of their body. God claimed it as His redeemed property; they appropriated it as their own. "Know ye not that your bodies are the members of Christ" (1 Cor. 6 : 15)? "What! knew ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God, and ye are not your own? For ye are bought with a price" (ver. 19, 20). It is this complete surrender, not only of sin, but of ourselves—this complete acceptance of God as our Proprietor—which makes way for God, who is love, to dwell in us. While in any point the will is unsurrendered, this is impossible. But the will surrendered, the whole being yielded up. Then it is not simply that the Holy Ghost is in us or that Christ is in us, but that being rooted and grounded in love we "may be able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with

ALL THE FULNESS OF GOD."

God looks down upon a lost world which has wronged Him, and wounded Him, and beams down love upon His enemies. He seeks to make us all love by filling us with Himself who is love. Looking upon all things from above, from a level which is higher than they, God can afford to love those who do not love Him, if we are one with Him, and all our personal interests are His, and His ours, He gives us to see things from His standpoint, and shine down love upon the unloving and the unlovely.

Paul draws the picture of divine love in the sunlight of God lest any should mistake it. In the first verses of our chapter he shows that all which the Corinthians already possessed fell far short of divine love, and he makes himself personally an example of what he taught, so making himself all things to all men (1 Cor. 9 : 22). "Though I (Paul) speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not love (Greek), I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal." A a voice without a language! God dwelling in His people speaks Christ; unconsciously to them a savor of Christ is left behind them, a presence of God is with them, for which people do not know how to account; they impress people with Him, not with themselves. Paul shows that prophecy, even to the understanding of all mysteries and all knowledge, and even such faith as removes mountains, is nothing without love; that self-denial, which may give away all worldly possessions, and even the very body in martyrdom, cannot serve God's purpose without divine love. He prizes, not the self-devotion which springs from any natural nobility of character in us, and which could attract admiration to us fallen, unworthy creatures, but the abnegation of ourselves to manifest Him, the divine in place of the human, the perfect in place of the imperfect. It is not that we are to make ourselves like Him by our poor puny efforts, but that He takes possession of us, and then lives His life over again in us.

"Love suffereth long and is kind." This is not so with human love; it soon runs out and becomes exhausted. God's love is exhaustless; it cannot be worn out. Thus any love in us which cools under coldness, which is affected by the conduct of those we love, is

NOT DIVINE BUT HUMAN.

Misunderstandings, soreness, wounded feelings cannot manifest themselves in the atmosphere of divine love; all these belong to the human; they are carnal, and occur when we walk as men. Love is out of reach of anything personal, love "envieth not." She is so satisfied with God as her portion, that the gifts of another and the experience of another who belongs to God, is the same to her as though it were her own; it is but another member of the same body. She "vaunteth not herself, is not puffed up" because Christ is Self to her now, and all centres around Him; He occupies the place which self has vacated. She "seeketh not her own," but His own; denying or ignoring herself, she cannot be easily provoked, for all provocation is addressed to self, not to Christ in us. How can that provoke us which we believe to be working together for our good? We know that nothing which occurs can upset God's plans, and as to our own, if He has not formed them, the sooner they are done away with the better. How can we be provoked about that for which we give thanks? "In everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, make your requests known unto God" (Phil. 4 : 6); "giving thanks always, for all things unto God and the Father in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ" (Eph. 5 : 20).

NOT CENSORIOUS.

Love "thinketh no evil." Evil in our own hearts makes us suspicious of others. In order to think evil we must be evil. How often we have heard a person condemning another in the most indignant terms for taking stimulant to excess; it is generally a proof that the condemning party is not an abstainer, and therefore has not clean hands in the matter. Those who speak most strongly about gossip are generally those who are themselves given to it. Those whose hearts are made clean from these things by the blood of Christ, and who are filled with divine love, seek, like their Lord, not to condemn the world, but to save the world. Love under no circumstances rejoices in iniquity. When God revealed to Samuel the defection of King Saul, instead of rejoicing that his own words about Saul had come true, he "cried unto the Lord all night" (1 Sam. 15 : 11). Love rejoices in the truth by whomsoever spoken, by whomsoever lived. Love breaks down all barriers, all denominations, all parties, all nationalities, all castes, and brings everything to a divine level. Love does not choose what she can bear; God is her Strength, and she "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." Looking at man this is impossible; but looking on God's side of every man and every circumstance, love can bear, believe, hope, and endure even against hope. It becomes no longer the question whether there is in a poor fallen one any ground for hope; the question is turned round, "Is there any power left in God? What can the Creator do for him? What can the Redeemer do, who saves unto the uttermost all who come unto God by Him?" It is easy to bear all from man when the Almighty, all-loving, all-redeeming Saviour is seen; easy to hope all and never see the dark side, the side of impossibility; it is easy to believe all things and endure all things in such a light.

Love "never faileth." Love is

THE ONLY INFALLIBILITY.

Prophecies fail. Never, perhaps, was there a time of such universal prophesying as in the present day; never were such numbers engaged in preaching the Gospel. Ministers of all denominations, lay preachers, local preachers, elders, Scripture readers, Bible women, evangelists, male and female, Salvation Army and other army officers—all are preaching; and thank God thousands of souls are brought to Jesus and saved from open sin. But prophecy has failed to produce a Christianity on the level of the Bible; and with all this prophesying infidelity flourishes and superstition, formal religion, and sacerdotalism are fearfully on the increase. Love alone can lift Christianity to its true level, when men of God shall be, as once before, "of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed was his own; but they had all things common; . . . and great grace was upon them all." Prophecies, tongues, knowledge are only means to an end; they shall "fail," "cease," "vanish away." "For we know in part, and we prophesy in part, but when that which is perfect is come (God dwelling in us, and we in God) then that which is in part shall be done away." Paul does not speak of himself as having attained divine love, nor does he four years later in writing to the Philippians (3 : 12-14). He not only says, "We know in part," but "I know in part." Nevertheless he looks upon the Lord's perfecting His work in him as a thing so certain that he adds, "Then shall I know even as also I am known," then shall I see, not "through a glass, darkly," but "face to face." "And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity." Faith brings us in contact with God, hope maintains that contact, but love is God Himself dwelling in us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Another Terrible Massacre has Taken Place in Egypt. News arrived here on Monday that a shipload of fugitives had been sent from Shendy to Berber, owing to scarcity of provisions at Shendy. On the way, the steamer ran aground on a sand-bank near El Baala, and was soon surrounded by swarms of rebels, who attacked the steamer on every side and massacred everybody on board. The fugitives numbered 450, including a portion of the Shendy garrison and many women and children.

An International Conference on the Egyptian Question is among the projects advocated for extricating England from her dilemma. Earl Granville is preparing a circular to the Powers declaring that England is desirous of renewing a definite understanding in regard to Egypt, and of establishing future relations on an international basis. The concord between France and Russia, says Lord Granville, will not permit England to act in contradiction to the protocol of disinterestedness signed at the conference at Constantinople. General Gordon is still at Khartoum surrounded by a hostile army. On April 9th he sent a despatch to the English minister informing him that information had arrived at Khartoum of dissensions in the Mahdi's camp. A merchant who travelled thither from El Obeid reported that the Mahdi in repressing a disturbance among his followers had been attacked by the Tegeba tribes and twice defeated. General Gordon appears to derive encouragement from the news, although it does not reduce his own peril. The forces opposed to him do not acknowledge the Mahdi.

The French Troops have Occupied Hung-Hoa, a town at the apex of the Red River Delta, and the nearest place of importance to the Chinese frontier. The French general bombarded the towns on the road to Hung-Hoa on April 10th, and then advanced toward that place. As he approached, the Chinese fled, carrying off the artillery and destroying the magazine. The zone between Hung-Hoa and the Chinese frontier is now the only part of Tonquin that the French do not hold. They are masters of the entire country south of that place. No formal demands on China appear to have been made as yet, but it is expected that the French will claim a heavy indemnity. The Chinese Government is severely punishing such of its officials as it deems responsible for the situation; some of them have been beheaded and others dismissed from their offices and degraded in rank. This is according to Chinese precedents. Success or failure is the only test applied in China to official service; fidelity passes without notice.

The Dynamite War Material Used in England is, it is now stated, not sent from America but from France. A cable despatch published last week says: "The export of dynamite from the port of Havre to England continues unchecked, as there is no law to prevent it. The dynamite taken to England is conveyed by persons who conceal the explosive between the lining and the cloth of their coats. The dynamite is wrapped in oiled paper in cakes like blacking. The cakes, which are an inch in thickness and five inches in diameter, are left at one place in England, where they are joined into one mass. The dynamiters, however, depend on America for funds to defray the cost of their nefarious enterprise, and the work is done by Irish-Americans.

The Prime Minister of France, M. Ferry, delivered a speech on April 15th, which has caused considerable comment in Europe, where its meaning is regarded as ominous. The true policy of France, said M. Ferry, should be to continue firm and steadfast in her present course. Frequent changes of government were detrimental to her best interests, and would result in leaving the state with no sure basis on which to stand. The present government, he declared, had been more successful than its predecessors in its management of foreign affairs, because it had had the support of Parliament, and had therefore been able to address foreign nations with authority. "The intentions of the government," he said, "are not obscure. Europe knows with whom we consort and with whom we refuse to consort." M. Ferry also said that the government desired a revision of the Constitution, for which he considered the country was now prepared.

Mr. Parnell Denounces the Project for the nationalization of land which is advocated by Mr. Henry George and Mr. Davitt. Drogheda presented him on April 15th with the freedom of the city. In accepting the honor Mr. Parnell said the borough showed a remarkable example of the results attained by the Land League. He afterward addressed a crowd from a window, and congratulated them on the progress which nationalist ideas had made. He expressed the hope that the extension of the franchise would enable them to return members to Parliament who would vindicate their claim to self-government. At a banquet at Drogheda the same evening Mr. Parnell said that the prospects of Ireland were very bright. Referring to nationalization of the land, he again warned his hearers that the subject would cause difficulty and possibly disunion.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley is Preparing to Start on a new expedition in Central Africa. He intends striking northward from the Congo region through unexplored country, hoping to penetrate to the Egyptian stations in the Mombutter country. It was General Gordon's intention to have undertaken this formidable enterprise, but the mission to Khartoum confided to him by the British Government disarranged his plans. His object was to strike an effectual blow at the slave trade by attacking it at its source. Mr. Stanley's object is to solve a problem which to geographers in all lands has long been a mystery. He will doubtless open the way for the mitigation of the horrors of the slave trade.

Several Distinguished American Authors were honored by the University of Edinburgh last week. At the tercentenary of the University, which was celebrated with much enthusiasm, the degree of LL.D. was conferred upon the Hon. James Russell Lowell, our minister to England, Dr. Fordyce Barker, of New York, and Principal Dawson, of Montreal. The degree of D.D. was conferred on Professor William Henry Green, of Princeton. Mr. Lowell's reception by the faculty, the students, and the spectators was extremely flattering. In the course of the speech he delivered, he said: "There is no country in the world that owes so much to literature as Scotland. I bring with me the felicitations of three American universities and their God-speed to the older university here. We feel as strongly as ever that blood is thicker than water. I warmly reciprocate, and feel that I am expressing the feelings of Americans in so doing, the expressions of friendship used at this banquet."

The English Postmaster-General, Professor Fawcett, states that intemperance and gambling are the two great evils he has to contend with in the administration of his department. In the course of a recent speech he said: "My experience is that if it were not for two causes, which seem to me responsible for almost everything that happens wrong in the staff—I mean intemperance and betting—there would practically be no fault whatever to find with any of its members. Nothing connected with my administration of the post-office causes me such sincere regret as when, in consequence of some wrong-doing, I have to sign the dismissal of a person from the service, or when, in some case of graver offence, the party has to be prosecuted. I know what dismissal in too many cases means. I know that it means great suffering to the wife and children, and also that the man generally loses such a position that it is impossible for him in after life to regain it. I am sure it is no exaggeration to say that in cases which lead to either dismissal or breach of discipline, the cause which, in almost every instance, has led to the offence is either intemperance or betting." No lecturing will influence those who have started; the only hope is in warning the young before they make their first bet.

Queen Victoria has Written to the English papers to express her thanks for the sympathy extended to her in her recent bereavement, which, she says, has overwhelmed her with sorrow. Her Majesty, who is now in Germany, where she has gone to take part in some wedding festivities, thus writes: "The appreciation of my beloved son's great qualities of head and heart and the affectionate sympathy of my loyal people, which has never failed me in weal or woe, are very soothing to my heart. Though much shaken and sorely afflicted by many sorrows and trials, I will not lose courage, and with the help of God I will strive to labor for the sake of my children and for the good of the country I love so well. The Duchess of Albany, who bears her loss with touching, unmurmuring resignation, is deeply gratified by the universal expressions of sympathy." The Duchess has been granted a pension of $30,000 a year by Parliament.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have now Removed to the neighborhood of Hampstead, London. The services now completed at Kensington were, as at other places, crowded by people eager to hear the American evangelists, and overflow meetings were held. The railroad companies ran excursion trains daily, which brought large numbers of country people to the services. The local clergymen and lay workers rendered Mr. Moody valuable assistance in the after-meetings. Workingmen attended in large numbers, seats being reserved for them, and at the mid-day meetings the long line of private carriages outside the hall showed that the aristocracy were as anxious as the poor to hear the evangelists.

Mr. R. T. Booth, the Blue Ribbon Temperance orator, while in Tasmania recently, appears to have been as successful in his efforts as he was in the United States, and more lately in Great Britain. He had the honor of pinning the blue on the Bishop of Tasmania, the dean, and a host of clergymen and ministers. The Melbourne campaign was opened on February 19th by Mr. Booth and Mr. Glover. The Western annex of the Exhibition Building has been hired at $675 per week. The city and suburbs have been mapped out and visited. On the opening night the choir nuumbered about 130 and the audience 6000.

"Thy Healer." A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter whose expositions of the International Sunday-school lessons are published every week in this journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

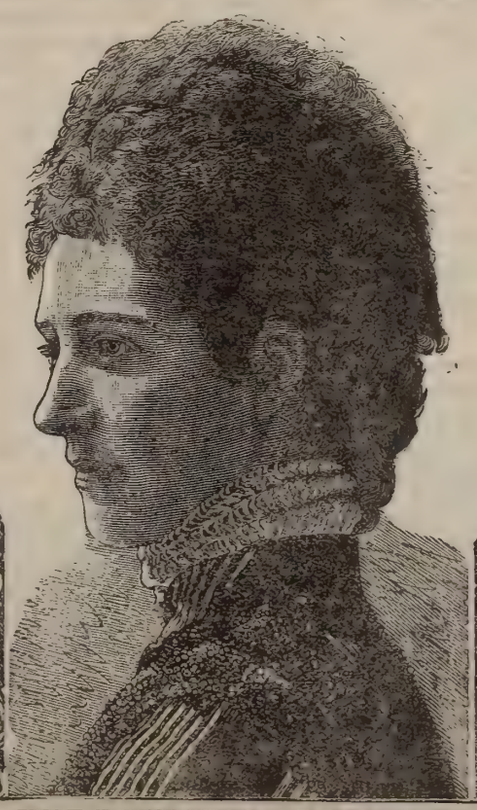
THE LATE PRINCE ALBERT AND THE HYDE PARK EXHIBITION OF 1851.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.



THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

THE ROYAL FAMILY OF GREAT BRITAIN.

THE death of Prince Leopold, Duke of Albany, on March 28th, having directed public attention to the royal family of Great Britain to an unusual degree, our readers may be interested in learning a few details respecting other members of that family of which the late Prince, whose name has occupied so prominent a place in the newspapers, was a member. We accordingly give this week a portrait of the Prince of Wales, the eldest son of Queen Victoria, who is the heir-apparent to the British throne; of his wife, the Princess of Wales, and of his brother, the Duke of Edinburgh. With these is a vignette of Prince Albert, the late husband of Queen Victoria.

A portrait of the late Duke of Albany and a sketch of his life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 18, 1882.

PRINCE ALBERT.

FRANCIS AUGUSTUS ALBERT EMMANUEL the late Consort of Queen Victoria, was born at his father's summer residence, The Rosenau, near Coburg, on August 26th, 1819, three months and two days after the birth of his future wife. (The section of our frontispiece on the left of the Prince's portrait represents The Rosenau.)

In 1836 the Princess (now Queen) Victoria stood next in succession to the throne of England, and her guardian, Leopold, King of the Belgians, began to consider about a match for the future sovereign of England, and took counsel with his friend and former physician, Baron Stockmar, who lived at Coburg, and who was well acquainted with Ernest, Duke of Coburg, and his family. The Baron suggested that the Duchess of Kent should invite her kinsman, Duke Ernest and his sons to England.

On October 10th, 1839, Prince Albert arrived with his brother at Windsor Castle, and urged his suit successfully. On the 14th of the same month the Queen announced to Lord Melbourne, the then Prime Minister of England and a valued personal friend of the Queen, her intention to marry the Prince, and wrote to the same effect to King Leopold, who was delighted at the success of his long-cherished scheme.

MARRIAGE AND NATURALIZATION.

The marriage of the Queen and Prince took place at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, February 10th, 1840, and the bride subsequently conferred various honors and gifts upon the fortunate bridegroom. He was naturalized, and the title of Royal Highness bestowed on him; he was made a Knight of the Garter, of the Bath, and of St. Patrick, and a Privy Councillor, with the lucrative sinecures of field-marshal and several full colonelcies, beside a farm at Windsor. It was settled that the Prince should rank next to the Queen; but it was not till 1857 that the title of Prince Consort was formally conferred upon him.

EFFORTS FOR SOCIAL PROGRESS.

The Prince took an active part in movements relating to social progress, delivering addresses; and, as is well known, the Exhibition of 1851, in Hyde Park, London, was the result of his suggestions. This structure was subsequently removed to Sydenham, where it now stands, affording recreation and instruction to thousands every year. (A picture of the Crystal Palace, as it is now called, forms the background of the portrait.)

HOME LIFE.

Prince Albert's home life was a model of morality and domestic happiness. As a husband and father he was universally esteemed. He took a daily and hourly interest in the education of his sons and daughters, and was, in fact, their chief instructor, spending some hours every day in superintending their instruction. The Bible was his companion in his student days and was his daily rule of life when he became the husband of the Queen. The Prince was very kind to the tenants at Balmoral and his other estates, and was careful in providing for the wants of the poor.

The Prince, however, was less happy in his political influence. His early life having been spent in a petty German court, he took with him into his new sphere, ideas antagonistic to the British Constitution. He was jealous of the prerogatives of the Sovereign, and incited the Queen to resist the gradual progress and development of those principles of government by the people, which are the basis of true national progress. Happily for the country, the popular leaders were men of tact and wisdom, and they neutralized the mischievous influence of the Prince. The Queen was induced to submit herself to the will of her constitutional advisers and to refrain from attempting to thwart the will of the people.

The struggle at the commencement of the Prince's married life was obstinate, but it soon became clear that if the Queen followed his advice and attempted to exercise rights which really belonged to her under the constitution, of which the monarch had never been deprived, there would be trouble. The power of Parliament had been steadily growing for more than two centuries; the Cabinet, which existed by the will of Parliament, shaped the policy of the nation, and the monarch had been gradually sinking into the position of a social figure-head. The Prince's effort to make the Queen such a potent factor in the Constitution as her ancestors had been, was an attempt to turn back the hands on the horologe of progress, and was strenuously and successfully opposed. His dull and obstinate German disposition was at length overcome, and he learned, not without many humiliations, that the sphere of his duties to which he was expected to confine himself was the domestic and social one. Accordingly he spent his time chiefly in attending to model farms, breeding prize cattle, acquiring a large fortune, talking social science to learned bodies, and generally abstaining from meddling in politics. That course was harmless and respectable, and the English people began to think better of him.

In the fall of 1861 he was prostrated by typhoid fever, and though he was tenderly nursed and the most eminent physicians of the day gave him constant attention, he died December 14th, 1861. The Queen mourned his loss bitterly. She retired from public life, and has never since regained the cheerfulness and energy necessary to resume her former position in society.

THE PRINCE OF WALES.

ALBERT EDWARD, Prince of Wales, the eldest son of the Queen and the heir-apparent to the throne, was born at Buckingham Palace, London, November 9th, 1841, and is now in his forty-third year. According to the practice which has prevailed for more than five hundred years he was created Prince of Wales about three weeks after his birth. He is also, by inheritance, the Duke of Cornwall, which Duchy yields him an annual revenue of over $300,000.

While his early education was carefully conducted by tutors, his father, the late Prince Consort, may be said to have been his chief instructor until he went to college. His education was completed at Edinburgh, Oxford, and Cambridge.

HIS TRAVELS.

Perhaps the most interesting feature in the more public life of the Prince of Wales has been his travels to various parts of the world. When he was little more than a youth, he began his travels by going on a tour through Germany and Switzerland; after this he visited Ireland, where he became exceedingly popular among all classes of society.

He next visited Germany, and afterward Rome. Canada was visited in 1860, and there his reception was most loyal and cordial. In fact the Canadians were at a loss for expressions of loyalty strong and deep enough to convey their joy in having their Queen's son among them. From Canada the Prince travelled to the United States, and in New York and other great centres of influence received a hearty welcome becoming to the position the young man occupied as the future head of a nation allied to us by blood and language. These visits were made during vacation time, and as a relief from his studies at Cambridge, whither he returned when term began.

MEETING PRINCESS ALEXANDRA.

While upon one of these tours he paid a visit which was to have an important bearing upon his future life. He was returning to England from Belgium, when he met, for the first time, the Princess Alexandra of Denmark. He was precluded by law from marrying any one but a royal lady, and also from marrying a Roman Catholic. Hence the circle of his choice was limited to a very few ladies, among whom the daughters of the King of Denmark were the most prominent. The interview resulted in a mutual feeling of affection. They were married on March 10th, 1863, the ceremony being one of the utmost magnificence. Its issue has been three sons and three daughters, the youngest son dying in infancy.

Perhaps no event in the history of the Prince of Wales showed more clearly the high place he occupied in the nation's interest than his dangerous illness toward the close of the year 1871, when he was afflicted with typhoid fever, and for some weeks it was feared that he would die. The Prince was at that time residing at Sandringham, in Norfolk, and telegrams were despatched several times a day and published in every city and town in the kingdom, giving particulars of his condition. These were for some time read with the gravest anxiety, and special prayers were offered, in places of worship generally, that, if consistent with the will of the All-wise, his life might be spared. At last, to the relief of the nation, the Prince was pronounced to be out of danger, and eventually, on February 27th, 1872, the Queen and her son went to St. Paul's Cathedral, publicly to return thanks for his restoration to health.

In 1875 the Prince visited India and made a royal progress through that wonderful country. A series of brilliant receptions were held in his honor, and the native princes vied with each other in entertaining him and loading him with costly presents.

The Prince is a man of the most genial disposition. He is remarkable for his affability and friendliness. He has a wonderful memory, and, it is stated, never forgets the face and name of any one he has once seen. Some very remarkable anecdotes are told of his power in this respect. The better class of English people, however, see with deep regret that his moral life is not so pure as that of his father. The temptations incidental to his position and his own easy disposition led to his falling an easy prey to vice. Of late years, especially since his illness, there have been welcome intimations made from time to time of an improvement in this matter. It may be hoped they are true, for the English aristocracy are much influenced by the example of the monarch, and such a court as that over which George IV. presided might seriously lower the standard of morality in all ranks of society.

THE PRINCESS OF WALES.

THE good and charming lady whose portrait accompanies that of her husband on the frontispiece has won the hearts of the English people by her grace, amiability, sweet patience, and general loveliness of character. She is now in her fortieth year, having been born in the Royal Palace at Copenhagen, on December 1st, 1844. The early years of the Princess Alexandra were spent at the palace situated in the street called Amaliegade, in Copenhagen. This has been the town residence of her parents ever since the day of their marriage, and all their children were born and educated here. It has been the home of a most exemplary and happy family, and is full of sweet remembrances to the Princess of Wales.

EARLY DAYS AND COURTSHIP.

Those who had the happiness of knowing the Princess in the days of her girlhood describe her as characterized by pure and refined tastes, and giving evidence of fine mental abilities; but they refer especially to the sweetness of her disposition, and to her early popularity in her native land, where she laid aside the hauteur royal personages generally have, and mixed freely with the people. The announcement of her betrothal to the Prince of Wales caused a general interest to be felt in England toward her, and when the people learned how noble and lovable and virtuous she was, they hailed the proposed union with pleasure.

LEAVES DENMARK.

The announcement in Copenhagen, toward the close of February, 1863, that the Princess Alexandra was about to quit the home of her early years, was the signal for public demonstrations in her honor, which sufficiently testified to the high esteem in which she was held. She was accompanied on her journey to England by her parents and her eldest brother, and attended by a numerous suite. The welcome she received on her arrival was enthusiastic, and her beauty, grace, and dignity were the subject of public congratulation.

The marriage took place on March 10th, 1863. From that time until the present the Princess has been growing in public esteem. She has been a devoted wife and mother, and in both capacities has displayed those sweet womanly qualities which good people always appreciate. Her position has been one of extreme delicacy, the Prince being surrounded by vicious and dissolute men, to whom he has extended the hospitalities of his house. Nevertheless, the tongue of scandal which has been so busy with her husband's name has never uttered a whisper against hers. During his illness her devotion to him was constant; she watched continually at his bedside, and the only time she left the house during those long weeks of anxiety was when the congregation at the village church was praying for the Prince's recovery, and she went to join in their prayers. There is in all England to-day no more popular lady than Alexandra, Princess of Wales.

THE DUKE OF EDINBURGH.

THE second son of Queen Victoria, Prince Alfred Ernest Albert, who was on his majority created Duke of Edinburgh, is now in his fortieth year, having been born at Windsor Castle, August 6th, 1844. In his boyhood he displayed much more vigor than his eldest brother, and needed a more stringent control. When twelve years of age he was placed under the care of a major in the army, who from that time directed his education. Under the major's care he travelled extensively on the Continent of Europe, visiting and residing for some time at various European cities. He thus became an accomplished linguist. He also developed a taste for music, which he assiduously cultivated, attaining considerable proficiency.

Having chosen the sea as his profession, he underwent a thorough course of preparatory study, and passed his examination with credit. He entered the naval service as a cadet, and took his share of duty with his comrades, disdaining to accept any favor offered him in consequence of his royal birth. The captains under whom he served testify that he was always respectful and attentive to the duties of his position. He served on board the Euryalus, and visited many of the Mediterranean ports during his first voyages of 1858-61.

In December, 1862, he

which was offered to him, and which was subsequently offered to and accepted by the present King, who is a brother of the Princess of Wales.

On the Prince attaining his majority the Parliament granted him a yearly salary of $75,000, which was increased to $125,000 on his marriage. He was made Duke of Edinburgh, Earl of Kent, and Earl of Ulster on May 24th, 1866, and took his seat in the House of Lords on June 8th. Early in 1867 the Duke was appointed to the command of the Galatea, which sailed from Plymouth on February 26th. Since then he has visited nearly every country in the world, proceeding first to Australia, where he met with a most enthusiastic reception on the part of the inhabitants, and great indignation was felt at the attempt of an Irishman, named O'Farrell, to assassinate the Prince at a picnic held at Clontarf, near Port Jackson, New South Wales, on March 12th, 1868. The Prince, however, was only slightly wounded by a pistol shot in the back. O'Farrell was tried, found guilty, and executed on April 21st. His Royal Highness subsequently visited Japan, China, and India.

His marriage to the Grand Duchess Marie, only daughter of Alexander II., the late Emperor of Russia, and sister of the present Czar, was celebrated with great pomp at St. Petersburg, on January 23d, 1874; and three months later the Duke and Duchess made a public entry into London amid much popular enthusiasm. The marriage was arranged with some difficulty, owing to the intense pride and arrogance of the Russian Imperial family. The Princess Marie inherited her full share of those qualities, and made an unwise display of them soon after her arrival. She desired a recognition of her rank as the daughter of the Emperor of Russia, which she considered entitled her to precedence over the Princess of Wales in court ceremonies. It was, of course, refused her, and the Princess Marie displayed so much temper about it that she earned for herself the soubriquet of "the Little Russian Bear."

The Duke is a man of considerable personal courage, and has on more than one occasion displayed reckless daring in the course of his naval duties. He is also humane, though not as generous as sailors usually are. During the famine in Ireland two years ago he exerted himself in among the poor, and when the American contribution was sent over, he went in the ship under his command and assisted in carrying the provisions along the coast.

Neither the Duke nor his wife are so popular in England as other members of the Royal Family.

A NEW DANGER TO EUROPE.

Increased French Preparations for War.

THE prophecy that France is to be healed of its deadly Sedan wound (Rev. 13 : 3), and to form a confederacy of ten nations—the ten-horned wild beast (Dan. 7 : 24)—after defeating Germany in a future war of giants, seems daily to be approaching nearer.

The French Parliament, in session on April 8th, passed a new law that every Frenchman shall undergo military service in the army for three years, without exception, save that of physical or mental incapacity. Hitherto, a conscript has served, nominally, three years in barrack life and two in the reserve; while, as a matter of fact, he has frequently been sent home on furlough before the term was completed. But a considerable number of exemptions were permitted, and what we may call the professional classes were allowed to pass out of the ranks at the expiration of one year. The earliest inroad upon these privileges was made two years ago, when teachers in elementary schools and the pupils at clerical seminaries were brought under the condition of those who were taken for twelve months. Now, however, it is proposed to apply rigorously the principle laid down in 1872, when it was enacted that "every Frenchman, not declared unfit for military service, may be called upon, from the age of twenty to that of forty years, to enter the active army or the reserves."

Under this system of almost universal conscription France obtained, in round numbers, control over who, if emergency required, might be summoned to arms. It should be remembered that, in France, as in other countries, the actual standing army, in any one year of peace, is only one sixth of the aggregate on paper. The French Budget of 1884 provided for, all services included, five hundred and eighteen thousand six hundred and forty-two (518,642) men, and one hundred and thirty thousand one hundred and forty-six horses, or nearly seventy thousand more than the army of Germany on a peace footing. But the new law of recruitment will materially augment the entire force of drilled Frenchmen who will be at the mercy of the politicians.

Every nation must be the best judge of its own needs—or, at least, has the full right so to regard itself. No one will contend that the French are not entitled to levy, train, equip, and furnish big armies—if they think it expedient. Nevertheless, all other peoples are deeply interested in such changes as that now proposed by General Campenon, since the very measure may be looked on as

A SYMPTOM AND A WARNING.

What does he want? He desires to sweep into the army the whole body of young men who, from inclination or position, intend to follow an intellectual or an industrial career—at the Bar, in the Church, in the colleges, in literature or art, as manufacturers, bankers, merchants, and in other ways.

As a political portent, what does it mean? A Frenchman, M. Francis Charmes, in the Journal des Débats, has the courage to say that "the Republic is preparing a dragon's crop of armed men, which will some day be let loose on Europe to avenge the disaster of Sedan, and to realize again the dream of military glory which has always been the bane of France." It is a gloomy forecast, yet one which, judging from the pages of history, cannot be disregarded. General Campenon wishes to create the most effective army he can; M. Charmes looks to the probable uses to which, following precedents, the army will be put; bearing in mind, doubtless, that the general is of Gambetta's school, wherein

THE IDEAS OF REVENGE PREVAIL.

He may be right in a prediction which does not in the least detract from its patriotism; but Europe will also be bound to take note of the visible surging up of French ambition, so markedly Monarchical, Imperial, and Republican.

The indications afforded by the proposed law do not chime in harmoniously with the talk of disarmament, so often heard, but so little heeded, nor with the great efforts made by Prince Bismarck to preserve the general peace. Disarmament is not practicable. It was not under the old plan of voluntary enlistment, and is less so now than ever. The kings could not trust each other then; the nations, and their rulers of different kinds, cannot place confidence in each other now. Even, however, if disarmament had been practicable yesterday, it would not be to-day.

THE ALLIED PEACE LEAGUE

of Germany, Austria, Russia, Italy, as it has been facetiously called, consists of States not wanting in a love of self-preservation, and the statesmen and soldiers who sway their policies will not ignore the evident revival of French military spirit. The proposed increase of the French army in 1872 was met by threats from Germany, and the same thing may happen now, and thus bring the probabilities of war closer than they are. In any case will more than ever deserve that very suggestive title, when all the best, brightest, and most physically powerful among the French youth are caught up and fashioned by the drill-sergeant. That the vast preparations of France look to far more than self-defence, few will have the hardihood to deny. Whatever may be the motives for the project or the designs cherished in the French capital, Europe will not fail to note the fresh sign of danger in an already overcharged sky.

THE ARMED CAMP, CALLED THE CONTINENT,

SPIRITUALISM AN IMPOSTURE.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, April 27, 1884.

"There shall not be found among you any consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, for all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord."—DEUT. 18 : 10–12.

WE are surrounded by mystery. Before us, behind us, to the right of us, to the left of us, mystery. There is a vast realm unexplored that science, I have no doubt, will yet map out. He who explores that realm will do the world more service than did ever a Columbus or an Amerigo Vespuici. There are so many things that cannot be accounted for, so many sounds and appearances which defy acoustics and investigation, so many things approximating to the spectral, so many effects which do not seem to have a sufficient cause. The wall between the spiritual and the material is

A VERY THIN WALL.

That there are communications between this world and the next world there can be no doubt, the spirits of our departed going from this world to that, and, according to the Bible, ministering spirits coming from that to this. I do not know but that some time there may be complete and constant and unmistakable lines of communication opened between this world and the next.

To unlatch the door between the present state and the future state all the fingers of superstition have been busy. We have books entitled "Footfalls on the Boundaries of Other Worlds;" "The Debatable Land Between this World and the Next;" "Researches Into the Phenomena of Spiritualism," and whole libraries of hocus-pocus, enough to deceive the very elect. I shall not take time this morning to rehearse the history of divination, Delphic Oracle, sybil, or palmistry, or the whole centuries of imposture.

proposes to open the door between this world and the next, and put us into communication with the dead. It has never yet offered one reasonable credential. There is nothing in the intelligence or the character of the founders of Spiritualism to commend it. All the wonderful things performed by Spiritualism have been performed by sleight-of-hand and rank deception. Dr. Carpenter, Robert Horden, Mr. Waite and others have exposed the fraud by dramatizing in the presence of audiences the very things that Spiritualism proposes to do or says it has done. In the New York Independent there was an account of a challenge given by a non-Spiritualist to a Spiritualist to meet him on the platform of Tremont Temple, Boston. The non-Spiritualist declared that he would by sleight-of-hand perform all the feats executed by the Spiritualist. They met in the presence of an audience. The Spiritualist went through his wonderful performances, and the other man by sleight-of-hand did the same things.

"By their fruits ye shall know them," is the test that Christ gave, and by that test I conclude that the tree of Spiritualism which yields bad fruit, and bad fruit continually, is one of the worst trees in all the orchard of necromancy. The post-office which it has established between the next world and this is another Star Route post-office kept up at vast expense without ever having delivered one letter from the other world to this. In our times, Spiritualism proposes a materialization.

I hold in my hand a specimen of

SPIRITUALISTIC PHOTOGRAPHY

—Spiritualists bringing up the dead, and then clothing them in bodies somewhat similar to the bodies they once had but somewhat shadowy. Here are photographs. This, of an editor who calls back a dead editress. She comes clothed in materialization, her cheek against his forehead. The picture of the living and the picture of the dead. And all these pictures. One I cannot show you, for it is of Christ. Men have rushed in, as one man from this church went behind the scenes, and he found the masks and the false hair and all the apparatus for building up a body. In all cases a swindle.

The first leading remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is that it is

A VERY OLD DOCTRINE.

Do you want to know the origin and the history of that which has captured so many in all our towns and cities, a doctrine with which some of you are tinged? Spiritualism in America was born in 1847, in Hydesville, Wayne County, New York, where one night there was a rapping at the door of Michael Weekman, and a second rapping at the door, and a third rapping at the door, and every time the door was opened there was no one there. Proof positive that they were invisible knuckles that rapped at the door. In that same house there was a man who felt a cold hand pass over his forehead, and there was no arm attached to the hand. Proof positive it was spiritualistic influence.

After a while, Mr. Fox with his family moved into that house, and then they had bangings at the door every night. One night Mr. Fox cried out, "Are you a spirit?" Two raps—answer in the affirmative. "Are you an injured spirit?" Two raps—answer in the affirmative. Then they knew right away that it was the spirit of a peddler who had been murdered in that house years before, and who had been robbed of his $500. Whether the spirit of the peddler came back to collect his $500 or his bones I do not know. But from that time on there was a constant excitement around the premises, and the excitement spread all over the land. All these are matters of history. People said: "Well, now, we have a new religion." Ah! it is

NOT A NEW RELIGION.

In all ages there have been necromancers, those who consulted with the spirits of the departed—charmers who threw people into a mesmeric state, sorcerers who by eating poisonous herbs can see everything, hear everything, and tell everything, astrologers who found out a new dispensation of the stars, experts in palmistry who can tell by the lines in the palm of your hand your origin, your history and your destiny. From the cavern on Mount Parnassus it is said there came up an atmosphere that intoxicated the sheep and the goats that came near by, and under its influence the shepherds were lifted into exaltation so they could foretell future events and consult with familiar spirits. Long before the time of Christ the Brahmins had all the table rocking and the table quaking.

You want to know

WHAT GOD THINKS

of all these things. He says in one place, "I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers." He says in another place: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." And lest you should make too wide a margin between Spiritualism and witchcraft, He groups them together in the text and says: "There shall not be found among you any consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, for all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord." And then the still more remarkable passage which says: "The soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits, and after wizards, to go a whoring after them, I will even set my face against that soul, and will cut him off from among his people;" and a score of passages showing that God never speaks of these evils in any other way than with living thunders of indignation. After all that, be a Spiritualist if you dare!

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is, that, it takes advantage of people when they are weak and morbid with trouble. We lose a friend. The house is dark, the world is dark, the future seems dark. If we had in our rebellion and in our weakness the power to marshal a host and recapture our loved one from the next world, we would marshal the host. Oh how

WE LONG TO SPEAK WITH THE DEAD!

Spiritualism comes in at that moment, when we are all worn out, perhaps by six weeks' or two months' watching, all worn out body, mind and soul, and says, "now, I will open the door, you shall hear the voices; take your place around the table; all be quiet now." Five minutes pass along; no response from the next world. Ten minutes, fifteen minutes, twenty minutes. Nervous system all the time more and more agitated. Thirty minutes; no response from the next world. Forty minutes pass, and the table begins to shiver. Then the medium sits down, his hand twitching, and the pen and the ink and the paper having been provided he writes out the message from the next world.

What is remarkable that these spirits after being in the illumination of heaven, some of them for years, forget how to spell right. People who were excellent grammarians come back and with their first sentence smash all the laws of English grammar! I received such a letter. I happened to know the man that signed it. It was a miserably spelled letter. I sent it back with the remark, "you just send word to those spirits they had better go to school and study orthography." It comes in time of weakness and overthrows the soul. Now, just think of spirits enthroned in heaven coming down to crawl under a table, and break crockery, and ring the bell before supper is ready, and rattle the shutters on a gusty night. What consolation in such miserable stuff as compared with the consolation of our departed friends free from toil and sin and pain are forever happy, and that we will join them, not in mysterious and half utterance which makes the hair stand on end and makes cold chills creep the back, but in a reunion most blessed and happy and glorious.

"And none shall murmur or misdoubt
When God's great sunrise finds us out."

Oh, I hate Spiritualism because it takes advantage of people when they are weak and worn out and morbid under the bereavements and sorrows of this life.

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is, that it is AN AFFAIR OF THE NIGHT.

The Davenports, the Foxes, the Fowlers, and all the mediums prefer the night, or, if it is in the daytime, a darkened room. Why? Because deception is more successful in the night. Some of the things done in Spiritualism are not frauds but are to be ascribed to some occult law of nature which will after a while be demonstrated; but nine hundred and ninety-nine out of a thousand of their feats are arrant and unmitigated humbug.

I suppose almost every one sometimes has been touched by some hallucination. Indigestion from a late supper generally accounts for it. If you will only take in generous proportions at eleven o'clock at night, lobster salad and mince-pie and ice cream and lemonade and a little cocoanut, you will be able to see fifty materialized spirits! All the mediums of the past did their work in the night. Witch of Endor held her séance in the night. Deeds of darkness. Away with this religion of spooks.

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is that it

RUINS THE PHYSICAL HEALTH.

Look in upon an audience of Spiritualists. Cadaverous, pale, worn out, exhausted. Hands cold and clammy. Nothing prospers but long hair—soft marshes yielding rank grass. Something startling going through that room, clothed in white. Table fidgety as though to get its feet loose and dance. Voices sepulchral. Rappings mysterious. I never knew a confirmed Spiritualist who had a healthy nervous organization. It is the first stages of epilepsy or catalepsy. I have noticed that people who hear a great many rappings from the next world have not much strength to endure the hard raps of this.

What a sin it is for you, my brother, to be trifling with your nervous system. Get your nervous system out of tune and the whole universe is out of tune as far as you are concerned. Better tamper with the chemist's retort that may smite you dead, or with the engineer's steam-boiler that may blow you to atoms, than trifle with your nerves. You can live without eyes, and with one lung and with no hands and no feet. Be happy as men have been happy in such misfortune; but alas! if your nervous system is gone.

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is that it is

A MARITAL AND SOCIAL CURSE.

Deeds of darkness and orgies of obscenity have transpired under its wing. I cannot tell you the story. I will not pollute my tongue or your ears with the recital. Enough to know that the criminal courts have often been called to stop the criminality. How many families have been broken up here in Brooklyn and throughout the United States! Women by the hundreds have by Spiritualism been pushed off into a life of profligacy. It employs all that phraseology about "spiritual affinities," and "affinital relation," and "spiritual matches," and the whole vocabulary of free love. It is at war with the marriage relation. I read you from one of their prominent papers where it says: "Marriage is the monster curse of civilization." The Spiritualist paper goes on to say: "Marriage controls education, is the fountain of selfishness, the cause of intemperance and debauchery, the source and aggravation of poverty, the prolific mother of disease and crime. The society we want is men and women living in freedom, sustaining themselves by their own industry, dealing with each other in equity, respecting each other's sovereignty and governed by their attractions."

If Spiritualism had full swing it would turn this world into a pandemonium of carnality. It is an unclean and an adulterous religion, and the sooner it goes down to the pit from which it came up, the better for earth and heaven. For the sake of man's honor and woman's purity, let it perish. I wish I could gather up all the raps it has ever heard from spirits blest or damned on its own head in one thundering rap of annihilation.

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is that it PRODUCES INSANITY.

There is not an asylum from Bangor to San Francisco where there are not the torn and bleeding victims of Spiritualism. You go into an asylum and say: "What is the matter with this man?" The doctors will tell you again and again, "Spiritualism demented him." "What is the matter with this woman?" The doctors will tell you: "Spiritualism demented her." They have been carried off into mental midnight—senators, judges of courts—and at one time they came near capturing a President of the United States. At Flushing, Long Island, there was a happy home. The father became infatuated with Spiritualism, forsook his home, took the $15,000, the only $15,000 he had, surrendered them to a New York medium, three times attempted to take his own life, and then was sent to the State lunatic asylum. You put your hand in the hand of this influence and it will lead you down to darkness, eternal darkness where Spiritualism holds an everlasting séance.

You remember

started from Europe for America. After it had been out long enough to get to the middle of the ocean, the machinery broke, and for days and weeks the steamer Atlantic tossed about in the waves. Well, there were many friends of passengers in these cities and they said, "that vessel has gone down; it is a month since she was due; that vessel must have sunk." There were wives who went to spiritual mediums to learn the fate of that vessel. The spirits were gathered around the table and they said that vessel had gone to the bottom with all on board. Some of those women went to the insane asylum and passed the rest of their lives. But one day, off Quarantine, a gun was heard. Flags went up on all the shipping, bells of New York and Brooklyn were rung, newsboys ran through the streets shouting: "Extra! The Atlantic safe!" The vessel came to wharf, and there was embracing of long-absent ones; but some of these men went up to the insane asylums to find their wives incarcerated by this foul cheat of hell, Spiritualism.

What did Judge Edmonds say in Broadway Tabernacle, New York, while making argument in behalf of Spiritualism, himself having been fully captured. What did Judge Edmonds say? He admitted this: "There is a fascination about consultation with the spirits of the dead that has a tendency to lead people off from their right judgment and to instil into them a fanaticism that is revolting to the natural mind."

Spiritualism not only ruins its disciples but it

RUINS ITS MEDIUMS.

No sooner had the Gadarean swine on the banks of Galilee become spiritual mediums than they went down in an avalanche of pork to the consternation of all the herdsmen. Spiritualism bad for a man, bad for a woman, bad for a beast.

Another remark I have to make in regard to Spiritualism is, that it

RUINS THE SOUL.

It first makes a man quarter of an infidel, then it makes him half an infidel, then it makes him a full infidel. The whole system is built on the insufficiency of the Bible as a revelation. If God is ever struck square in the face it is when men sit at a table, put their hands on the table and practically say: "come, you spirits of the departed, and make a revelation in regard to the future world which the Bible has not made. Come father, come mother, companion in life, my children, come, tell me something about that future world which the Bible is not able to tell me. Although the Bible says he that adds a word to it shall be found a liar, men are all the time getting these revelations, or trying to get them from the next world. You will either, my brother, my sister, you will either have to give up the Bible or give up Spiritualism. No one ever for a very great length of time kept both of them.

I received a letter yesterday from a gentleman saying he was a Christian and a Spiritualist, and that he had been brought up under the excellent teaching of Theodore Parker, of Boston. Theodore Parker a worse infidel than Tom Paine because Tom Paine never pretended to be anything but an infidel. I can understand how a man brought up under Theodore Parker can believe Spiritualism or anything else. You will either have to give up Spiritualism or you will have to give up the Bible.

How do I know that Spiritualism is antagonistic to the Christian religion? I know it by the fact that Spiritualists call up the spirits of those who believed in the Christian religion here, but coming now from the next world, denounce it. They call up for instance, as I have evidence to show, Lorenzo Dow, the evangelist. What does he do? Coming at their call he denounces all Christians as idolaters. They call up Tom Paine. He says he is stopping at the same house with John Bunyan! They call up John Wesley who denounces Christianity, coming from the spiritual world, although all his life he so gloriously preached it. Andrew Jackson Davis, the chief of their apostles, says that the New Testament is a dismal echo of a barbaric age. In another place he says the Bible is a pen-and-ink relic of Christianity. I have in my house a book used in Spiritualistic service in this city years ago. It contains and a hymn book. The catechism has these questions and answers:

"Q. What is our chief baptism?
A. Frequent ablution in water.
Q. What is our inspiration?
A. Fresh air and sunshine.
Q. What is our love feast?
A. Clear conscience and sound sleep.
Q. What is our prayer?
A. Physical exercise."

And then it goes on to show that a great proportion of their religious service is a system of calisthenics. Then when they want to arouse the devotion of the people to the highest pitch, they give out the hymn on the 65th page:

"The night hath gathered up her silken fringes,"

Or, on the 15th page:

"Come to the woods, heigh ho!"

But you say you are not such a fool as that. You will be if you keep on with your Spiritualism. "Oh!" says some one, "don't you really think it might authenticate Christianity? don't you know there are some people who deny there is any future world? and don't you realize that if spirits come back from another world it will persuade them that there is another world?" To that question I answer in the ringing words of the Son of God: "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rose from the dead."

A FULFILLED PROPHECY.

I believe this sermon under God will save some from disease and death and darkness and doom. I think we have come to the time spoken of by the Apostle when he says: "In the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits." And I think never so much as now the words of my text need to be rung in all the churches: "There shall not be found among you any consulter with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer, for all that do these things are an abomination unto the Lord."

I invite you to

A CHRISTIAN SÉANCE

—not a midnight but a noonday séance. This whole church is a family. Here is the table. Put the Bible on the table. Then let us put our hands on the Bible and listen if we can catch a voice from the next world. The answer comes: "The secret things belong unto the Lord our God; but those things which are revealed belong to us and to our children forever." That is a voice from the next world. Before you quit this Christian séance I want you to promise that you will trust in the Word of God as it is until the light of the eternal world flashes upon us.

Do not sit at a worldly séance either in fun or in earnest. Have your tables so well made that they will not tip. If the table must move have it move under the offices of industrious housewifery. Let your children know there are no ghosts except those that walk on two or four feet—human or bestial. Do not go to get somebody to tell your fortune. Tell your own fortune by putting your trust in God and doing your best. I will tell your fortune. "All things work together for good to those that love God." Do not insult your departed friends by asking them to come into a dark closet to cut up capers, or crawl under the extension table. Remember there is only one spirit you have a right to invoke, and that is the grand, the glorious, the august, the holy, the Ominpotent Spirit of God that hovers this morning around your soul and that has been around you all your life long. That Spirit now moving upon your soul. Grieve Him not away. The voice dropping through the roof, coming in at the window, filling all this room from door to door and from floor to ceiling, with tender and overmastering intonation saying: "My spirit shall not always strive."

THE APPROACHING FALL OF MOHAMMEDANISM.

By Rev. James Meikle, D.D.

(Written in 1865.)

The Coming Overthrow of Turkey—The Jews to Return at that Time—The Predicted Date—The Duration of Mohammedanism Limited—When it Commenced—The Date of the Hegira—The Decisive Battle—The Parallel Reckoning.

THE time of the overthrow of the Turkish empire, and of the restoration of the Jews to Palestine, demands the attention of the student of the prophecies of Scripture. In general we are told that the deliverance of the Jewish people from their present state of unbelief and captivity, and of their restoration to their own land, shall be contemporaneous with the downfall of the Ottoman empire: "He" (that is, the Sultan of Constantinople) "shall come to his end, and none shall help him. And at that time," says God to Daniel (12 : 1), "shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth up for the children of thy people. And there shall be a time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time. And at that time thy people shall be delivered every one that shall be found written in the book." These words render it certain that the deliverance here promised to the Jewish people shall be contemporaneous with the destruction of the Turkish power.

THE PROPHETIC DATE.

As to the time when this event shall take place, the man clothed with linen gives us definite information on this point in his reply to the question, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" "I heard," says Daniel, "the man clothed with linen, which was upon the waters of the river, when he held up his right hand and his left hand unto heaven, and sware by Him that liveth forever, that it shall be for a time, times, and an half. And when he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished." The time, times, and an half, mean three years and a half of prophetical time, or 1260 prophetic days, that is to say, in the year-day fulfilment, 1260 years, as is similarly denoted by the 1260 days in Revelation 11 : 3. The time of the downfall of the Ottoman empire, and of the deliverance of the Jewish people from captivity, is, therefore, exactly specified, and distinctly determined by this oath of the man clothed with linen. The point, however, is to fix the period when these 1260 years of Mohammedanism commenced.

WHEN IT COMMENCED.

Edward Upham, in his "History of the Turkish or Ottoman Empire," says: "The Mussulmans date the commencement of Mohammed's sway from the first year of Hegira, A.D. 622. The generality of writers place this epoch on Friday, the 16th of July, 622. It was from this period that Mohammed, having fully ascertained the hate of his enemies, and the extent of his own power, proceeded to lay aside the arts of persuasion and patient endurance, whereby he had hitherto sought to propagate his tenets; and, elated by the devotion of his disciples, and his reception at Medina, he framed henceforth the revelation of the Koran in a tone which proclaimed him a persecutor, and empowered his followers to make determined war against all opposers."

Gibbon, in his "History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," chap. 50, also says: "The prophet of Medina assumed in his new revelations a fiercer and more sanguinary tone, which proves that his former moderation was the effect of weakness. The means of persuasion had been tried; the season of forbearance was elapsed; and he was now commanded to propagate his religion by the sword, to destroy the monuments of idolatry, and without regarding the sanctity of days or months, to pursue the unbelieving nations of the earth. . . . 'The sword,' says Mohammed, 'is the key of heaven and of hell; a drop of blood shed in the cause of God, a night spent in arms, is of more avail than two months of fasting or prayers. Whosoever falls in battle, his sins are forgiven. At the day of judgment his wounds shall be resplendent as vermilion, and odoriferous as musk; and the loss of his limbs shall be supplied by the wings of angels and cherubims.'"

Now, if the year 622, when Mohammed began to propagate his religion, no longer by persuasion, but by the sword, is the time when the 1260 prophetical days commenced, then these shall terminate in A.D. 1882, and that year shall be signalized by the destruction of the Turko-Mohammedan or Ottoman empire.

THE DECISIVE BATTLE,

But it was not until A.D. 636, that the power of the Roman Empire over Syria was destroyed by the Saracens' victory over Heraclius, the Græco-Roman Emperor of Constantinople. Andrew Crichton, in his "History of Arabia," chap. 8, says: "Manuel, the commander of the Mohammedan army, advanced to the banks of the Yermouk, where Khaled, the general of Heraclius's army, had taken his position, and where he had resolved to stake the fate of Syria. This petty stream, the Hieromax of the Greeks, immortalized by one of the most sanguinary battles of antiquity, rises in Mount Hermon, and winding through the plain of Decapolis, is lost after a short run in the Lake of Tiberias. . . . The battle raged several days, and night separated the combatants only to renew the encounter. . . . The carnage of Yermouk surpassed that of any preceding battle. The veterans of former wars confessed it to be one of the most desperate and doubtful encounters they had ever seen; but it was decisive. Seventy thousand of the best troops of Heraclius, with their general, and a vast number of his principal officers, were left on the field. Altogether, the Christians are stated to have lost 150,000 men killed, and 48,100 in prisoners. Perhaps the Arabs may exaggerate in point of number; but the Greek historians themselves have admitted the total overthrow of the Roman power in Syria in this sanguinary engagement (November, 636), which they long after bewailed as a just retribution for their sins."

Now, if the year 636, when the Saracens completely overthrew the Roman power in Syria, is to be taken as the time when the 1260 prophetical days or years commenced, then it follows that the Ottoman empire shall be destroyed in A.D. 1896.

A PARALLEL RECKONING.

Jerusalem was besieged and taken in A.D. 637 by the Saracens. Upham, in his "History of the Ottoman Empire," says: "In 637, Jerusalem, the holy city, which had somewhat regained her consideration and stately rank since the time of Adrian, fell under the Mohammedan sway by the arms of the Saracens under Caliph Omar. Thus this revered capital (with the exception of the short subsequent period of about ninety years at the time of the Crusades) has continued to this day under a heavier yoke than it had ever borne. In Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," chap. 17, it is said: "In 637 Jerusalem, after a siege of four months, capitulated. And Caliph Omar, after the signing of the capitulation, entered the city without fear or precaution, and courteously discoursed with the patrarich concerning its religious antiquities. Sophronius bowed before his new master, and secretly muttered in the words of Daniel, 'The abomination of desolation is in the holy place.' At the hour of prayer they stood together in the Church of the Resurrection; but Caliph Omar refused to perform his devotions, and contented himself with praying on the steps of the Church of Constantine. By his command the ground of the temple of Solomon was prepared for the foundation of a Mohammedan Mosque (which stands there to this day, and is called the mosque of Omar)."

Now, if the year 637, when Jerusalem was besieged and taken by the Moslems, was the commencement of the 1260 years, then the Turkish power shall not be destroyed until A.D. 1897. Like the kingdom of Amalek of old, "its latter end shall be, that it perish forever."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Successful Man's Confession.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Napier said: "Being a business man, I know all the ups and downs of business life, and have noticed that it is not by any ability of my own that I have made money. When I was most eager to gain, then I lost it by thousands upon thousands; but when I was successful, it was in the ordinary course of business that the Lord blessed me. If prosperity be good for His servants, God will send it to them, for 'the gold and the silver are His;' 'the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof;' but He will never bestow anything which will do His trusting children harm."

Flogged and Disgraced for his Brother.—Mr. Campbell relates that a friend of his, much against his will, was forced to administer chastisement to one of his boys. "He took his son into a side room to give him a flogging, but was interrupted by a knock at the door. In answer to the invitation, 'Come in,' the eldest boy walked in, and said, 'Father, I want to take the flogging for my brother.' 'Well, you will have to bear the disgrace as well,' the father answered. 'I will,' replied the boy. The younger brother looked on while his substitute bore the stripes which he should have had, and his heart was wrung with sorrow at his sin and its result. This is something like that which Christ has done for us. 'The chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed'" (Isaiah 53 : 5).

A Bond-Slave to Strong Drink.—Mr. Lees, who is engaged in temperance work in Scotland, said: "I was speaking recently to a gentleman on my way from Kirkcaldy about God. He replied, 'I know all about that; but I have not followed it out.' 'What!' I answered, 'yet you dare to resist God?' 'I know; I know,' was his sorrowful reply; 'but drink is my ruin. I got up yesterday morning, quite sober, yet I required to take five glasses of brandy to steady my nerves for business!' He is a man of good education, in a capital position in Glasgow, but is a helpless and despairing bond-slave to King Alcohol, who, as tens of thousands can testify, is a cruel and remorseless master. Let us be ever ready to preach the Gospel to these poor slaves, for Christ has power to bid the captives go free."

An Unforgiven Enemy.—"I Remember not long ago sitting in a church alongside an anxious inquirer. She professed to understand all I said, and to see the way of salvation clearly through faith in Jesus Christ; but yet it brought no peace to her troubled soul. Suddenly it flashed across my mind, I know not why—'Is there any one she refuses to forgive?' I put the question to her at once, and she hung her head with shame. I then assured her that there was no hope of salvation or peace to her till she forgave as she hoped to be forgiven. After a brief, sharp struggle, she left the church unsaved. Weeks afterward I was again in that church, and made special inquiry about the woman, and got the gratifying reply, 'She is all right now; she forgave her enemy, and is walking in the bright light of her Saviour's countenance, and is full of peace in Him.'"

No Stepping-Stones to Christ.—Mr. Graham said: "One Sunday at Mr. Moody's meeting in London, I had the privilege of speaking with a clergyman's wife about the eternal interests of her soul. She had come from a country parish to attend the meeting, so that she might participate in the bounteous spiritual blessing which is being poured upon these meetings. At this meeting she realized that her own soul was not at peace with the Lord, and became very anxious to know what to do, for, as she told me, she had worked very hard in her own parish, promoting every kind of religious meetings, but producing no good results. The idea which filled her mind was that these works were stepping-stones to Christ. I told her that they were only filthy rags, and that she must put them all aside, and rely upon Christ only for safety. Very anxiously she inquired, 'Must I give them all up then?' 'No, but you must take Christ into your own heart, and then take Him into the meetings.' At the men's meeting the lady was on the platform, and handed me her card, saying, 'I wish you would write me; I have found Christ to-day, and He will give a blessing to our meetings, I know, because He has promised to do so.'"

A Young Christian Baker Testified: "I know that I am saved. Four years ago I attended a Gospel Temperance Meeting for Bakers, where the Holy Spirit convicted me of sin, and showed me the way to be saved. I was not in the habit of attending church before my conversion, and did not do so afterward, neither did I enter into the work of the Lord. The natural consequence was that I became cold and indifferent, then an open backslider. My inmost soul was grieved by this, but I did not understand how it was till I spoke to a brother tradesman, who was a bright, happy Christian. He advised me to give up struggling against sin in my own strength, and to cast myself on the Lord entirely. I followed his advice, and soon there came into my soul a great peace, and then a craving for fellowship with true believers. I now enjoy the service of the Lord's house, have much sweet communion with Christ and His people, and am working to the best of my ability to bring others to my loving and gracious Saviour."

An Aged Grandmother's Criticism.—The Rev. Mr. Forwell related: "During a time of gracious revival, I remember showing to my aged grandmother a pass-book, in which I had entered the names and addresses of those with whom I had privately conversed about Christ, and who professed to come out on the Lord's side. I said to her while showing the book, 'Here are the names of one hundred and twenty-seven I have conversed with during the last three months; but see what is written on the outside, "Supposed to be saved."' Her reply was, 'Ah! weel ye ken, Willie, that is a' that can be said o' anybody.' She was quite right, for we may profess to be followers of the Lord, but no person will believe it unless our lives bear our word out to be true. Our daily life, and the little deeds and words which compose the duties and actions of our existence, speak more eloquently than loud-mouthed professions without these being in harmony with Christ's teachings. Oh, that men might take knowledge of us, as of His former disciples, that we 'have been with Jesus, and have learned of Him!'"

Janet's Pathetic Confession.—The Rev. Mr. Scrimgeour related the following: "A poor woman, somewhat weak in her mind, felt it pressing upon her soul that Jesus was her Saviour and that she must confess Him publicly. She went to the minister just before the half-yearly Communion, and applied for the privilege of church membership, so that she might sit at the Lord's Table. He put one or two very simple questions to her, which she could not answer, and very regretfully he said, 'Janet, I am sorry that I cannot admit you to church fellowship.' The poor woman did not understand it, but patiently submitted to the deprivation for the time being; but as the Communion seasons came round, Janet applied again and again, with the same result. At last it was impressed upon her heart that unless she sat down at the Table this time, she would never do it at all on earth. The minister put the same questions, but still Janet could not answer them, and again he refused to admit her. She turned to go, and with her hand on the knob of the study door, made a final appeal in these true and touching words, 'Weel, sir, a canna speak aboot it, but as the Lint flower opens tae the sun in the morning, sae does ma soul open tae Jesus.' It was sufficient; she obtained her desire, and truly was her foreboding fulfilled, for ere another Communion season came round, poor, weak-minded Janet was in the presence of her Saviour in glory."

THE SECOND ADVENT PRE-MILLENNIAL.

THE WITNESS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.

By Willis Lord, D.D.*

The Revelation of the Divine Order of Events—The Absence of the Bridegroom—Fasting to Continue—Rejoicing at His Return—The Decay of Faith—Cannot Occur in the Millennium—Its Absence at the Coming—Inference that the Second Advent is Pre-Millennial.

As the witness of the New Testament to the second coming of Christ is more full and definite than that of the Old Testament with reference to the great event itself and its accessories, so also it is as to its time. It does not, indeed, lift the veil from "that day and hour" when the Lord will come, but it pours a clear light on

THE DIVINE ORDER.

In harmony with the witness of the Old Testament, it shows that the great day of the Lord, when He will come in the glory of His Father, and with the holy angels, will precede and usher in the millennium. Glance at some of its testimonies. Taken singly, they may appear more or less decisive. Taken together, they lay a solid foundation for Christian faith.

ABSENCE OF THE BRIDEGROOM.

John the Baptist was an ascetic. He came neither eating bread nor drinking wine. He was also a preacher of repentance, and enjoined fasting as a religious duty. Like the Pharisees, therefore, his disciples were wont to fast. It was meant to be an expressive, outward sign of strong, inward feeling; a symbolical confession of sin and sorrow; of deep affliction of the soul. The disciples of Jesus did not fast. The fact was observed, and prompted the inquiry, "Why do we and the Pharisees fast oft, but thy disciples fast not?" (Matt. 9 : 15).

How instructive and beautiful is the reply: "Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bride-chamber mourn as long as the Bridegroom is with them?" Certainly not. Well, I am the Bridegroom of the Church. And thus, as Alford points out, He "announces the fulfilment in Him of a whole cycle of Old Testament prophecies and figures." And this being so, how could His disciples fast? His personal presence with them precluded sorrow. It did so, even when they saw Him in the form of a servant, and their knowledge of Him and His sublime purposes was most imperfect. Much more will it do this when He shall be present with them in His full array of divine beauty and power. "But," He added, "the days will come when the Bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." The evangelist Luke has it, "and then shall they fast, in those days," i.e., when and while the Bridegroom is gone.

The going away of the Bridegroom was, indeed, expedient; but how the very thought of it depressed those first disciples. It would itself be a great sorrow. It would also bring the season and the occasions for other sorrows. Then the world would renew its temptations; then the flesh would stand disclosed in all its weakness; then Satan would redouble his infernal craft and power; then too, if ever, they would know by experience of the great tribulation out of which all will come who shall stand before the throne of God and of the Lamb in the glory of conquerors.

And how could they suppose the effect would be less permanent than its cause? Or, how can we suppose this? The fasting-time of the Bride is plainly commensurate with the absence of the Bridegroom; unless, indeed, meanwhile, her love shall grow cold, and the Bride become an harlot. But this would call for still deeper sorrow. It would indicate anything else than the presence and glories of the millennium. Those days, therefore, when the Bride shall fast because the Bridegroom is taken away, will continue until the Bridegroom returns.

THE DECAY OF FAITH.

Add to this thought that touching question of the Lord in the parable of the unjust judge. He would impress it upon men that they should always pray and not faint. He does this by showing us a widow bringing her suit before an earthly tribunal (Luke 18 : 1–8). The judge is one who does not care for either man or God. His office is his instrument of power and plunder. Time and again, therefore, he sends her from his presence without redress. She, however, will not be denied. She persists in urging and re-urging her case, until the wretch is compelled, by regard to his own ease, to vindicate her. Now, will not God, the infinitely righteous Judge, and who also loves His people with an immeasurable love, hear and answer those who cry day and night unto Him? Most assuredly He will, and that speedily.

This the Scriptures certify, and this the ages have seen. If often the furnace has been exceeding hot, the result in spiritual wealth and beauty has been correspondingly eminent. "Nevertheless," the Saviour proceeds to ask, "when the Son of Man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" What a startling inquiry! He will come again, but when He comes, what a spiritual condition of men! But the import of the question is plain. Faith will have almost failed when the Son of Man shall come.

And yet, the ideas now so current in the Church make this astounding and world-wide decay of faith follow at once upon the millennium; i.e., upon the world-wide prevalence of truth, righteousness, peace, and all the extraordinary blessings and glories of the long-promised thousand years!

IS IT CONCEIVABLE?

Is it possible? We can, indeed, see how faith in revealed truth may now fail. In fact, we see that it often does fail. In the visible Church itself there seems to be already more of unbelief than of faith. Large numbers of professedly Christian teachers find the ultimate authority in their own reason. Still larger numbers of professedly Christian people delight more in human folly than in the divine wisdom. It is not difficult to believe that in the last days perilous times will come by means of false philosophy, false science, false religion, and of the worldly spirit and unholy lives of those who ought to be the witnesses of God; and that at the end of this dispensation it may be just as it was in the days before the flood. But, that the millennium should come and go and leave no trace behind; that a period which the Scriptures clothe with more than the beauty and brightness of the sun; whose demonstrations of truth will be overwhelming as they will be grand and glorious; whose fruits of righteousness, peace, purity and abounding joy will make the earth again like heaven; and during which "all men shall be blessed in Christ and all nations shall call Him blessed;" that such a period should end in one of almost utter darkness is incredible.

For a little season, it is true, Satan will be loosed from his prison. He will then make another and most desperate attempt against the saints and their mighty King. But with what result? Apparently with no result, except to deceive some of the then unconverted in the four quarters of the earth. Most assuredly there will be no want of faith then in the camp of the saints or in the beloved city. And when at length the great adversary and His embattled host are all ready for the onset, but before they seem to have struck a blow—fire comes down from God out of heaven and devours them. In the Bible view of the future there is no place after the millennium for so stupendous a descent, as the current ideas imply from universal faith and holiness, to universal unbelief and impiety. If, when the Son of Man cometh, He shall not find faith on the earth, His coming must be before the millennium.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Republican Conventions Held Last week indicate that the choice of a candidate by the Chicago Convention is still a matter of uncertainty. In Ohio three of the delegates-at-large are claimed for Mr. Sherman and one for Mr. Blaine. In Connecticut Mr. Hawley was the favorite candidate. In Michigan the majority of the delegates are said to be for Mr. Blaine, three for Mr. Edmunds, and one for President Arthur. The platforms adopted are of the ordinary type, and in all cases praise the administration of President Arthur. The decided manifestation of opposition to the nomination of either the President on the one hand, or Mr. Blaine on the other leads to the expectation that both candidates will be rejected in favor of some one whom all sections of the party can support.

The New York Republican Convention Held at Utica last Wednesday resulted in the election of four Edmunds delegates-at-large. The people have substantial reason for being satisfied with this result, because the delegates, who will speak for the whole State, though known as Edmunds men, are not pledged to vote for Mr. Edmunds, but are prepared to vote for any candidate who represents the principles with which the name of Mr. Edmunds is popularly identified. Those principles are honesty, administrative reform, and non-political appointments in the civil service. The election of the four delegates was a genuine surprise. Mr. Blaine's friends expected to control the convention, and on the very morning on which it assembled boasted that they could send four Blaine delegates to Chicago; but they were disappointed. The President's friends, finding that Arthur delegates could not be chosen, combined with the friends of Mr. Edmunds. Not being able to secure a triumph for their candidate, the President's friends considered the next best thing was to defeat Mr. Blaine, which they did. Senator Warner Miller was one of the rejected candidates for delegate-at-large. Mr. Whitelaw Reid was expected to be another candidate on the same ticket, but he declined in advance. This was a disappointment to many of the delegates, who were anxious that the State Convention should place on record its estimate of the writer of "the midnight despatch." The section of the party known as the young independents is jubilant over the result of the convention. That section is steadily working for the reformation of the party. It has a deep-rooted abhorrence for the methods of the machine and its boss, Mr. John J. O'Brien, and it has a yet more intense dislike for the record of Mr. Blaine and the policy of his friends. Any one who regards the result of the convention as an expression of public feeling here, must conclude that the State of New York cannot be carried next November by Mr. Blaine or any man who would permit Mr. Blaine to shape his policy.

The Senate Passed its Bankruptcy Bill on Monday, April 21st, by a vote of 32 to 15. The bill has attracted considerable public attention owing to the glaring defects of the present system and the scandals and injustice now existing. The new bill is by no means a perfect system, and those who are intent on rascality will doubtless be able to evade its provisions, but it is a decided improvement on the law now in force, because it reduces the cost of proceedings and simplifies the work of the courts. One important feature is that it provides for the payment of the officials by salary and not by fees. The District Courts are to be Courts of Bankruptcy, and they are to be open always in vacation as well as in term time. Many amendments have been made in the bill since it left the Judiciary Committee, and the House will probably still further amend it during its progress there.

While the President's Friends are Exerting themselves to secure for him the Republican nomination, and while the business men in New York and other large cities are anxious that he, rather than any other Republican should be nominated, it is gratifying to learn that no pressure is being exerted by him on the officials whom he has put in office, to work for him. In a letter recently sent to a collector by Mr. Folger, the Secretary says: "I do not, nor does he (the President), wish any man in office under his administration to feel compelled to go counter to his duty as a citizen." There are men in the South who are known to favor other candidates than the President, but who have considered it their duty to work for his nomination at Chicago, because they were put into office under his administration.

Much Enthusiasm was Evoked Last Week by the sailing of the Bear, the first of the three vessels which are being sent in search of the Greely party. The Bear left the Brooklyn Navy Yard for her voyage to the Arctic on Thursday last, and a great crowd assembled to witness her departure. The wharves and bulkheads and the ships on the river were covered by citizens cheering the gallant crew and waving adieux to them as the ship was steered down toward the bay. Her commander is Lieutenant W. H. Emory, and the crew are all volunteers, most of them being Americans. The captain is ordered to proceed to St. John's, Newfoundland, and replenish his coal, get on board twenty dogs and their harness. He is then to proceed to Godhavn, Disco, and Upernavik. At Upernavik he will await the Thetis unless he should hear that Greely had come down to Littleton Island. In that event he will go across Melville Sound as soon as possible, leaving a record behind of all that he learns. The Thetis is to sail this week. The Alert, the vessel presented by the British Government to the United States, arrived here on Tuesday, April 22d. She will be placed on the dry dock and thoroughly overhauled before her departure. She will be used as the supply ship of the expedition. The commander of the expedition is Captain Schley, who will sail on the Thetis, and Engineer Melville, one of the survivors of the Jeannette, will be the fleet-engineer. The Secretary of the Navy has sent a letter to Captain Schley ordering him to take command of the expedition, and to proceed to the coast of Greenland, or farther if necessary, and if possible to rescue or ascertain the fate of Lieutenant Greely and his party. All the officers and men under Captain Schley's command are enjoined to perform any duty on sea or land that may be ordered. No detailed instructions are given, as the Secretary expresses himself fully confident that Captain Schley has the courage, ability, and discretion necessary to do all that can be done to rescue the Greely party.

An Effort to Aid Prohibitionists was made in the Senate on April 21st by Mr. Ingalls who introduced a bill to change the present laws with respect to the special tax imposed by the general government on the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors so as to provide that collectors of internal revenue shall be prohibited from receiving such special taxes, or granting permits or licenses for the carrying on of the business of wholesale or retail liquor dealers or brewers, in any State or municipality in which the carrying on of such business is contrary to the State or municipal laws; and that the payment of any tax imposed by the internal revenue laws for carrying on such business shall not be held to exempt any person from any penalty imposed by the State laws for carrying on the same.

Dr. Willard Parker, one of the Most Eminent physicians in America, died on Friday, April 25th. He was eighty-four years of age, and his long life had been full of usefulness to a remarkable degree. He was descended on both sides of his family from the English Puritans, and in his mental characteristics he much resembled those noble men. As a professor and in his private practice he won the esteem of all with whom he came in contact, and he goes to his grave deeply lamented. It is especially noteworthy that a physician so eminent as Dr. Parker was strongly on the side of temperance. He held alcohol to be essentially a poison, that it cannot be considered a food, and that its use should be exceptional, when advised by a physician and in the preparation of medicines. Dr. Parker occupied while comparatively a young man several responsible positions, but he first became prominent in philanthropic circles, when in 1865, on the death of Dr. Valentine Mott, who was then President of the New York State Inebriate Asylum, at Binghamton, Dr. Parker was appointed his successor. To this institution Dr. Parker devoted much time and thought. The subject was one in which he was deeply interested, and it is to his care and energy that the asylum is largely indebted for its success.

Congress and the Liquor Traffic was the subject discussed at the Conference of the Women's National Christian Temperance Union held in New York last week, at which delegates were present from all parts of this State and from Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. An earnest address was delivered by Mr. A. M. Powell on the national aspect of the question, in which he vigorously denounced Mr. Blaine's scheme for distributing the revenue derived from the liquor traffic among the States. He said, "Mr. Blaine's plan assumes the indefinite perpetuation of the liquor traffic. Nor does he make any account of the fact that in his own State—Maine—the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes are already illegal; that a constitutional amendment has been proposed by the Legislature of Maine to forever prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages. What Maine proposes to do in thus amending its fundamental law Kansas has already done, Iowa has pronounced in favor of, Ohio recently gave over 300,000 votes for, and in seventeen States during the last legislative year, in one form or another, initial steps have been taken to secure. By what sort of moral philosophy a State which regards and treats the liquor traffic as a crime can assent to any plan for reducing its own taxation by receiving the liquor revenue derived from other States Mr. Blaine's letter does not make apparent."

An Open Letter to Clergymen and Officers of churches has been issued by the Women's Christian Temperance Union of New York. Its object is to induce them to cease from using fermented wine at the Lord's table. The following extract from the letter indicates the ground taken by the writers: It can be proved by many instances, that not only reformed men and women have fallen into their old dissipated habits on account of wine taken at Communion, but that the taste for intoxicants has been aroused (notably in those who have the hereditary disposition) by its use at the Lord's Supper. Many are constrained to pass the wine untasted, because of its great danger to them; and a large number of those connected with temperance work are deprived of the full enjoyment of the Sacrament, because they cannot conscientiously taste fermented wine.

The White Cross Reform Club is an Organization established in Detroit, Mich., about eight weeks ago, which now numbers over four hundred members. The Detroit Evening Journal publishes a remarkable account of its origin. A man named Henry O. Wells is president of the club. He has lived in the city many years and was well known there as a notorious profligate. A bloated figure, ragged attire and tobacco besmeared face made up his appearance. He haunted the meanest dives, and his associates were the scum of the city. In October last he returned home in his usual besotted condition, cursed his wife, and drove his frightened children crying to bed. In the night he awoke in great distress believing he was about to die. In his terror he sent for a Christian friend whose appeals to him he had often rejected with contempt. His friend came to him though it was long past midnight. He prayed with the terrified drunkard and led him to pray for himself. The man became a changed character, quitted the liquor, and stopped using tobacco. The change was sudden but thorough. He immediately set to work in the cause of Christian temperance, and the White Cross Reform Club of Detroit with its four hundred members is the result of God's blessing on his labors.

The German Young Men's Christian Association is endeavoring to raise funds for the erection of a building in New York. There was in 1880 a population of Germans in the city numbering 163,482, and since that time it has largely increased. As it was found that the young men of that nationality rarely attended church, an effort was made some time ago to attract them to an association, and the Young Men's Christian Association placed a room in their building at the disposal of the Christian workers making the effort. A German Young Men's Christian Association was formed which now numbers 150 regular members with a large number of casual visitors, and a room was hired down-town to accommodate them. That room is now too small, and they propose to erect a house to contain large rooms for conversation, reading, and a library; also music and class-rooms, a gymnasium, and bathing institute. The interest taken in this enterprise by those who are practically engaged in it is shown by the fact that they have started a building fund among themselves, and have already raised over $6000. Mr. Von Schluembach, of the International Committee, is working vigorously in the enterprise.

The Florence Night Mission, One of the most useful institutions of its class in New York City, celebrated its first anniversary on April 20th. It was organized by Mr. Charles N. Crittenden, in memory of his daughter Florence, as an aid to fallen women. It is situated in Bleecker Street, in the neighborhood of the haunts were dissolute persons spend their evenings. Meetings are held in the mission ever night, and they last sometimes until two or three o'clock in the morning. Men and women come in to stay five minutes and stay for hours. Beside the good effected by the services at the mission, Mr. Henry Gibbard, the energetic and devoted missionary, has been able by visiting the wretched dives on the Bowery and Chatham Street and other disreputable resorts, to exert a Christian influence over the women who frequent them and induce them to attend the mission services. At the anniversary meeting it was stated that during the past year 176 women had been received into the mission, of whom 66 were sent to asylums, 38 to situations, 25 were returned to their families, two died and 20 joined churches. Four couples were married. Some of them are still in the home. Mr. Crittenden is still the chief support of the home. He was present at the anniversary and said that during the year $5270.80 had been expended and $1713.17 received. He did not regret the money he had spent personally, and he would start the mission for its second year clear of debt and would head a subscription list with $1000. The work of the mission had exceeded his expectations.

A Wedding Ceremony Performed on a Bridge has had a disastrous sequel. About a month ago a young lady residing in West Virginia ran away from home to be married. The place selected for the ceremony was a bridge over the Potomac, a romantic spot which has for such couples the additional attraction of being between the two States of Maryland and West Virginia, not under the jurisdiction of either State and where no marriage license is required. The marriage service was read and the bride and bridegroom departed. But last week the bride found herself deserted, and on inquiry she found she had been deceived. The ceremony had been performed by a sham clergyman and it had no legal value. The deserted woman would be glad now to have the protection of the law of either State, though she connived at the scheme to evade the jurisdiction of both. When the law is despised either by nations or individuals disaster generally follows (Neh. 9 : 26, 27).

A Man Saved by a Mule is the Hero of a story related in the Youth's Companion. Dr. William A. Hammond writing in that paper says that while stationed at Fort Webster, in what is now Arizona, he started down the cañon on a very fine and large mule. The beast stopped abruptly, and signified that he would not budge a step. Spurs were dug into his flanks to no purpose. There he stood as firm as a rock. Hammond pulled him round, and galloped back to the fort. The next morning it was ascertained that at a point scarcely a hundred yards in advance of where the mule had gained his victory some Apache Indians had ambushed the road, and but for the brute's keen nose and ears, and firmness in resisting an obstinate man, short work would have been made of both. This modern Balaam acknowledges that he owes his life to the mule's sagacity which he mistook for obstinacy. So it will be when we come to review our lives in the clearer light beyond the grave. Many of the events we have called misfortunes and hindrances will be recognized as benefits which God sent to preserve us from disaster (Prov. 20 : 24).

A Successful Appeal to a Judge is one of the reminiscences recently narrated by a writer on the history of the war. The judge was very busy and had besides done his full share in assisting the sufferers of that sad time, so that when a wounded and emaciated soldier entered his office and pleaded for assistance, the judge told him he had no time to attend to his application. "But I have a letter for you," said the soldier and he laid on the desk a letter from the judge's son who was then serving at the front. The judge opened the letter and read: "Dear Father: The bearer of this is a soldier discharged from the hospital. He is going home to die. Assist him in any way you can, for Charlie's sake." And then Judge A—— forgot how very busy he was. His heart went out toward the poor, sick soldier, and "for Charlie's sake," his own soldier-boy far away, he loaded him with gifts and acts of kindness, and lodged him till he could send him on his way rejoicing. So will God answer prayers offered in the name of His dear Son (John 16 : 26, 27).

GOD'S WORK UPON MINISTER AND CONVERT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But rise, and stand upon thy feet: for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister, . . . delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, . . . that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance."—ACTS 26 : 16–20.

BEHOLD an amazing sight! Saul of Tarsus at the feet of Jesus of Nazareth! Listen! The persecutor's voice is changed into that of an inquiring disciple. He asks, "What wilt thou have me to do?" If angels sang with delight over a new-made world, their song must have been seven times as joyous over a new-made apostle. The change was miraculous. At this distance of time we can hardly appreciate it; but if we had been living in daily fear of our lives, if we had seen our father or our brother dragged off to death by this ferocious enemy of the cross, and then had suddenly heard that he was converted to the faith which he opposed, we should have cried, "Incredible!" For the Ethiopian to change his skin, or for the leopard to lose his spots, would be little compared with this cruel Pharisee bowing himself in lowly penitence before the Lord Jesus whom he had persecuted. Do you wonder that when Saul was come to Jerusalem, and essayed to join himself to the disciples, they were all afraid of him, and believed not that he was a disciple?

My brethren, as in history, so in the grace of God, it is which frequently occurs. The men and women whom I expected to confess Christ long ago have not yet come. I have seen Felix tremble, but I have not seen him converted; I have seen Agrippa almost persuaded, but he is not yet a Christian. Meanwhile, I have beheld a Saul of Tarsus, who aforetime raged against the cross, bowing himself submissively before the Lord Jesus. Let us never be discouraged; but let us expect to see signs and wonders in the world of grace. Though priestcraft is far too dominant in our land, we yet may hear that "a great company of the priests" have believed in Christ. Though freethought rides roughshod over everything, we may yet hear that the boldest freethinkers have been made truly free, and have felt the power of His thoughts, which are as high above our thoughts as the heavens are above the earth.

Note with care how men are converted; I shall show you God's preparation for it, in a work wrought upon the minister, making him a fit witness for the truth; then I shall speak upon God's work wrought in the convert in opening his eyes, and turning him from darkness to light; and, lastly, I shall call your attention to a work which must be wrought by the convert himself; for Paul preached that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentence.

GOD'S WORK UPON THE MINISTER.

I. First, let us notice a work wrought by God upon the minister. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." "Faith cometh by hearing." "How shall they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent?" In order to the conversion of the hearer many processes must be experienced by the preacher: he must be made, called, sent, and afterward delivered. All the work of the Lord upon him is a work of grace on behalf of those who shall be converted by his means.

The minister whom God sends is first of all himself subdued, and made to be obedient to the will of his Lord. While a man is a rebel the Lord does not appoint him to act as an ambassador; while he is dead in sin He does not commission him to preach the way of life. Paul was struck down to the earth: if he had not himself fallen, he would not have known how to lift up others whom the Lord has laid low.

THE HARDENING PROCESS.

It may be that some young man present this morning is undergoing a singularly severe discipline at the hands of the Holy Spirit. His sins are exceedingly heavy upon him, and relief does not come. A companion of his who was aroused at the same time has found rest, and is already rejoicing in the light; but this young brother finds the darkness thicken about him. Dear friend, it may be that your deeper conviction and more oppressive sense of sin are needful because in your future life you are to be made largerly helpful to troubled hearts. Do not think that everybody is blind for three days, as Paul was when he did neither eat nor drink during all that time; but conclude that some peculiar end is to be served by this remarkable experience. Lydia, whose heart the Lord opened to receive the truth, was not thus blinded and troubled; but then she was not called to be an apostle to preach the gospel from Jerusalem to Spain. The weapon which is to be most used in battle must be more completely hardened than that which is for peaceful service.

Discipline in our own spiritual life is a part of ministerial education which the chosen of the Lord shall not miss. See then, how God may be working for the conversion of generations yet unborn in the deep and painful experience of individuals who are now being turned from darkness to light. See, my dear hearer, what God may have done already in the hearts of His chosen ministers to fit them to become the means of your conversion. In order to slay your sins the shaft has been polished. Another has groaned and wept, and cried out in bitter agony, in order that he may know how to speak a word in season to you.

Each of the best locks made by our eminent locksmiths is unique and by itself; and when this is the case, each lock needs so is it with human minds, there is a peculiarity about each one. Certain minds will never be reached until they come in contact with other minds constituted on purpose to touch them. I know that there is a suitability in my experience to affect many of my fellow-men, and they open to me when the Lord takes me in His hand, and uses me as His key; but I also feel that in all probability I shall never move certain other individuals, because my mental conformation excites prejudice in them; I do not fit them, and they will not permit me to be of use to them. Thank God, He has other servants, and by these I trust He will accomplish good for those to whom I am an unsuitable instrument.

The next preparation for the Lord's minister was that he should be encouraged. The Lord Jesus said to him, "Rise, and stand upon thy feet." As much as to say—"Thou art forgiven, thou art chosen, thou art beloved; therefore lie no longer prostrate, overwhelmed with fear. Give not way to despondency. Resign thyself into my hands, and be prepared with activity and diligence to spend all the rest of thy life in doing good. Arise, stand on thy feet, for work is to be done at once which will need all thy courage and might!" Men can hardly be very useful till they cease to be despondent, diffident, and depressed, and become energetic and hopeful. Even good men need to be braced up that they may rise to bold attempts and believing labors for their Lord.

The uplifting work being done, it remained that Paul should now be made, constituted, and ordained a minister, and to this end he must see the Lord for himself. The Lord said, "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness." It is plain from these words that is for the Lord Jesus Christ to appear to them. We have heard of making men into ministers, but we have no belief in the result of such a manufacture. If one man makes another man a minister, he will be very badly made, and the sooner he is broken up again the better. The means which the Lord uses for the true preacher's education and ordination are here displayed before us. It is by Christ's appearing to the man that he is prepared to preach the Lord Christ among men.

Our Lord's appearing to a man operates two ways: first, it makes him willing to be a servant, for that is the meaning of the word "minister." When the renewed mind beholds the Lord, it adores Him, and cries out, "What wilt thou have me to do?" The same heavenly vision qualifies the believer to act as a witness for Jesus. We cannot bear witness to that which we have never seen.

See you, then, dear friends, that in order to the conversion of those who are not yet saved, the Lord Jesus has been at work upon others, making them fit to be servants and witnesses, and He has used as His chief means of instruction the revealing of Himself. This is instructive, for it gives us a clear indication as to the best method of accomplishing the salvation of those around us. Beloved, if you want to win souls follow up this line of things. Soul-winning is generally accomplished not by argument, but by testimony. Bear witness to what you know, to what you feel, to the power of Christ to pacify the conscience and to change the life; bear, I say, your witness to Jesus, and you will have done that which God will bless to the opening of the eyes of the spiritually blind.

Further, dear friends, the man who is to win a soul for Christ must be continuously instructed of God. He is to be a witness not only of those things which he has seen, but also of those things in the which the Lord will yet appear unto him. The discipline and tuition which our Lord vouchsafes to His servant when he begins his witness, will not suffice him for the whole of his life; he must continue to be taught that he may continue to teach. You who wish to win souls for Jesus—and I know many of you do—must always sit at His feet yourselves. Your eyes must evermore be fixed upon your Master, so that His dear image may photograph itself perpetually upon your heart. It is poor work to talk of a Saviour whom we have not communed with for months, but it is blessed to come forth from His presence to describe His beauties.

Where all this is done, there yet remains somewhat more, namely, that God should constantly preserve His messenger; as He said to Paul; "Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee." Paul's life was always in danger, and yet for the Lord was his keeper. He was daily delivered unto death, and yet he was immortal till his life-work was complete. They stoned him and supposed that he was dead; but he rose up and began to cheer the brethren. Till his time came and his work was finished, the stormy sea could not drown him, the beasts of Ephesus could not devour him, the mob could not kill him, even sworn conspirators could not slay him. When he had finished his course, he submitted his neck to the headsman's sword; but till that moment he was delivered out of the mouth of the lion, and guarded from perils of robbers, perils of rivers, and perils by false brethren. So shall every true servant of Christ be kept as with a garrison from all evil.

We do not nowadays run risks of the kind which beset the apostle, but ours are more subtle and insinuating; yet the true servant of God shall be preserved from all evil. He shall be kept from the pride which cometh of visible success, and from the despondency which cometh of apparent failure; he shall be delivered from the temptations common to man, and from the peculiar temptations which compass him as a minister of Christ. He shall be delivered from the strife of tongues, and from the tumult of the people. If God has sent him, the devil cannot withstand him; he shall perform his mission in the conversion of those whom the Lord intends to save.

I have known the Lord bring men to Himself not only by His ministers, but by the simplest things and most common events.

A YOUNG WOMAN

utterly careless and godless, returned to her room one night where she had left her lamp burning, but, lo, it had gone out, and she was in darkness. As she sought for the lamp she remembered the parable of our Lord, and the cry of the foolish virgins, "Our lamps have gone out." She reflected that her lamp had gone out because she had forgotten to put oil to it that morning; and there and then, under the power of the word of God, she knelt down and gave her heart to Christ. A funeral knell, a tempest, a faded flower, a picture, have all been God's means of bringing His banished home to Himself. I am constantly meeting with instances of individuals who for years were careless, irreligious, dissipated, and vicious, and rose one Sabbath morning to waste the day as usual; but by some circumstance or other they were induced to hear Mr. Moody, or to turn in here, or to attend a theatre service; and there and then the Lord met with them. It is delightful to think that God can put any man or any creature into commission to carry out His purposes of love.

GOD'S WORK ON THE HEARER.

II. And now, secondly, we come to describe the work which is wrought in the hearer when God is saving him. It usually begins by illumination; the Lord sends His servant "to open their eyes." Men are born blind, and continue blind till by the power of Jesus sight is given to them. Opening the eye of the mind is not an operation which usually demands much time. In Paul's case we read, "Immediately there fell from his eyes as it had been scales; and he received sight forthwith, and arose, and was baptized." The mind sees truth on a sudden, the aspect of everything is altered; and the man has obtained a new faculty.

What a blessing it will be if the Lord has sent me to any of you this day that you may receive your sight and be filled with the Holy Ghost! A film shuts out the light from your souls so that you grope as blind men; but the Lord can at once remove it. Perhaps you are ignorant. If you did but know the truth, you would see by its light. Oh, that the Holy Spirit may teach you! Or your education and your surroundings have placed a film of prejudice over your eyes; if a candid, childlike spirit were given you, you would speedily see. Or possibly some favorite sin is like a cataract upon the eye of your conscience, and you cannot see the evil of sin, or the beauty of holiness, or the desirableness of being renewed. The Lord can take away these scales. Oh, that the Lord would cause you to see sin in its true colors, and holiness in its own splendor! Or it may be that unbelief darkens your soul. Those who will not believe cannot see the salvation of God.

The next thing which the minister is made to do is conversion; Paul was sent "to turn them from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God." Much depends upon the direction in which a man's face is turned. Here stands a blind man with his face to the darkness; if he goes forward he advances into blacker night; how needful then is that work of the blessed Spirit by which men are turned completely round, and their front is reversed! The darkness is now behind the convert, and the light is on ahead, so that every step he takes he advances toward the light, which increases upon his vision as he nears it. He has not received all the light he desires; but one thing he knows—whereas he was once blind he now sees.

As the soul is brought into a new element, so is it also brought under a new government. Translation has taken place; the man is translated from the power of darkness into the kingdom of God's dear Son, or, as our text has it, "from the power of Satan unto God." Notice, the man is turned "from the power of Satan," the tyrannic dominion, and crushing grasp of the evil, cunning, malicious, hateful prince of fallen angels. To the Lord whom he had forgotten he has turned, so that he thinks of Him, cares for Him, trusts in Him. What this—from the power of Satan to the power of God! Happy are the men who are the means of converting their fellows in this fashion!

Somebody says, "Well, I know there is such a fact as conversion, but I do not understand how it can be performed in a minute." I reply that I do not understand how regeneration, which is the secret cause of conversion, could occupy so long as a minute. Should not goodness rule at once? Two men are fighting, and we beg them to leave off. Do you recommend them to leave off gradually! Shall they take an hour or two over it? Why, they might kill one another in that time. A fire is about to consume your house—do you say to the firemen, "Get it out gradually"? If my house were on fire I should long to see the flame quenched at once. If anybody held a pistol at my head I should not say, "Take it away by degrees." I would wish him to remove the revolver at once. Yet all these things are matters which could be prolonged over a space of time without such risk as would be involved in a slow process of conversion.

Changes of mind such as are necessary to conversion had need be quick when sin is to be forsaken, for every moment deepens the guilt. I grant you that in many persons conversion appears to be gradual, and many things lead up to it as by an inclined plane; but as to the new birth and the reception of the divine life, there is a distinct line of demarkation—on that side of the line all is death, and on this side of it all is life. I cannot tell you when any one man crosses that line, but there must be an instant when he does so.

Together with conversion comes complete forgiveness. Read the passage—"that they may receive forgiveness of sins." When a man turns to God it is a proof that God has turned to him. When he hates his sins the Lord has put them away; as soon as ever he confesses and forsakes them they are blotted out forever. The complete turning of his mind from darkness to light is that God the righteous Judge has turned away His wrath from him. When the love of sin has gone the guilt of sin has gone also. Full conversion carries with it full pardon. The same moment that we receive Christ we "receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among them which are sanctified." Think of that; oh, that you may know all that it means! What a blessing to become an heir of God! Yet in the moment of forgiveness we receive power to become the sons of God. We are put among the children, and the children's portion is our portion.

And all this has for its certificate and mark of genuineness these words—"By faith that is in me." Those words are not merely appended to sanctification, though it is worth noticing that sanctification is by faith, since so many look at it as if it were by effort rather than by believing. But the whole process of salvation is by faith. It is all of faith from first to last. May God work it in your souls.

THE HEARER'S OWN WORK.

III. Now, I close by the last point, which is a work which must be done by the hearer himself. This text speaks of Paul being an instrument in the hands of God of opening men's eyes and turning them to God, that they may receive pardon, and so forth, in all which they seem to be passive; but in this latter verse they are called upon to be active—"That they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance." Never let us forget either the free agency of man or the purposes of God. God leaves us free agents, and yet in infinite wisdom He accomplishes His purposes and fulfils His decree. Grace reigns not over slaves, but over obedient children. The will of the Lord is done, and yet the responsibility and freedom of men are left untouched. How the Lord does this I do not know; He has never deigned to explain His infinity to us, nor need we desire that He should.

Dear hearer, if you would be saved, you must repent. It is not the work of God the Holy Ghost to repent for you, but to lead you to repent. The Holy Ghost has nothing to repent of, and it is a work which CANNOT BE DONE BY PROXY.

We cannot give you repentance as a doctor may inject morphia under the skin; it must be your own act and deed, your own feeling and emotion. You cannot be saved unless you personally turn from sin; it is the work of God's Holy Spirit to bring you so to do, but you have to repent with your own heart and mind. Remember your child's verse and attend to it—

"Repentance is to leave
The sins we loved before;
And show that we in earnest grieve
By doing so no more."

This is demanded of you by the preaching of the Gospel of Jesus Christ. "The times of this ignorance God winked at, but now commandeth all men everywhere to repent."

The next thing necessary is that you turn to God. Your prayer may be, "Turn thou me, and I shall be turned," but the command is, "Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die?" God will turn you, but you have willingly to yield, and thus turn yourself. We cannot take you by the ears and drag you into heaven. No person can be holy unwillingly, or happy unwillingly, or go to heaven unwillingly. The great turn needed is to turn to God. Now you turn away from Him, you do not like to think of Him; this morning you have heard quite as much as you can bear, and you will try and forget it, and so turn away from God. Would not it be grand news for some of you if there were no God, no law, no judgment to come, no heaven, no hell? It would create in you a sense of liberty, would it not? But as for some of us, it would be slavery to us and the worst calamity that could possibly happen, for we should have lost our joy, our comfort, our all.

And then to conclude, it is added they must do works meet for repentance; for wherever there is true faith there will be corresponding works. Now

"meet for repentance"? They are such as these—restitution if you have wronged any one, reconciliation if you are at enmity with any one, acknowledgment if you have spoken falsely, giving up of evil habits, and an earnest endeavor to be pure and holy. If you run into temptation wilfully that is not a work fit to go with repentance. If you commit again the sin which you have committed before, and return to it as a dog to its vomit, that is not a work meet for repentance. If you live in neglect of the means of grace, if you disregard the Sabbath, if you neglect prayer, if you omit the study of God's Word, these are not works that will agree with repentance. If you live wholly for yourself and your own personal aggrandisement, that is not a work meet for repentance. But if you do indeed repent, you must pray the Lord to change your whole life. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature;" that is the whole of it; you must be new from head to foot, new in every thought and word and deed.

After all, it turns on this, Will you have Christ or not? Dear hearers, I would like to press that question home upon you. I pray that you may be enabled to say, "I will put my trust in Him; I will at once accept Him as my Saviour." I am afraid you get so used to my voice that it does not strike you now as it used to do; but still the truth is the same whoever speaks it. If I talk nonsense, forget it; but if this be truth to which you are listening, I implore you to attend to it. Do not hear it and say, "Oh, yes," and then go away, and think no more of it. May God grant you grace at once really to repent, to turn to God, and to do works meet for repentance, through faith which is in Christ, for His dear name's sake. Amen.

ON March 27th THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gave a brief account of a valedictory meeting held on the occasion of the departure of five missionaries of the China Inland Mission. On the next page is a picture of the group of these devoted servants of Christ. They are the Misses Minchin, Whitchurch, and Fowler, and Messrs. Windsor and Hughesdon. We have already given a brief report of the speeches made on the occasion by the missionaries, but the remarks of one of them—Miss Minchin—present so clear a view of the spirit in which the workers in this mission go out, that they deserve a more extended publication, which we are now enabled to give. Miss Minchin said:

"I have been living in a town where Unitarianism, and cold, dry formalism have prevailed, and I went into the little lanes and open highways to preach Jesus; and He gave me the joy of seeing many brought to know Him, and now my work there has come to an end, and the mission-room is closed. It was taken from me. The owner of it said he was compelled to take it from me. For six months the Lord kept me in the dark, but peaceful, knowing that He would open the way, that the light would shine on my path. All that time I asked Him, 'Did He mean me to go abroad? Did He mean me to work in mission service in England?' and He opened many a door. In the last week in September, 1883, a clergyman said to me, 'I think the Lord has need of you in China.' 'Oh, no,' I said. 'I did want to go to China eight years ago; but the Lord shut the door—it cannot be for me to go now.' I had quite forgotten that I had promised the Lord, eight years ago, that if He made me strong I would go to China. He took me at my word. I said at first, 'It is impossible; it might be New Zealand or Australia, but I am too old to learn a new language,' and this gentleman said to me, 'Do not say that. The Lord can give you the power to learn the language. Do not think about your age; only ask whether the Lord will have you go.' I said, 'If He bids me go, I shall be ready; but it must be made very clear to me.'

"The next day I heard Mr. Hudson Taylor speak of the great needs of China, and gradually it came back to me, 'Why, you promised the Lord you would go to China eight years ago; and perhaps the Lord is taking you at your word, and would have you go.' I said, 'Lord, I am ready, only do make it quite clear that it is Thy will.'

"As I was pleading hour after hour through the night, and thinking of the people I loved so well in my little town in Devonshire, the Holy Spirit brought home this verse with power, and it was as if a human voice said it: 'Depart, for I will send thee far hence, unto the Gentiles.' I said, 'That is enough, Lord; if Thou art sending me, I am ready.'

"Now, I want your prayers that God will use me. I know He will make me happy, but I do want that He should be glorified and speak through me, that others may be brought to know the reality of trusting and following Him."

ROBERT WHEELER'S LIFE INSURANCE.

(See Illustration.)

WHEN Robert Wheeler came home from the war there was a wedding in the quiet New Hampshire village in which all the early years of his life had been spent. At one time it was thought he would never be seen there again. for in those sad lists which were published in the newspapers, which were read in the stores, and post-offices, and farmhouses, by anxious eyes, dreading lest a familiar name should appear there, Robert Wheeler's name was found under the head of wounded.

But the dreaded blow did not fall. Robert's wound was severe, and he was laid up in hospital several weeks, but he recovered. The war closed soon afterward, and he received a glad welcome home. He was not long in securing employment, for he was a good, steady, skilful workman, and the builder for whom he had worked before the war broke out, offered him his old place. Then he and Mary were married, loving each other none the less for the years of waiting during which Robert had been exposed to so much danger, and Mary had suffered so much anxiety.

The three years that followed were a happy time, allayed only by one grief that oppressed Mary day and night. During the war her distress and anxiety had driven her to prayer, and as she prayed for her lover she had been drawn toward God. Looking to Him continually as the Protector of the loved one, she had thought more of His character, His love and mercy, and so had come to see that she was sinful and unworthy. She was very miserable for a time until light broke upon her soul and she saw in Jesus the way of salvation. When Robert returned Mary was a very different girl from the light-hearted, merry, thoughtless maiden he left behind. There was a calm, deep happiness in her heart, a cheerful, sweet look in her eyes which he had never seen there before, and somehow, though she was changed, she seemed better and more lovable than before. Robert soon learned that "Mary had got religion," and though he did not care for such things himself, it seemed to him that she was the better for it. After they were married Mary tried to get Robert to seek for himself the blessing she enjoyed, and it was her failure in this effort that weighed so heavily on her mind and spoiled the happy days of her opening married life.

"Look here, Mary," he said one night, as he left the little workshop he had fitted up at his home where he worked at night, and came into the little parlor where she sat sewing, with their little girl playing at her feet. "Here is something to help you if I should die." He opened a paper he had in his hand, and handed it to her. He was a strong, stalwart man, and as he stood there, with his shirt-sleeves rolled up, the smell of pine shavings about him, and the perspiration of honest labor on his brow, he looked the picture of health and manly vigor.

Mary took the paper and read it. It was a policy of life-insurance, which guaranteed the payment of one thousand dollars to Robert's heirs in the event of his death. "That will be useful to you, little woman," he said, "if anything should happen to me. The messenger has just brought it from the office. I have not read it over yet; I suppose it's all right," he added, as he leaned over, resting on the table and scanned the document as Mary read it.

"This is very good of you, Robert. And you are going to deny yourself to pay these premiums for the sake of baby and me? It is like you, always kind and thoughtful for us, rather than for yourself."

"Oh, that is only a man's duty. I may be taken off any day, like poor Sam. Killed in a minute when that scaffold fell. I couldn't bear to think of you and Mamie going to the poor-house, or having to go out to work, if I should die."

"But you are young and strong, Robert. You went all through those dreadful battles and were not killed; it isn't likely you will get killed now."

"None of us can tell, little woman. I hope I shall live many a year yet, and see Mamie a grown woman, married and settled, but it's best to be on the safe side."

"Yes, it is, and that shows your thoughtfulness for us, Robert, and I thank you for it; but why don't you show the same thoughtfulness for yourself? You own that you may be taken off any day, and insuring your life proves that you believe it; don't you see that you ought to be on the safe side, too?"

"Ah, little woman, that is what you are always driving at; but there's time enough for me to get religion yet."

"You did not think there was any time to lose in providing for us, Robert. As you said, you may be taken off any day. If you are sure to live I may put this policy in the fire, and you need not deny yourself to pay the premiums; but if it is uncertain, why don't you do as I want you?"

"That is what you may call a dilemma, little logician. I am fairly caught. But I can't say I fancy becoming a gloomy, psalm-singing church-goer yet awhile!"

"Do you think me gloomy, Robert?"

"I think you the best and dearest wife a man ever had," said Robert kissing her. "I would not have you different from what you are for the world. But it is different for a man."

"I do not see why it should be different, Robert. I am sure you would be happier than you are now. Besides, you would be on the safe side."

"It isn't fair to keep on with that argument, Mary, after I owned I was beaten. You are hitting a man when he is down, and that's against the rules."

"Then I wont hit you so any more, Robert.

Let me put it another way. You hate meanness. Don't you think it's mean that after God kept you safely through the war, and gave you the wife you wanted, and the dearest child in the village, and a nice home, that you never say a single word of thanks to Him?"

"Well, Mary, you like to say God did it all, but didn't I work for the home myself?"

"Yes, Robert, you have, and worked well, but you couldn't have worked if God hadn't given you strength. And then, too, there is worse meanness. When Christ left heaven and came here to suffer and die that you might be happy in eternity, it is mean to take no notice of such love. He might as well never have died, so far as you are concerned."

"I never saw it in that light before, little woman. I'll think of it."

Robert did think of it, and the more he thought the more his meanness and sinfulness seemed to become apparent. Then, too, Mary's talk about the life policy convicted him of folly. He was not "on the safe side," and he knew it. The next Sunday Robert went to church, where he had not been since the day he was married. And after church Mary and he had another serious talk, and she prayed with him as she had prayed for him every day since she had seen the light herself. It was not many days afterward before she had the intense happiness of knowing that Robert was on the safe side. He, too, could say I know in whom I have believed, and that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day. And so Robert secured the best of all life policies.

An Ancient Niche in the Walls of Jerusalem.

THE WALLS OF JERUSALEM.

THE visitor to Jerusalem in our day finds but little in the city to render it in his eyes a fit type of the city of God, the golden city, which John saw descending out of heaven. Earthquakes have shaken its foundations, conquering armies have battered down its walls and palaces, and burned the gorgeous buildings which rendered it "the pride of the whole earth." Long years of submission to Turkish misgovernment, the most corrupt and effete, yet withal the most tyrannical of all despotisms, have wrought their inevitable work of rendering the city almost unfit for human habitation. But the student of the Bible finds here and there about Jerusalem remnants of its ancient strength and splendor. Such a fragment is depicted in our illustration. The old wall once formed part of the glorious city, and as the Christian traveller gazes upon it, he thinks with awe that prophets and apostles and even the Master Himself may have passed that way and looked upon its stones.

A graphic description of the city as it is now has been written by Dr. H. M. Field, of New York, who visited it last year. In the course of his narrative he writes: "Jerusalem is a city set on a hill, or rather an elevated plateau, half a mile above the level of the Mediterranean, and so cut off by deep ravines from the surrounding country, that it is like a bold headland jutting into the sea, and joined to the mainland only on its north-western side. This neck of land is not very large to be the site of a capital: only about a thousand acres in all, and to this must be confined the city that is built upon it. 'Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together.' It is 'compact' because it has no room to expand. In the days of its prosperity the whole plateau was densely populated. In the time of Christ the walls were four miles in extent; they are now but two and a half.

"To get a general impression of Jerusalem, there is but one way: 'Walk about Zion, and go round about her!' This direction we have obeyed literally, making the circuit of the city without and within, and going round on the top of the walls. Our first excursion was outside the walls, and the first natural feature of the environs we explored was the Valley of Hinnom! This was beginning low enough by a descent into Gehenna! Going out by the Jaffa Gate, we turned to the left and descended the slope, yet verging away to the opposite side of the valley, so that we might stand 'over against the city,' at a sufficient distance to obtain a general view. Here we stood facing Mount Zion, its bold height rising directly before us. That is a very ancient part of Jerusalem, for though it bears the name of the City of David, it was a city, a fortified town or castle, long before David was born. A little below the brow of yonder hill is still pointed out a wall that is supposed to have been built by the Jebusites, and close within the wall are old cisterns for securing rain water, which supplied the garrison.

"As we sauntered along the slopes of the valley, we found that we were walking among the graves of the dead, many of whom, Israelites in race, had lived and perhaps died far from the land of their fathers, but had desired to be buried under the walls of Jerusalem.

"Another day we made the circuit of the city on the top of the walls. From this point of vantage we looked down into the interior of the city, and saw how it was divided by the Tyropæan Valley, not only into halves but into quarters by side ravines projecting east and west, so that Jerusalem may be said to stand on four, as Rome stands on seven, hills.

"One of the most ancient monuments of the city is the Tower of David, a massive structure with walls of great strength and height. Though built by Herod it bears the name of the Hebrew king, from an old tradition that David's palace stood on that very spot. In the destruction of Jerusalem, this Tower was spared by Titus, and stood almost alone amid the mighty ruin; and so it has remained, sometimes dismantled and broken, yet reconstructed; and still it stands, and may stand until it sees our Lord coming again in the clouds of heaven."

A SERIAL STORY.

The Unknown Sufferer.

THE monotony of John Morley's household had been exceedingly disturbed by this strange incident, surpassing all the fanciful events which Hester sometimes allowed her imagination to invent. That such a dark and villainous crime should have been perpetrated at their very door, in the secure streets of an English town; that an assassin should have been lurking in the shadow of their walls, seemed too incredible for belief. Yet there lay the intended victim in her own chamber, the only one which had been ready for his reception; and the other stranger, who stated frankly who he was, and where he came from and was going to, was watching over him with the patient fidelity of an old friend. He had told her that the almost murdered man desired to keep the crime a secret! but this only increased her amazement.

John Morley had been scarcely moved from his imperturbable gloom, and appeared willing to accept the event as one of ordinary occurrence. He considered it his duty to appear every morning at the door of the patient's room, to inquire how he was getting on; when his voice seemed to have a troubling effect upon the almost insensible form of the sufferer. But having discharged this duty, he did not care to discuss the circumstance as Hester would have liked. He told her she must wait for the stranger's recovery before her questions could be answered; and then he hastened to shut himself up with his books. He was no more communicative with the neighbors, who, hearing various confused rumors, found some excuse for invading his solitude. A gentleman, who was a stranger to him, had met with a serious accident at his door; and a friend of his had asked shelter and help for him. That was all he knew, said John Morley. Neither had Hester an opportunity of talking over the marvellous occurrence with Lawson, for he had been unaccountably absent from his workshop for two days. Such a thing had never happened before in Hester's memory; except about six months ago, when he had travelled to Southampton to meet his mother, who had lived till then with her only daughter in a small town in Burgundy. The third morning, when she found the attic empty, she resolved to seek Lawson out in his own home and ascertain the cause of his absence.

She had never been to Lawson's dwelling, and, strange to say, scarcely knew where he lived. She had been so accustomed to know that he was up-stairs in the attic the first thing in the morning and the last at night, that she had hardly ever thought of where he went to when he left the house; while he had never mentioned his own affairs, more than to tell her that his mother was coming over to him now her daughter was dead. All that Hester knew was that they lived somewhere in a court, which had its entrance nearly opposite the chapel at the top of the old-fashioned street.

She found admission to the court by a low narrow passage between two shops, where she had to walk carefully in semi-obscurity, until she came to a long close strip of rough pavement, around which were built tall thin houses, three stories high, and but one room in breadth. A dull and murky winter sky seemed to lie flat upon the roofs, closing them in with its gray and cold covering. Most of them were untenanted, as was plainly shown by their broken panes and rotting casements; and Hester directed her steps toward a door which had "Public Bakehouse" painted above it. There was a small bankrupt-looking shop on the ground floor; and, as Hester entered it, a middle-aged woman, wiping the dough from her hands, came forward to attend to her.

"Can you tell me where Lawson, Mr. Morley's bookbinder, lives?" she inquired.

"He lives here, miss," she answered, "in the top story, both rooms, he and madam. You don't know madam, perhaps, miss?"

"Not at all," said Hester, with a new sentiment of curiosity.

"She's a foreigner," continued the woman, mysteriously. "I charge a higher rent for that. Not that she's like a good many of them French. She's as clean as a nut; but she's queer. She has wood-ashes out of my oven, and puts 'em in a box, and sets it under her petticoats, instead of having a fire; which she'll be burned to death some day. It's six months since she's been here, and she's never set foot out of doors yet. She hasn't got a bonnet, I think; only a queer tall cap, as sets all the children to laugh. She can't speak a word of English, nor we a word of French; so we can't have much to do with one another, you know."

"She must have been very dull and lonely," said Hester, self-reproachfully.

"No, bless you, miss!" answered the shopwoman; "she's as gay as can be, and sings like an old canary. You just hark up here."

She opened a door at the foot of a flight of steps which was profoundly dark, and Hester heard a clear, pleasant old voice, failing a little in the higher notes, but set to a merry tune.

"That's the way up, miss," said the woman; "but as you've never been before, I'll go on first and show you the room."

Besides being in dense darkness, the staircase was a winding one, with no single step straight, and a thick rope, rather sticky and dirty to the touch, served in the stead of bannisters. Beyond a faint glimmer from the open door below, there was not a gleam of light; and Hester only knew she was getting near the top by the increasing shrillness and vigor of the cheery song.

"I forgot to ask you if Lawson was at home," she said, checking her guide as she was about to knock at the door of the room from whence the sound proceeded. She had learned French from a master, and could read it fluently; but she was a little afraid of encountering some living Frenchwoman, who, no doubt, could speak only in an unintelligible patois.

"Oh, he's at home," was the answer; "he's been at home these two or three days, ill. Mr. Lawson, here's a young lady come to see you and madam."

The song ceased the instant the door was opened; and a small, round, comely old woman met Hester, with a face as clear-cut and fresh and free from wrinkles as her own. She was courtesying, gesticulating, and talking with as much ease and fluency in her limbs as in her tongue. Hester stood confused and abashed, but as she advanced farther into the room, the familiar voice of Lawson made itself heard.

"It is madame, my mother, Miss Hester," he said; "she is telling you that you are welcome."

He was seated near an open hearth, upon which burned a few smoky coals, held together by rusty hand-irons. The room, to English eyes, looked comfortless, even for the abode of a workman. The only good piece of furniture was a bed set in one corner, which was covered with a handsome counterpane of some scarlet stuff, with a large square pillow the cover of which was as white as snow, resting upon it. For the rest, the chamber was poverty-stricken and squalid. A small window looked out upon the court, and in two other places in the sloping roof, a pane of glass had been let in, through which the gray cold canopy of the sky could be seen. Three small crucifixes ornamented the bare mantel-shelf, and a chaplet of brown beads hung on a wall near them, balanced on the other side by a portrait, painted in showy colors, of a French actress in her theatrical costume.

Hester could not make all these observations at once, for her attention was concentrated upon Lawson. He looked ghastly, his face being more meagre and bleak than ever. He could scarcely raise himself from his seat, for his limbs trembled like those of a person barely recovered from some severe shock; and while he stood, he was obliged to support himself by the back of his chair.

"I'm not ill, Miss Hester," he said, hastily; "it's only upon my nerves. I shall be all right in a day or two; but it was of no use coming to my work when I could do nothing. Look here."

He tried to hold out his hand, but it shook as if stricken with palsy; and when she looked him in the face, the tears were rolling fast down his hollow cheeks.

"Lawson," she said, sorrowfully, "you have been taking opium again."

"It's only on the nerves, Miss Hester," he sobbed; "try to talk a bit to madame, my dear."

She turned away to look again at Lawson's strange mother. The old Frenchwoman was dressed well and tastily, though her clothes were poor; and she wore a picturesque cap, rivalling the pillow-case in whiteness. All her gestures were lively and flexible, as if nothing of the rigidity of old age had seized upon her joints. She motioned to Hester to take a seat beside her, and chuckled merrily to herself as she complied.

"If you would talk slowly," said Hester, trying timidly her own powers, "perhaps I could understand you a little."

"Seigneur!" she cried, "you speak my language! Ah! it is well; very well. Oh, what happiness! I will speak to you very slowly in my own tongue."

The clean old face, with its complexion as soft as a child's, was flushed with a bright color; and her plump, shapely hands were raised in astonishment and delight.

"Ah, chère Mademoiselle!" she exclaimed, beginning slowly, but falling quickly into a rapidity of utterance which bewildered Hester; "it is these six months that I have been here, and I have never heard a word of my own language except from my son; never, never! Ah! but it is sad; but when I feel ennui, I sing a little song to myself, or I say a little prayer to one of the dear little saints, and it is past, quite past, I assure you. My son is very good to me, and he earns a great deal of money in the service of monsieur, your father: twenty francs a week, and sometimes twenty-five."

"Do you like England?" inquired Hester, who felt her conversational powers limited, and was glad to ask any question which could show an interest in the foreigner.

"Bah!" answered Madame with a grimace, "I was too old to leave my country for another. I never thought of quitting France, though I married myself to an Englishman. I would not come with him when he left Paris; but when my daughter was dead, I came to finish my life with my son, or take him back with me to Burgundy, where the sun shines and the grapes ripen. Here the sun never shines, but it peeps out sometimes in the summer. My son has put that glass in to catch the sunshine for me; and when we are rich we are going home to Burgundy."

Lawson shook his head furtively, as if saying, "No."

"Yes, yes, yes!" cried the old lady, whose quick eyes caught her son's by-play. "I say, yes. I will not die out of Burgundy. I could not bear to be shut up here, but for that."

"But why do you shut yourself up?" asked Hester.

"Why go out?" she said, shrugging her shoulders; "no sun, no warmth, no friends, no gayety. The bad children laughing at me! All the world strange, and nobody to speak a word to me. No, no; I can sing to myself here, and be as gay as I please all day long. Shall I sing a little song to you, my dear?"

She settled herself upon her chair, so as to give her hands free scope to accompany her song, with appropriate gestures. A hundred little wrinkles as fine as thread, puckered about the corners of her eyes, and her tongue so thrilled and quavered and shook between her almost toothless gums, that Hester watched its rapid movement with amazement. When her song was ended, she clapped her own hands in applause, and hugged herself with her old arms, while she laughed and nodded merrily.

Madame Lawson presented so strange a contrast to her son that Hester was almost lost in wonder. Lawson had partially recovered himself, and was looking toward her with an expression which plainly enough asked the meaning of her unexpected visit. She was glad to regain the free use of her own tongue, and she spoke in her turn with a volubility and fluency to which the Frenchwoman listened with marks of lively astonishment and admiration.

"Lawson," she said, "have you heard nothing of what happened to us two nights ago? Do you know that some stranger, a man, was found almost dead at our very door? Have you heard nothing of it?"

"No," he answered, still apathetic from the use of the drug he had taken; "what became of him?"

"Another stranger who was passing by found him on the pavement, and brought him into our house. My father and I did all we could to help, and we carried him up-stairs to my room. The other stranger—I know his name now, Mr. Grant—is a surgeon, and knew exactly what to do, and he is staying with him still. Isn't it very strange, Lawson?"

Lawson's eyes regained more brightness as Hester spoke, and he appeared to shake off a little of his lethargy as he tried to ponder over the news.

"Do you know who it is?" he asked.

"No," said Hester, "he is quite a stranger to us; a man with a thick brown beard and mustache; he looks a little like a foreigner. My father knows nothing of him; how should he?"

"How often has he seen him?" inquired Lawson, in a sharp, quick tone of interest.

"Only when he was carried in almost dead," she replied; "neither of us have seen him since. Mr. Grant does everything for him. But, O Lawson! it was a dreadful sight. I should have thought such a thing could never have happened in our town. He was nearly, very nearly, killed by some murderer."

Hester stopped, shuddering at the recollection, and Lawson did not speak for a minute or two.

"The master was at home when it happened?" he asked.

"He had come in only a few minutes before," said Hester; "he says he did not see anybody lying on the pavement then; but he would never see anything—my poor father! Besides, it might have been done after he was in the house; nobody knows. And, Lawson, what do you think? he is not going to let the police know anything about it."

"Not let the police know!" echoed Lawson.

"No; Mr. Grant says he knows who struck him, and he wishes to screen him, and keep it all a secret."

"He is getting over it, then," said Lawson.

"Yes; Mr. Grant says he will be able to get up in a few days. I shall see him then, and try if he will not tell me more about it. I am very curious, and I never knew what it was to be curious before."

Hester shook her head sagely, and laughed a little at her own unusual state of mind; but Lawson remained plunged in thought for some time. At last he looked up into her face with an air of deep anxiety.

"Miss Hester," he said, "don't you try to find out anything. There's many a thing had better remain a secret to you all your life. I should like to know who this man is; but don't you go asking him, or Mr. Grant either. Leave well alone, Miss Hester."

She was neither inclined nor prepared to obey him; but she did not provoke any further remonstrance by putting her dissent into words. In her solitary and self-directed life, Hester had learned to choose her own path without looking to any authority. She rose to take her leave, promising the old woman to come again soon to see her, and submitting with a rare and sweet smile to being kissed by her upon both cheeks, though her color came and her face burned. It was so many years since any lips had touched her cheek, and then it had been Rose who had kissed her. Lawson preceded her down the winding staircase, and up the narrow entry into the street.

"I shall be back at work in the morning, Miss Hester," he said; "and I should very much like to set eyes on this gentleman."

VICTORY OVER DEATH.

S. S. Lesson for May 11, 1 Cor. 15 : 50-58. Golden Text, verse 58. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Man Created to Live not to Die—Death the Result of Sin—Man's Natural Love of Life—Encouraged by Promises—Victory Over Death when Jesus Comes—Foretaste of the Change—The Keys of Death—Wrested by Christ from Satan—Death a Promotion—No Interruption—The Sting Taken Away—Fear of Death Removed—Victory Assured.

DEATH is foreign to our nature. God did not create man to die, but to live; sin and death are inseparably connected. When God breathed into man's nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul, He only mentioned death as the penalty of sin not as a necessity of his being. "By one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men," and so it happened that "it is appointed unto men once to die" (Rom. 5 : 12; Heb. 9 : 27). But God has encouraged the natural love of life which is in all men by His repeated promises. "He is thy Life, and the length of thy days" (Deut. 30 : 20). "He asked life of Thee, and Thou gavest it him, even length of days forever and ever" (Ps. 21 : 4). "I will dwell in the house of the Lord" [to length of days] (Ps. 23 : 6, margin), says David. "With long life will I satisfy him" who hath "set his love upon Me," and hath "known my name" (Ps. 91 : 14-16). The wise man says of the commandments, "Length of days, and long life, and peace, shall they add unto thee," and that "length of days" is in the right hand of divine wisdom (Prov. 3 : 2, 16).

These promises are not confined to the Old Testament. Paul writes to the Ephesians, "Honor thy father and mother; which is the first commandment with promise; that it may be well with thee, and thou mayest live long on the earth" (Eph. 6 : 2, 3). Paul, writing to the Corinthians, declares that the want of discerning the Lord's body in breaking of bread was the cause that many were weak and sickly among them, and many slept (1 Cor. 11 : 30).

How then are we to understand the declaration of the same Apostle that to depart and be with Christ is far better (Phil. 1 : 23)? Perhaps the experience of just on the borderland between life and death may explain this. The Lord showed her both sides of service—the earth side and the heaven side. The work was one, the Leader was One, but on the heaven side all were working in the light which came from the person of Jesus. Those on earth doing the same service were themselves in the light, but they did not see it; they were working in the dark, they were veiled by the flesh. She asked the Lord why she should desire to live, if service in heaven was so much more glorious, and He told her she would miss nothing if she were to die and exchange service on earth for service in heaven, but He would miss a heart which trusted Him against appearances. The service in heaven is all by sight, that on earth is all by faith, and He prizes hearts which can trust Him in the dark.

"The last enemy that shall be destroyed is death" (1 Cor. 15 : 26). Many who do not quite understand a full salvation from condemnation, from the power and presence of sin, and from sickness, tell us we are inconsistent, for that if it be true that Christ's redemption work touches sickness, it ought to touch death too. Thank God, it does, but the manifestation of Christ's power over death will only be again. Enoch and Elijah passed from the corruptible to the incorruptible without dying, and so will those who shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air when He comes again. "By faith Enoch was translated that He should not see death" (Heb. 11 : 5). By faith will those be translated who shall be caught away when Jesus comes. "This I say, brethren, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption. Behold, I shew you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

Oh, how much of blessed change do we know already! How many of us have sin for righteousness, shame for glory, sorrow for joy, distress for peace, defeat for victory, and many of us sickness for health, ourselves for Himself! We have known what it was to wait upon the Lord, and change our strength, spirit, soul, and body (Isa. 40 : 31); letting Him have our weakness and taking hold of His strength. We have changed our foolishness for His wisdom, and He of God is made unto us "the power of God and the wisdom of God" (1 Cor. 1 : 24). But it yet remains for us to be changed from corruptible to incorruptible; from what we now are to what Christ was, and what also Moses and Elias were on the mount of the transfiguration. Then and only then will death be conquered. "When this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory."

JESUS HAS THE KEYS.

But, thank God, he who had the power of death, even the devil (Heb. 2 : 14), holds that power no longer. "The keys of hell and of death" are in the hands of his Conqueror, who has delivered "them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage" (Heb. 2 : 15). How can one who has given all he is and has to Jesus continue to fear death? Before Jesus passed through death one can well understand the horrible dread of an unknown, untried future, especially when a consciousness of having sinned and uncertainty about pardon reigned. But praise God! Christ "hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel" (II Tim. 1 : 10).

"Abolished death," you will say, "while death is a daily fact?" Yes, because to him that believeth all its power, all its sting, is gone. It is simply promotion from earth service to heaven service, from faith to sight, from victory by faith to victory visible; who can dread such a transition? To the unbeliever death is the loss of all he has; friends, money, honor, all his plans and projects must be left behind; no wonder he dreads death. But to him who is cleansed from all sin, who is a living sacrifice to God, whose treasure is already in heaven, whose friends are either there or on the way, who has no self-made plans, but who agrees with God's plans which he willingly falls into, death is gain to him if God should call him to die. Death would be but a continuation of the eternal life which he is already living. "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

"The sting of death is sin." Unfaithful believers often fear death more than open sinners, because their consciences are no longer paralyzed, and they are conscious that there is something which needs to be set right with God before they can say with Paul they have "a desire to depart . . . which is far better." Beloved, if this is so with any reader of these words, will you remain thus with something wrong in your relations to God? Will you let sin dishonor Him and rob you of your peace? Like a loving Father He has the deepest compassion for you, and stands ready at this moment to put the wrong thing right. But He must have your co-operation. Are you willing to yield yourself unto Him? Will you so give yourself to Him as to reserve no consideration for yourself, no self-pity? Will you take everything which comes, from whatsoever quarter, as being indeed the loving permission of your Father, and thank Him for it? Will you thus wholly yield yourself, your will, your choices, your all to God? And then will you take as yours the blood of Jesus Christ which cleanseth from all sin? Will you receive as yours the Holy Spirit to dwell in you and keep you? And will you now go and tell God so, and have the matter fairly settled with Him? If you will and do, you will wonder where your

to. You will wonder why you have lost all your dread of circumstances and people, you will see by instinct the hand of God everywhere directing everything, and your life will be all sunshine. "The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."

It is but little that death is mentioned in the New Testament. Our thoughts are rather led on to the coming of the Lord, which is constantly spoken of throughout God's Word. But to be ready for His coming is to be ready for death, if the Lord's coming does not first take place. In view of either, Paul exhorts by the Holy Ghost, "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

An Earthquake of Considerable Force was felt in the eastern counties of England on April 22d. The town of Colchester, in Essex, was the centre of the disturbance and there the damage to public buildings and private property was serious. The concussion occurred at half-past nine in the morning and lasted half a minute. The first symptom was a deep rumbling sound. This was speedily followed by a quaking and shaking of all the buildings. The church bells sounded as though swayed by unseen hands. The tall chimney-stacks of the factories crashed in ruins to the earth, and other lofty structures were destroyed. The spire of one of the largest churches in the city, one hundred and fifty feet in height, fell with an awful crash to the ground. In one part of the city a fire was caused by the shock. In the private houses in Colchester the greatest confusion prevailed. Tables were overturned, chairs swayed and nodded and then fell sprawling upon the floor. The china and glassware in cupboards and sideboards rattled together and were frequently shattered, while pictures and other ornaments upon the walls were loosened from their fastenings and fell to the floor. The people were terror-stricken. Men, women and children rushed shrieking into the streets, where their agonized cries and pale faces made a most impressive scene. The houses were so badly shaken that traffic was forbidden in some of the streets on the day after the shock. Other towns also suffered, though more slightly, and the shock was perceptible in some parts of London. It is the severest earthquake on record since the reign of Elizabeth at the close of the sixteenth century.

Rumors of Disasters and Massacres in the Soudan were in circulation last week. It was stated that Shendy had fallen, and the inhabitants to the number of two thousand had been put to the sword. Later telegrams said that the number had been exaggerated and that the loss was but slight. Reliable intelligence as to the capture of that point, and as to General Gordon's situation has not been published. Serious apprehensions for that commander's safety are, however, entertained. The British Government admit that they are responsible for his safety, and Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons that he was in no danger at Khartoum. It is now rumored that an expedition will be sent to his relief in the autumn. The military authorities believe that it would be impossible to convey a British force across the desert lying between Suakim and Khartoum during the hot weather.

The Proposals for a European Conference on the Egyptian question are not cordially received by the Powers consulted on the subject. The British Government desire to restrict the questions to be submitted to the Conference to the financial situation. Egypt, it appears, is in pressing need of a loan of forty million dollars, which could not be raised unless her foreign creditors grant some concession of their claims. The British Government propose the Conference with the view of obtaining that concession. France and Turkey, on the other hand, demand that the whole question of the government of Egypt shall be submitted to the Conference.

At the Examination of Eagan, the Irishman who was arrested in England as an accomplice of Daly the dynamiter, the prosecuting lawyer stated that the police had found a tin can belonging to Eagan containing treasonable documents. One, dated 1869, gives an explanation of the constitution of the Irish Republic. Another is a manifesto proclaiming that in case England should become involved in war Ireland must rise, or Irish nationality would become a byword and a reproach. The brethren are exhorted to provide themselves with arms, to practice shooting and to subscribe money for the purchase of war materials. They are urged to work quietly but determinedly. Besides these documents, the police also found samples of cartridges and arms. The tin can was found in Eagan's garden. In it was a book containing the rules of the Brotherhood. Other important disclosures are expected to be made at the trial of the accused men.

The Annual Financial Statement was Presented to the British House of Commons by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Friday. It appears that the national debt was reduced last year by $42,500,000. The revenue derived from the sale of beer increased during the year, while that derived from spirits decreased. The total income of the year was $436,000,000, and the surplus of income over expenditure was $1,315,000. Among the projects proposed by the Secretary was one to reduce the value of the smaller gold coin by one tenth. The half sovereign would thus be worth nine shillings instead of ten. The proposal has already aroused opposition.

A Vigorous War on Socialism has been Commenced in Germany. New laws of a very stringent character have been introduced in the Reichstag and favorably reported by the committee. These laws will enable the government to act more promptly against the socialists and to take precautions against dynamiters and to punish them if detected. The anticipated effect of the new law is to prevent unification and concerted action among the various orders of anarchists within the German Empire. The German police are also operating in conjunction with the police of other countries to frustrate the attempts now being made to unite the dynamiters and revolutionists in a common brotherhood.

The Misgovernment of Russia which has Encouraged and stimulated the development of Nihilism has been recently exposed in a work entitled "Underground Russia." The author who writes under the name of Stepniak has been furnishing to the newspapers other instances of the tyranny and brutality of officials. The following is one of them: A Councillor of State and physician, Dr. Deduline, accompanied by his wife, who was enciente, alighted from a tramway carriage. Some bystanders insulted Mme. Deduline, and tried to hustle her, for what reason is not stated. Dr. Deduline appealed to a city sergeant for protection. Instead of receiving it, his wife and he were set upon by the policeman and some assistants, thrown into a droshky, where the lady was kept prostrate under the brutal driver's feet and kicked until they reached the police-station. They were further ill-treated there, and finally locked up in a cell. When the "mistake" was found out—namely, that it was a Councillor of State and his wife who had been thus dealt with—they were "invited" to depart, with the remark that their arrest "had been caused by a misunderstanding." This, if we are to believe Stepniak, was only one of the constantly-occurring wanton outrages perpetrated by the Russian police out of sheer insolence of office.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services in London continue to attract enormous crowds and are being signally blessed. During the services at Kensington the scene within the capacious hall varied but little from night to night, the place being usually thronged, the seats immediately in front of the platform being reserved for workingmen, whose interest and attention seemed riveted, while now and then a note of appreciation escaped the lips of one who felt the power of the speaker's words. One evening a workingman said to a Christian worker, "It's my last night in London, sir. I am going to start for Canada to-morrow, as I can't get on here; but, please God, I'll never forget what I've heard in there. I've been abroad before, sir, but I never spent my last evening like I have to-night." The poor fellow, an intelligent young Irishman, of six-and-twenty, had been a confirmed drunkard from fifteen years of age. He was reclaimed a few months ago, but has many times since felt the awful craving for drink. He was much encouraged by Mr. Moody's assurance that God was able and willing even to take this appetite entirely away. Among those who were drawn to the inquiry-room, after Mr. Moody's address on the subject of "Assurance," was the son of the Maharajah Dhuleep Singh, and it was stated that he has been led to decision for Christ.

The McAll Missions in France were much blessed during the past year. At a recent meeting Mr. McAll said that the past twelve months had been marked by many tokens of God's goodness, and the work was continually extending. They had now ninety-one mission stations in different parts of France, about ten of these having been opened in the past year. One station had also been opened in Corsica, and two in Algiers. With regard to many of these stations, especially in Paris, whatever novelty there was had long since passed away, and yet, instead of losing ground, they were continually gaining; there had been an increase in attendance from 500,000 in 1882 to 554,000 in 1883, and the total attendances throughout France had been nearly 1,000,000. Between 14,000, and 15,000 visits had also been made to the homes of the people, and there had been a large circulation of Testaments and religious tracts. Acknowledging the work also done by Miss de Broen in Belleville, by Mr. Gibson, and Pastor Armand de Lille, he went on to say that the work among the children had been especially blessed; many scholars had become teachers, and devoted themselves to the furtherance of the work of the Gospel.

A Japanese Chief of Police was Recently led to confess Christ as his Saviour. He became very active in Christian work, as well as constant in his attendance upon the Christian services. When this came to the notice of the Prefect of the province, he privately sent him word that he must give up his Christianity or else resign his office. The chief remonstrated, and maintained that, so far from his religion having interfered with the discharge of his duties, it had made him more faithful. His remonstrance proved unavailing, and he was again informed that he must resign. This time, thinking there was no escape, he sent in his resignation. So far as appears, there was no attempt made to show that he had neglected his duty, or was, in any respect, an inefficient officer. On the contrary, he was regarded as thoroughly competent and faithful. His prompt decision has led to a great increase of interest in Christianity.

THE name of Potter is an honored one in the Protestant Episcopal Church and in society. Two bishops of that name beside the subject of our sketch, have lived active and useful lives, gaining the respect and love of the clergy and laity of the dioceses they ruled; and another representative of the family is now the worthy President of Union College. General Robert P. Potter was one of the heroes of the war in which he was severely wounded, and Clarkson N. Potter made a record in Congress worthy of the family name, and one which would probably have been more brilliant still, had he not been cut down in the prime of life.

The distinguishing characteristic of the family is vigorous intellectual power; but that characteristic has been allied in each member of it with purity of character and with that interest in the poor, and concern for their spiritual and temporal advancement which our Saviour enjoined on His followers. Earnest has always had for this family irresistible attractions, and the female, as well as the male members of it, have thrown their energies with a will into any enterprise which had for its object the mitigation of the miseries of the poor and their elevation through the only safe way—the way of righteousness and Christian principle. Though moving in the higher ranks of society they have always been accessible to the poor and needy, who have ever found sympathy and liberal help ready at their call. This trait is especially prominent in the subject of our sketch, who, when he was the pastor of the aristocratic congregation of Grace Church, New York, used his influence in training the rich to give liberally, and exerted himself, at no small cost of time and labor, in applying their gifts to the best purpose. Grace Church under his care became the centre of Christian activity, from which radiated innumerable agencies of religious benevolence. It was such work, conjoined with many excellences of character, which the world and the Church alike appreciate, that evoked so general an expression of approval from the secular press and the religious press of all denominations, when it was announced that Dr. Potter had been elected to the Episcopate.

The Right Rev. Henry Codman Potter, D.D., LL.D., was born in 1836. His father, Dr. Alonzo Potter, was then residing at Schenectady, N. Y., occupying the distinguished and responsible position of Vice-President and virtual President of Union College, of which his venerable father-in-law, Dr. Eliphalet Nott, was the actual President. Ten years later Dr. Alonzo Potter was elected Bishop of Pennsylvania in succession to Dr. Henry Ustick Onderdonk. His administration of the diocese was most successful. A prominent journalist, describing that era of church life, says: "Bishop Alonzo Potter not only resuscitated the distracted and disheartened Church, by the dignity and force of his manly eloquence, by his deep practical wisdom, as well as by the symmetry and spiritual vigor of his Christian life, but it at the same time constituted a new era in the relations of the Episcopal Church to the larger life of the community. He recognized the claims of modern science to the consideration of Christian men, and pointed out its kinship with divine revelation and the supernatural. To his efforts in developing and bringing into relation the foremost minds of the Episcopal Church are largely due the Church congresses which of late years have expanded the influence of that Church and given it a commanding position."

A PIONEER TEMPERANCE BISHOP.

The new Bishop of Pennsylvania astonished his clerical and lay friends by a peculiarity rare in that day. He declared himself a total abstainer, and urged the same course on his clergy as a Christian duty. There were not a few people then who regarded him as a fanatic on that subject. The total abstinence doctrine and practice was new and unfashionable, a wise practice for the poor drunkard, but a needless self-denial for men who could control their appetites. It needed considerable courage to adhere to the principle in those times, and the total abstainer, especially if he belonged to the higher ranks of society, had to continually defend his position from the assaults of argument and ridicule. But the good bishop did not lack courage. He was fully convinced that he was right, and he lived to see the clergy of all denominations entering on the course in which he had the honor of being a pioneer. Who can tell how much of the present misery and sin, which have been the harvest of the liquor traffic, might have been spared to this generation, had the late Bishop of Pennsylvania received in his day the assistance and support instead of the opposition of his brethren! One of the most encouraging signs of our day in this respect is the earnestness with which the clergy, by precept and example, are helping forward the temperance work, so that it is more rare to find a clergyman who is not a total abstainer than it was half a century ago to find one who was a total abstainer.

The bishop sent his son to the Episcopal Academy of Philadelphia for his preparatory studies, after which he went to Union College. He commenced life as thereby obtaining that practical knowledge of business life which has enabled him to address with force and point the merchants and business men who have flocked to his ministry. What religion can do for the man engaged in the hard struggle of commercial life; how profound is the need of such men for the restraining, controlling, and tranquillizing influences of Christianity, the young man learned at his desk. When, in later years, the bankers of the city, the brokers from Wall Street, and the merchants and importers of the exchanges sat under his ministry, Dr. Potter did not have to apply his Gospel message at random, but recollecting the experience of his adolescence he could show them how the religion of Christ entered into the struggles of life, could preserve them from falling, and was full of blessing for the life that now is, as well as for that which is to come.

Business pursuits were not, however, to be the life-work of the young clerk. His desire to consecrate himself and his life to the Master's service soon asserted itself, and he applied for admission to the Episcopal Seminary, Fairfax County, Virginia, to prepare himself for the work of the ministry. He graduated there in 1857, and at the age of twenty-two was ordained deacon.

HIS FIRST CHARGE

was the small parish of Greensburg, Westmoreland County, Penn. He preached his earliest sermons in Christ Church in that village, and God blessed his labors abundantly. After a successful pastorate of two years he was called to St. John's Church, Troy, N. Y. There he labored for seven years, entering vigorously into practical work among the poor, and setting on foot many agencies of usefulness. Those years were happy ones, developing his powers as a preacher and a worker, and they were rich in fruit for his Master.

It was very reluctantly that Dr. Potter quitted Troy. In 1862 he received a call to Christ's Church, Cincinnati, which would have been from its superior position and larger income tempting to many a young man of twenty-seven; but he declined it. The next year brought him the offer of the Presidency of Kenyon College, Ohio, a position always attractive to men of ripe scholarship and vigorous intellect; that, too, he declined. He also rejected an offer of the pastorate of St. Paul's Church, Albany, N. Y. At length, in May, 1866, his people learned with deep regret that the time had come when they must part from their beloved minister. Dr. Potter (he had by this time received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from his alma mater, Union College) became the assistant minister of Trinity Church, Boston, Mass., where he labored for two years. At the end of that time he was called to the

RECTORSHIP OF GRACE CHURCH,

New York City, and entered upon his work there in May, 1868. He succeeded Dr. Thomas H. Taylor, of South Carolina, who had been the rector of Grace Church for thirty-four years. It was during Dr. Taylor's rectorship that Grace Church was built on its present site of Broadway and Tenth Street, just at the point where Broadway makes its departure toward the west. The building cost $100,000, and was consecrated March 7th, 1846. Prior to that the congregation had worshipped in a church at the corner of Broadway and Rector Street, near the present Trinity Church. Four years after Dr. Potter became its rector, the building was burned, and the present beautiful edifice was erected on its site.

Dr. Potter on entering on his rectorship commenced that course of Christian activity which has made the name of Grace Church famous throughout the city. It was, as we have said, a fashionable and aristocratic congregation, but within half a score of blocks on every side of the church there is much poverty and squalid misery. The new rector was able to utilize all the funds he could get in mission chapels and in supporting Christian workers. The congregation responded nobly to his appeals, and from that time forward the progress has been rapid and aggressive. The following figures, published last year, show how earnestly Dr. Potter labored in his various enterprises, and how loyally his people aided him with funds: In the ten years before 1875 the church contributions amounted to $1,082,368, and for the last ten years the contributions have averaged $150,000 annually. Last year they were $106,866.22. Of this last sum $17,585.59 was devoted to domestic missions, $5,296.71 to foreign missions, and $12,469.81 to mission work in this city. None of the money contributed was spent upon Grace Church itself. The church has a membership at present of 1150 persons. In 1868, when Dr. Potter became rector, there were seventy vacant pews. Now every sitting is occupied, and there are ninety families waiting for an opportunity to rent pews. There are 1500 children in all of the Sunday-schools of the parish and 800 in the parent school. A gift of $5000 was recently given to the parish by a gentleman who refuses to allow his name to be published, for the purpose of building "Grace House-by-the-Sea" as a summer home for poor children. A good site has been secured at Far Rockaway, plans have been made for the building, and it will be built at once.

THE EPISCOPATE.

On Wednesday, September 26th, 1883, the one hundredth annual convention of the Protestant Episcopal Diocese of New York assembled in St. Augustine's Chapel, East Houston Street. The delegates present, clerical and lay, numbered about 750. After the opening exercises a letter was read from the venerable Bishop of New York, the Right Rev. Horatio Potter, who is the uncle of the subject of our sketch. The letter informed the convention that it was necessary that some action should be taken to relieve him of the administration of the diocese. He was eighty-one years old, and had been bishop for twenty-nine years. In addition to the infirmities of age, Dr. Horatio Potter had suffered from a severe attack of pneumonia. He said in his letter to the convention: "It is very evident to me, and it is ed the opinion of my physician, that even y life should be considerably prolonged, I never have the physical strength that is ssary to conduct the fatigues and exposures dent to the active duties of this office. It herefore, after mature deliberation and with single desire for the best interests of the ese, that I address the Standing Committee ugh their chairman, communicating these s to them and requesting them to make them wn to the diocese at the approaching con- ion, in whatever manner they may deem calculated to secure for me that entire re- rom official duty which has become abso- y necessary, and to promote the highest est of the Church." The bishop did not n, as he well knew that his resignation d not have been accepted. It was, there- necessary to elect an assistant bishop.

efore entering on the nomination of assist- bishop the convention engaged for several ents in silent prayer. The first nomination that of the Rev. Dr. Henry C. Potter, of e Church, by the Rev. Dr. Morgan. Dr. er, who was seated near the pulpit, rose at . "I am profoundly sensible," he said, the great honor my brother has done me, I am constrained to say I cannot permit lf to acquiesce in the nomination or to the use of my name in this election." nominations continued, and one delegate g if Dr. Potter was still a candidate, the man said that notwithstanding the with- al of Dr. Potter, if his friends insisted on g for him, his name must still be considered fore the convention. Dr. Potter again his wish to withdraw his name, and ly before recess he left the convention, and not return during the afternoon. The dates put in nomination, besides Dr. r, were the Rev. Dr. Morgan Dix, the Dr. Noah Hunt Schenck, of St. Ann's, klyn; the Rev. Dr. T. L. Davies, of Phila- ia; the Rev. Dr. Philander K. Cady, of Park; the Rev. William R. Huntington, orcester, Mass.; the Rev. Dr. Eugene A. nan, Dean of the General Theological nary; the Rev. Dr. William J. Seabury, of Church of the Annunciation; Bishop l S. Tuttle, of Utah; the Rev. re can be no doubt that the Nolo Episcopari Dr. Potter's case no empty form. To a er who called upon him on the day of his n, he said: "As the son of a bishop, I only too well the nature of the honor that en conferred on me. I was not desirous taining it, and my people here have sly objected to my considering it at all. will regret very much that I should them now that so many plans are just ing for church work. I do not know yet shall do; the announcement has come so ectedly that I have not had time to pre- nyself." The prayerful consideration of ppointment, however, resulted in Dr. being led to accept it. That the change upation was not a welcome one, but was ndertaken from a sense of duty, may be d from the following extracts from ed on September 28th, accepting the " It seems proper by my own presence to vledge the communication which came to terday. I need not tell you how utterly helmed I have been at the action of this ition, nor how I have shrunk from it. e whole circumstances attending it were hat they seemed to take from me the power of discretion. I throw myself on your compassion. If I am to take up the office to which you have called me I need your sympathy and prayers and your arms. I am singularly unfortunate in my ignorance of ecclesiastical routine, and with the exception of my knowledge of the House of Bishops I am as ignorant as the youngest presbyter in this house. Behind me is a record that may well appall one, and a kinsman though I am with the bishop of this diocese, I need not regret to speak of his untiring service and work for this Church. 'Who is sufficient for these things?' God knows that I am conscious I am not. I hope it is not incongruous for me at this time to express my grateful sense of the manner in which the communication was presented to me—to my venerable father, the rector of St. Thomas's Church, for his kind address, to the distinguished laymen who accompanied him, and especially do I desire to express my grateful thanks to my brother, the distinguished rector of Trinity Church, for his generous chivalry and tenderness which he has been good enough to express to me privately—I cannot forget it."

THE CONSECRATION

of the new bishop took place on October 20th, forty-six bishops and several hundred clergymen being present. It was a noteworthy fact that many clergymen of other denominations attended, testifying by their presence the esteem in which they held Dr. Potter. Prominent among them were Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D. LL.D., and Rev. S. Irenæus Prime, D.D. The sermon was preached by Bishop Williams, of Connecticut, its subject being the work of the ministry. At the close of his discourse, and turning to the bishop-elect, who rose in his place, the preacher paid a pathetic tribute to the late Bishop Potter, his father. The bishop-elect was then divested of his surplice, under which he wore the Episcopal rochet, and was conducted into the middle of the sanctuary by Bishop Lay and Bishop Howe, and Bishop Clark, of Rhode Island, seating himself in the centre, he was formally presented. The usual questions being asked as to fitness and competency, the Bishop called for the testimonials. Those from the Diocese of New York were read by the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan, those from the House of Deputies by Dr. W. E. Eigenbrodt, and those from the Bishops by Dr. Tatlock.

Dr. Henry C. Potter then pronounced the Promise of Conformity in a clear and distinct voice, after which the Litany was read by Bishop Stevens. Again seating himself in his chair, Bishop Clark proceeded to examine the candidate. Dr. Potter answered all the questions in a clear voice. Then, all standing up, Bishop Clark invoked a solemn blessing upon him. The anthem of investiture was then sung (composed especially by the organist of Grace Church for the occasion) from Psalms 20: 1. During this the two chaplains, Dr. Potter and Dr. Dix, advanced with the black satin chimere and lawn sleeves, and assisted the bishop to robe himself. Then, all kneeling, the bishop of Maine entoned the Veni Creator Spiritus.

At this moment the venerable Bishop Smith, nearly ninety years of age, was almost carried in from the vestry by the Rev. Arthur Brooks and the Rev. T. Olmsted. It had been proposed to wheel him into the chancel upon a chair, but he protested that he would walk. He presented an affecting spectacle, a man worn out in his Master's service. His finely marked face was encircled with snowy hair; and yet his voice was distinct as he laid his trembling hands on the head of Dr. Potter and repeated from memory the consecrating words.

THE FIRST EPISCOPAL SERMON

Dr. Potter delivered was one which by its place and its subject was by a singular coincidence appropriate to his character. It was not to the wealthy and the respectable, but to a congregation of criminals in the penitentiary. Instead of the broad aisles, the swelling arches and the Gothic beauty of the Broadway edifice, there was a long, narrow apartment with a low ceiling, bare, whitewashed walls and massive iron doors, double locked; in place of the richly carved pulpit, the preacher had a small platform, covered with a cheap colored cloth; instead of addressing men and women of society, in silks and satins and broadcloth, his words were directed to men and women whose acts had placed them beyond the pale of society, the former of whom were clothed in zebra striped suits of gray and brown, the latter in coarse blue striped calico gowns; in place of the suave ushers, moving noiselessly to and fro, uniformed men, sharp of eye and stern of visage, sat at intervals on elevated perches, and kept uninterrupted watch over the worshippers; in a word, Dr. Potter had transferred his ministrations from the fashionable congregation of Grace Church to the convict audience in the little chapel attached to the Penitentiary on Blackwell's Island.

His text was John 8: 11, "Jesus said unto her, neither do I condemn thee; go and sin no more." The prisoners listened eagerly and breathlessly to the earnest words Bishop Potter addressed to them, full of hatred of sin but of pity for the sinner, and many a hardened face was wet with tears as he pronounced the concluding words: "I say to you, hearken, my brethren and my sisters, to the Divine voice. Your Master and my Master calls to you to-day, saying: 'Come to me, all ye who are weary and heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Though your sins as scarlet be, I will make them white as snow.'"

PERSONAL CHARACTERISTICS.

One well qualified to judge of the merits of men and preachers, thus writes of Dr. Potter: "In figure he is tall, with a finely proportioned and commanding person, and a manner inviting confidence, while it exacts an unconscious deference. As a preacher his career is marked by staid, sterling qualities, rather than the exceptional fascinations of popular oratory. There is remarkable modesty and simplicity, almost a self-abnegation, in his style and diction, careful attention to the quality and honesty of speech, with a characteristic dread of exaggeration, and a shrinking from the expedients of the mere rhetorician. The hearer is brought into immediate relations with the purpose of the preacher, in which purpose the preacher himself is easily forgotten. His idiom is a vigorous, sinewy Saxon, well tempered with various cultures of books, travels, society, and experience. He makes sure of the quick intelligence and appreciation of his listeners, and his capital lies in this gift of making the most of his opportunity with no waste or by-play of word-spinning, no artifice or exploit of the pedant, and withal a fine flavor of grace and elegance that feathers the arrows of his argument to sure and ready purpose. Dr. Potter is a direct, cogent, persuasive preacher. His topics are rarely drawn from polemics or vexed questions that distract and puzzle priests and people. He deals little in mere speculation and idealizations. His voice is resonant and penetrating, with an agreeable and well-managed modulation; and his clear, deliberate elocution seizes and retains the attention. His readiness and felicity in extempore and occasional addresses are remarkable."

It is worthy of mention that Bishop Potter is an earnest advocate of total abstinence, and has labored ardently among both rich and poor to advance the cause. He is chairman of the executive committee of the Church Temperance Society, of which Mr. Robert Graham is the general secretary.

Two Missionary Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church were elected by the House of Bishops in New York on Thursday, April 24th. The Rev. William Jones Boone was elected missionary Bishop of Shanghai, China. The Rev. Samuel D. Ferguson, a native of Liberia, and a full blooded negro, was chosen Missionary Bishop for Cape Palmas. He is the first colored man who has been elected to this high office.

ARE THEATRES IMPROVING?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 4, 1884.

"Watchman, what of the night."—ISAIAH 21 : 11.

The March of Civilization and Christianity—Always Forward—The Entertainments of the World not Abreast—Theatres not Improving in Moral Tone—Newspaper Testimony—Testimony of the Bulletin Boards—The Disgusting Picture-Gallery of the Streets—The Increased Importation of Bad Morals—Growing Degeneracy of the Plays—Specimen Plays—Not Fit for Home Reading—Corrupting Youth—The Drama to be Rescued—The Love of the Drama Divinely Implanted—Evidences of it in Home and Public Life—May be Harnessed for God—A Drama on the Streets of Philadelphia—Why People Do not Go to Church—A Caution—The Drama of Your Life—Its Beginning and End—The Spectators.

As near as I can tell, it is about half past four o'clock in the morning. Signs of dawn all around the sky. Caverns full of darkness, but the mountains are being transfigured. The sun is coming up, although coming very slowly.

THE WORLD PROGRESSES.

Since the armies of civilization and Christianity started on their march, they have not fallen back an inch. There have been regiments cowardly, which have retreated and surrendered to the enemy, just as in all armies there are those unworthy the standard they carry; but the great host of God has been answering to the command given at the start of "Forward, march!"

Have the entertainments and the recreations of the world kept abreast in this grand march of the ages? Are the novels of our day superior to those that are past? Is the dance of this decade an improvement upon the dance of other decades? Are the opera houses rendering grander music than that which they rendered in other times? Are parlor games more healthful than they used to be?

in moral tone? In reply to this last question I give myself this morning in this series of discourses in answer to some of the absorbing questions of the day.

Mark you, I am not to discuss whether the theatre is right or wrong. I am not to make wholesale attack upon tragedians and comedians. There are a hundred questions in regard to the theatre that might be asked which I shall not this morning answer, the most of them having been answered at some other time in this pulpit. You say that Henry Irving, and Edwin Booth, and John McCullough, and Joseph Jefferson are great actors, and are honorable men. I believe it. The question that I am to discuss to-day is: Are the theatres advancing in high moral tone? and I shall in no wise be diverted from that discussion.

NEWSPAPER TESTIMONY.

There are three or four reasons for answering this question in the negative, and the first is the combined and universal testimony of all the secular newspapers of the land that are worth anything. There is not a secular newspaper of any power in the United States which has not within the past few years, both in editorial and reportorial column, reprehended the styles of play most frequent. It is contrary to the financial interests of the secular newspaper severely to criticise the playhouse, because from it comes the largest advertising patronage, larger than from any other source, thousands and tens of thousands of dollars a year. When, therefore, the secular newspapers of the land, contrary to their financial interests, severely criticise the playhouse for imbecile and impure spectacular, their testimony is to me conclusive. On the negative side of this question I roll up all the respectable printing-presses of America.

Another reason for answering this question in the negative is the depraved advertisements on and on the board fences and in the show windows from ocean to ocean. I take it for granted that those advertisements are honest, and that night by night are depicted the scenes there advertised. Are those the scenes to which parents take their sons and daughters and young men their affianced? Would you allow in your parlor such brazen indecency enacted as is dramatized every night in some of the theatres of America, unless their advertisements be a libel? If the pictures be genuine, the scenes are damnable.

That which is wrong in a parlor is wrong on a stage. It ought to require just as much completeness of apparel to be honorable in one place as to be honorable in another. If you, fathers and mothers, take your sons and daughters to see such Sodomite lack of robe, and then in after time the ploughshare of libertinism and profligacy should go through your own household, you will get what you deserve. It seems as if having obtained a surplus of sanctity during the Lenten services, right after Easter, all through the United States, the streets became a picture gallery which rival the museums of Pompeii, which are kept under lock and key. Where are the mayors of the cities, and the judges of the courts, and the police that they allow such things? I declare what every man and woman in this house knows to be true. When our cities are blotched with these depraved advertisements is it not some reason why we should think that the theatres of this country are not very rapidly advancing toward millennial excellence?

Another reason for answering this question in the negative is the large from foreign countries to the American stage. France sent one of her queens of the stage to this country, her infamy, instead of a shame, a boast. Never a more popular actress on the American stage, and never one more dissolute. Thousands and tens of thousands of professed Christian men and women went and burned incense before that goddess of debauchery. England, too, has sent her delectable specimens of ineffable sweetness commended by foreign princes, not as good as their mother. When I take into consideration this large importation of bad morals from foreign ports, I come to the conclusion that the American theatres are not, as a general thing, advancing in moral tone.

Another reason for answering this question in the negative is the fact that the vast majority of

are degenerate. I will not name many of them, because I might advertise that which I condemn, and the mere mention of them would be a perfidy. If I mention any they must be those that are a little past, but which may come back again when the American taste wants a change of carrion. Take the plays of the last fifteen years, and I will admit that one tenth of them are unobjectionable, but the nine tenths of them are unfit to be looked at by the families of America. Subtract from them the libertinism and the domestic intrigue and the innuendo and the vulgarity and the marital scandalism, and you would leave those plays powerless in the dramatic market.

Put side by side the plays of the time of Macready and the elder Booth and the modern plays, and you will find there has been an awful decadence. I have not seen those plays, but I have taken the testimony of authentic witnesses, and I have seen the skilful analyses by critics—a score of critics—among them such men as Dr. Buckley, of New York, men who have read scores of the plays and who can report in regard to them—I take the testimony of those who witnessed the plays and then I take the testimony of the critics who like the theatre and who do not like it, I put them all together, and I find a moral decadence.

SPECIMEN PLAYS.

If you who took your families to see East Lynne will now in your cooler moments read the manuscript of that play—read the printed play, and go through the fetid and malodorous chapters in which dishonest womanhood is chased from iniquity to iniquity, you wil able to judge for yourself whether that i improved drama. You might as well go the grogshop of the village hotel and sit d among the bevy of village loafers expectir get moral elevation as to get any moral vation from a play like the Ticket of L Man, full of villainous pictures and low s The play entitled A New Way to Pay Debts is a eulogy, a practical eulogy on ception practised on the bad, and men women never come from seeing that as pure as when they went in. She Stoo Conquer is as full of moral miasma as the Rc Campagna is full of typhus fever on a sun night. You may write Oliver Goldsmith a it and beneath it and at the close of each but you cannot cover up the profane and salacious. The School for Scandal is rc clear through with lasciviousness, and if a should come into your house and take that from under his arm and read it to your fa all the bones that were left in his body broken would not be worth mentioning.

But who could mention all the Don Ce and the barmaids, and the Peg Woffingt and the Courtleighs, and the Lady Gay Sp ers, and the poltroons, and the scapegraces the people minus all excellency plus all ab nation, who gather men, women, boys, and by tens of thousands every night in the lazz of the average American theatre. It is estim that there are one thousand boys in Broc every night breathing that pestilence. He ye whose sons stay out until 11 o'clock at n and you do not know where they are! He ye philanthropists who want this gener better than the generations that have gone

Once in a while a great tragedian will re King Lear or Merchant of Venice or H before entranced audiences, but those pla compared with the imbecile and depraved on the American stage to-day are as the drops of pure blood to the bad blood in a who has passed out from yellow fever Asiatic cholera and is now winding up first-class small-pox. Now, I say the maj of the plays of this country being bad in influence, I have a right to conclude tha theatres of America, take them as an ave are not coming to any very large mora provement.

Now, I demand that as men and women love the best interests of society that we together to snatch the drama from its de surroundings. I demand that as philan pists and Christians we

RESCUE THE DRAMA.

The drama is not the theatre. The th is a human institution. The drama is a lit expression of something which God impl in nearly all of our souls. People talk as th it were something built up entirely outsi us by the Congreves and the Sheridans an Shakespeares of literature. Oh! no. It echo of something divinely put within us. see it in your little child three or four ye age with the dolls and the cradles and the You see it ten years after in the parlor rades. Just as we cultivate the beautiful the sublime in taste by bird-haunted glen roystering stream and cascade let down r moss-covered rocks, and the day setting up anners of victory in the east, and passing the gates of the west, setting everything on the Austerlitz and the Waterloo of a July nder-storm blazing its batteries into a sultry rnoon, and the round tear of the world wet he cheek of the night—as by these things try to culture a taste for the sublime and the utiful, so we are to culture this dramatic e by staccato passages in literature, by an- esis and synthesis, by all tragic passages in an life.

Ve are to take this dramatic element and we to harness it for God. As well as I could I gath- d up the package of food and put it under one arm and helped him with the crutch der the other arm; but when I saw the blood his pale cheek I burst into tears. Fifty ser- ns about the sufferings of the poor would have affected me as much as that little ima.

Oh, there are hundreds of people here who trying to do good. Have less of the di- ctic element and have more of the dramatic. e tendency in our time is to drone religion, moan religion, to croak religion, to sepul- erize religion, when it ought to be put in ani- ted and spectacular manner.

Sabbath by Sabbath there are theological dents in this house. They come in from the rrounding institutions, and I say to all those ung men who are preparing for the Gospel nistry, go home to your libraries, and you will d that those who bring most souls to God, ng most into the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, are dramatic. John Knox dramatic, Thomas Chalmers dramatic, Robert M'Cheyne dramatic, Rowland Hill dramatic, Robert Hall dramatic, Robert South dramatic, Fenelon dramatic, George Whitefield dramatic, Dr. John Mason dramatic, Bourdaloue dramatic, Dr. Knott dramatic, George W. Bethune dramatic. And you have a right to in your nature. Oh, young men preparing for Christian work, and though you may meet with mighty rebuff and caricature if you attempt it, and though you may be arraigned by church courts who will try to put you down, the Lord will start you, and He will keep you all through, and great will be the reward for the assiduous and the plucky.

Oh, my friends, we want in all our work to freshen up. We want to freshen up, you in your sphere and I in mine. Great discussions in religious newspapers about

WHY PEOPLE DO NOT COME TO CHURCH.

I will tell you. You cannot take the old hackneyed phrases that have come snoring down through the centuries and arrest the attention of the masses. People in religious work do not want the sham flowers bought in a millinery shop, but the japonicas wet with the morning dew. They do not want the bones of the extinct megatherium of the past, but the living reindeer caught last August at the edge of Schroon Lake. We need, all of us, to drive out of our religious work the drowsy and the tedious and the didactic, and bring in the brightness, and the vivacity, and the holy sarcasm, and the sanctified wit, and the epigrammatic power, and the blood-red earnestness, and we will get it through the sanctified drama.

A CAUTION.

But let me say to the hundreds of young men in this audience, do not let your fondness for the dramatic lead you into sin. While God has given you this faculty, cultivate it, and cultivate it in the right direction. Admire it when it is used for God. Abhor it when it is used for sin. We do not try to suppress it in you. Do not misrepresent us. We would have it directed, we would have it educated, we would have it harnessed for multiplicand usefulness. In no wise suppress it. Gather all your faculties, and this among the others, and consecrate them to the Lord Jesus Christ.

But

and mine will soon end. No encore will bring us back after the curtain has dropped. At the beginning of the drama stood a cradle; at the close of the drama will stand a grave; the intermediate acts banquet and burial, laughter and groans, songs and tears, processions bridal and funeral. It was not original with Shakespeare when he said,

"All the world's a stage
And all the men and women merely players."

He took it from Paul, who fifteen centuries before had said, "We are a spectacle to the world and to angels and to men." A spectacle in a coliseum, fighting wild beasts in an amphitheatre. Here we destroy a lion, there we grapple a gladiator. When we fall devils shout; when we rise angels sing.

THE SPECTATORS.

Gallery above gallery, gallery above gallery looking down. Gallery of our departed kindred wishing to throw us a garland, waiting for our victory, hoping for our triumph, wondering if we will be faithful to our ancestry. Glorified children and parents with cheer after cheer urging us on. Gallery of the martyrs, the McKails, and the Ridleys, and the Latimers, and the Theban Legion, and they of Brussels market-place, and they of Piedmont. Gallery of the martyrs crying down: "God gave us that victory, and He will give it you." Gallery of the angels, cherubic, seraphic, and archangelic, clapping their wings at our triumph, veiling their faces at our defeat. Gallery of the King from which there waves a scarred hand and from which there comes down a sympathetic voice saying: "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Oh, the spectacle in which you and I are the actors! Oh, the piled-up galleries looking down!

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE Rev. D. Marshall, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Stanberry, Mo., writes THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that a member of his congregation has been restored to health through faith and prayer. A child named Claribell, the thirteen-year-old daughter of a banker in the city, was suddenly seized with a sickness, which an eminent physician pronounced critical. After two days hope was abandoned; the physician said that she could not live many hours. A beloved relative was summoned, and the child's parents stood weeping at the bedside. The child had already given evidence of a change of heart, and her pastor visited her and gave such consolation to the afflicted family as he could.

An evangelist was then in the city assisting Mr. Marshall in some revival services. He too went to the house, and at his suggestion a meeting for prayer was held in an upper room. On the evening of the same day, when the child was believed to be dying, there was another meeting by the bedside, and God's promises of healing in answer to prayer were pleaded. As the friends rose from their knees and looked at the sufferer, they saw her gape. She fell into a natural, refreshing sleep which lasted all night. The following morning her recovery was assured, and she insisted on rising, declaring that she was quite well. Her friends, though Christian people having faith in prayer, were at first incredulous; but when the child rose with every sign of perfect health they believed. There was no convalescence, no weakness, but complete recovery.

A GROUP OF INSTANCES.

A gentleman who attended a public meeting at Bethshan, the London house of faith healing, three weeks ago, gave the following testimony: "I have been a great sufferer from bronchitis for fourteen years, especially about three and a half years ago, when I was so ill that I bid good-by to my wife and children, as I was dying, given up by the doctor. But I got better. I was at the skating rink in Norwich last October. A girl there thanked God that He had healed her by restoring her voice; that led me to search my Bible about the Lord's healing. I wrote to Bethshan, and got a letter from Miss Sisson and four little tracts. I accepted Christ as my healer, and am now stronger for work than I have been for years. I gave up two sick clubs which supplied me with funds in my illness, for I would not keep them on when the Lord healed me. I have often had an empty cupboard, but never really wanted for a meal, praise the Lord! A friend of mine who was near death in consumption, and for whom I requested prayer in the same letter in which I asked prayer for myself, read Miss Sisson's letter, which was written to us both, and he took Christ as his healer too, recovered, and is now at work."

The Rev. Arbuthnot, at the same place, said he was very thankful that the Lord had possessed his body since the 22d December. He was thoroughly healed at Bethshan on the 5th January, and although his voice had been more severely worked, yet it was stronger now than ever it had been before. Of course some of his friends expressed doubt at the time whether the cure would be permanent, but he could testify that it was. The Lord had renewed him in Christ Jesus. He could not say he had been without assault, for the devil would never lose a body or a soul without an effort—but on every occasion the Lord had kept him. A man who had a deceased bone in his leg said he had that afternoon come to the meeting out of mere curiosity, but had been so convinced by the testimonies he had heard that he was desirous of putting his case in the Lord's hands as the Healer.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Forgotten Dedi ation.—At a Recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Gault said: "When the late Professor Dickson was born, his father and mother dedicated him to the ministry of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, but as he grew up they forgot their vow, and trained him for commercial life. I am not quite sure of his exact age, but think it was in his youth that the hand of God was laid upon him in the form of what looked like a fatal sickness. His doting parents then remembered their vow, and reconsecrated him to the Lord and His service. In a short time he got better, and has been used by God to turn many from darkness into the glorious light of the Lord Jesus Christ."

Smashing the Bottle.—Mr. Barrowman, who is doing a good work in Glasgow, said: "We have begun a new meeting in Cadogan Street, on Saturday nights, which is called 'The Rescue' meeting. It has been and is very successful. On a recent Saturday, in the after-meeting, our chairman, Mr. Reid, and another worker, were dealing with a man who was slightly under the influence of drink. Most earnestly he was urged to accept Christ as his personal Saviour, and to take the pledge. He was deeply impressed, and all at once he started from his seat, and moving out, said, 'Let me go up-stairs first.' 'Why?' he was naturally asked. 'Come with me,' he answered, 'and see.' On reaching the street the man took a black bottle, which was full of whiskey, out of his pocket, and violently dashed it to pieces on the hard stones. He then came back and took the pledge, and we have good grounds for hoping also that he has given himself to the Lord."

How Captain Moreton was Converted.—Mr. Jack stated that: "For a long time before the Hon. Captain Moreton, late of Mildmay, was converted to the Saviour whom he loves and serves so well, he was under deep anxiety of mind about the salvation of his soul. He consulted a great many people about what he should do to be saved. One said, 'You must give up this sin,' another, 'You must give up that sin,' and so on, till one evening at a party where he was really converted, he met Miss Marsh, author of 'English Hearts and English Hands,' and asked her, 'What do you say I must give up, Miss Marsh?' 'Nothing, Captain Moreton; I wish you to take something.' 'Take something! What is that?' 'Pardon, peace, and rest, which you can obtain at once "without money and without price" by taking Christ as your Saviour.' It was enough. Captain Moreton in the midst of that gay company gave himself to Christ, and got the peace which had eluded his grasp so long."

Prayer in the Whiskey Cellars.—"I Remember well the meeting at which I was convicted of sin. I went to hear Mr. Sankey sing, but determined to put my finger in my ears when Mr. Moody should speak. Just as I sat down, the Rev. Mr. Riddell went into the pulpit, and cried out, 'Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God' (John 3 : 3). I heard nothing else during the meeting. Mr. Sankey sang and Mr. Moody spoke, yet it was to me as though they had not done so, for these words of Jesus troubled me so much that I could get no rest nor peace that night. The next morning I went to business as usual, but every gill of whiskey that I sold made my heart quake and my hand tremble so much that I got frightened, and went down to the cellars to pray. Day after day did I spend in the cellars praying to God, till my father thought I was going mad through drinking too much whiskey, and ordered me to come up-stairs, but I refused. Next Sabbath I went to Mr. Moody's meeting, and waited till the after-meeting. When Mr. Moody asked those who wished to be spoken with to come to the front, I rose up, and was making my way thither, when I felt a hand laid on my shoulder, and a voice say, 'Tom! mind the whiskey-shops!' Looking round, I saw one of our shopmen, and a lot of my friends at my back; but my mind was made up, and I answered, 'Let the whiskey-shops go! Christ for me! Christ for me!' That day my soul got perfect peace in Christ my Redeemer."

A Sermon that Needed Baptizing.—Mr. Davidson related the following suggestive incident: "I was speaking one day with a young minister of the Gospel, who told me that on one occasion during his college days he was present when a number of students delivered trial sermons for criticism, in the presence of their professor. One very talented young man distinguished himself by the freedom of his delivery and the great eloquence with which he spoke. All present were charmed by the power and beauty of his sermon. As a work of art it was practically faultless. At the conclusion the professor put his hand kindly on the young man's shoulder, solemnly saying to him, 'My young friend, your sermon only requires to be baptized with the Holy Ghost.' That is just what we all want, in order that we may be able to overcome all temptations, or coldness of heart, and work cordially and continuously for Christ. Happily if we ask the Lord Jesus to send the Comforter, He will come and bless us."

Afraid of a Big Black Bull.—At a Recent Mizpah meeting Mr. Calder said: "Some time ago I was taking a few children into the country. The road was lined on both sides with hedges, and as my little band were walking cheerily along it, a big black bull in one of the fields gave a threatening roar, and, the next instant, his shaggy head was over the hedge. 'Oh,' I cried, 'what shall I do?' A young man who was with me replied, 'Man, Calder, don't be afraid! look the beast in the face, and he will turn tail.' 'You may do that,' I replied, 'but I won't.' 'Man! think of the children.' So saying, my friend bent down, and lifting a large stone, looked the bull in the face, and flung the stone right between its eyes. In another instant the beast wheeled round, and rushing across the field, gored the opposite hedge. The incident reminds us of the Scripture injunction, 'Resist the devil, and he will flee from you.' His roar may terrify, but cannot harm; and the calm look of faith, and the stone of divine truth, prevent him injuring those whose trust is in God."

A Fish-Curer's Despair.—A Minister Related the following: "I remember seeing a touching sight in the North. In preparation for the herring fishing, a fish-curer had stored salt enough for his purposes. One morning, when the boats came into harbor laden to within an inch or two of the gunwale with their silvery loads, he opened his store to get some salt. The women were waiting with their knives ready to clean the fish, the coopers had made the new barrels in order to hold them, and the herrings were there in abundance; but the salt, where was it? A secret spring had broken out, and destroyed and dissolved every particle of it. The now despairing fish-curer ran hither and thither, trying to borrow from his neighbors, but they had none to spare. The man was utterly ruined, and his woe was painful to witness. Wealth just within his grasp, but lost by a hidden spring coming to light. Many thousands of men and women are ruined body and soul by some secret sin. Pray that you may be spared such peril through the forgiving and preserving might of the grace of Christ."

A Deserter's Discharge.—Mr. Jack Related the following beautiful illustration of answer to prayer: "A soldier, who had risen by good conduct to the position of sergeant, attended a small meeting, where he was converted to Christ; hitherto he had led a careless, godless life, but the change which had been brought about by the Holy Spirit became evident to every one. One thing troubled him very much, and he could not shake it off; so he laid the facts before the brethren, and they laid them before the Lord. The cause of his trouble was, that nine years before he had deserted from the navy and enlisted as a soldier. This is a c which is followed by heavy punishment. It with a heavy heart that he decided to confes his commanding officer, for he had a wife children, and it would go hard with them. brethren told the sergeant, 'If you are im oned we will see after your wife and childr He then went and confessed to the officer, said, 'Oh, it's an old affair, nine years ago; it rest.' 'No, sir, I can't,' said the s 'Why not?' inquired the officer. 'I am Christian man,' the sergeant replied, 'and c rest with this crime on my conscience.' 'V well, I will attend to it.' The colonel imm ately wrote to the War Office, stating the c and in a few weeks a free pardon, along with discharge from the navy, was handed to him the colonel. How true it is that if we 'c mit' our 'way unto the Lord,' that 'He bring it to pass.'"

THE PREDICTED RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS.

All Nati Holy—XIII. Perpetual Generations—XIV. animate Creation to Participate—The Ble ings of that Age.

THE anticipation of some sort of bliss change to come upon this sad and sinful e after its long-continued storms and sorrows in one form or another, very general. E those who despise God's word and rely human prognostications or scientific researc for their date, prophesy with greater or less tinctness of meaning a future Millennium. T belief is indeed so general that the coming the Millennium has even passed into a curr newspaper phrase. With all those who t God's Word for their guide, the expectation such a time of coming blessedness, in so form, is universal.

But what is to be the character of the chang How far is it to affect this earth and the rac What are its attendants and its time? On th points there is the greatest diversity of beli And yet every one must see that there can but one true view of the case. For Go thoughts and plan in this matter are fixed a not changeful or doubtful; and all things shaping, in the hands of the King, to bring just the result He has all along intended u none other.

Let no one suppose from the existing gre diversity of views that the Scripture expressio concerning this event are meagre or doubtf On the contrary, they are very striking a comprehensive. They arrest attention at onc To say nothing just now of the vivid pictures that bright future day drawn in the Old Test ment, and in which the various features of t time are grouped together; the terms used the New Testament are very strong.

It is called first a "Regeneration" a n creation, a second birth—Palingenesia. Sure this implies a vast and comprehensive and thc ough change, and a change on the earth.

Again, it is so vast and comprehensive th the whole creation is depicted as groaning a travailing in pain, waiting to be admitted in "the glorious liberty of the children of God (Rom. 8 : 21, 22). And it is represented as glorious, that even believers also with the firs fruits of the Spirit are groaning and waiting f this day; the day of the redemption of t body; when they shall be "manifested to the sons of God" (Rom. 8 : 19–23).

It is called by the Apostle Peter a "Restit tion of all things" (Acts 3 : 21), implying th there is no department of creation that has been impaired which shall not feel the influence of the restitution.

It is represented both by the Old Testament prophets (Isaiah 65 : 17–66–22) and New Testament apostles (II Pet. 3 : 13 ; Rev. 21 : 1) as "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness ;" a complete, all-pervading, blessed, abiding change.

And to close all : In the prophecy which foreshadows it as accomplished, the change is represented as total as it is glorious ; and we hear the voice of the King on the throne saying, "Behold I make ALL things new" (Rev. 21 : 5).

And yet, strange to say, comprehensive and glorious as these Scripture expressions are, the results derived from them by different minds differ greatly.

If we are asked what that Regeneration is which the Scriptures foreshow, it seems we must be "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken" of the glory to follow the sufferings of Christ, if we receive not these things as truth :

1. That there is to be a thorough renewing, physical and spiritual, of the earth and the race ; "a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness ;" "a kingdom of God under the whole heaven that shall abide forever." For so the Prophets Isaiah and Daniel distinctly declare, and the Apostle John sets it forth in symbol just as plainly.

2. That this kingdom of God, promised from the beginning, is identified with, and must not be expected independently of, this earth on which we tread. For Isaiah and all the prophets, in every prophecy, speak of Israel when restored, as abiding here forever. They testify that all the nations of the earth from generation to generation are to worship the Lord in this renewed earth, and the Apostle John in Revelation makes no note of any other condition of things up to the very last chapter.

3. That this regeneration of the earth is to take place in

of God's King, the Lord Jesus, who "shall reign in Mount Zion and before His ancients gloriously." For to His presence, not only Isaiah witnesses but Daniel also and Jeremiah and Zechariah, as already shown speaking of Him sometimes as David's Son, sometimes as the true David, sometimes as the Lord our Righteousness. So does Christ Himself witness, for He says He will personally come to the earth, and will cast out of the kingdom all that offends ; and "then the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." And none can mistake the Apostle John's declaration that it is in the visible presence of the returned Christ the reign on earth shall take place.

4. That the saints of God from all ages shall reign with Christ over the nations of the saved, the dead saints being raised in the first resurrection, the living saints changed, and both caught up and glorified. For so the Prophet Zechariah declares : "The Lord my God shall come and all the saints with Him." So Enoch testified before the flood (Jude 14 : 15). And so Paul declares : "If we suffer we shall reign with Him"—that is, reign when He reigns. So Christ declares : "He that overcometh shall sit with me on my throne." So John declares : "They lived and reigned with Christ."

5. That this Regeneration is to be preceded by a sweeping away of all moral evil from the earth—the almighty act of vengeance on the part of the King against the wicked powers of earth. For almost every prophecy I have repeated, and which portrays the coming glory, testifies to the "indignation of the Lord against all nations." (See the prophecy in Isaiah, ch. 24 to ch. 27). So also Christ testifies, that at His coming, "He will send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that offend and them who do iniquity." And so Ezekiel shows at length (ch. 39). And so the Revelation testifies that Christ, attended by heaven's army, shall go forth in battle against the Beast and the False Prophet and their armies (Rev. ch. 19).

More especially, that these enemies shall be gathered with intent against Jerusalem and the people of Israel (possibly in the hope of proving the Scripture untrue by the annihilation of that people), and that, there, shall be witnessed the Lord's judgment against them. So Zechariah testifies (ch. 13 and 14). And further, that the last and highest form of evil, the Man of Sin, shall then be destroyed. So Isaiah declares (ch. 11 : 4). And so the Apostle Paul testifies to the Thessalonians (II Thess. 2 : 8).

6. That the earth is to be purified by fire. Isaiah the prophet testifies : "The Lord will come with fire and with His chariots, like a whirlwind, to render His anger with fury, and His rebuke with flames of fire. For by fire and by sword will the Lord plead with all flesh, and the slain of the Lord shall be many" (ch. 66 : 15, 16). The Apostle Peter also testifies "that the elements shall melt with fervent heat," and thence the new heavens and new earth shall emerge. And less any should doubt whether God can save any alive under such circumstances, the apostle points, in his second epistle, to Noah saved and to Lot saved amid a general destruction, in order to show that "the Lord knows how to deliver the godly out of trial, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished" (II Pet. 2 : 4–10).

7. That after the desolating judgments with which the returning Lord and King will visit the nations, there will still be some left when the storm has passed by, who will doubtless form the source from which the nations will spring who shall dwell on the earth during the Millennial era. For so Isaiah testifies as to this spared remnant in the midst of the widespread destruction on the earth (ch. 24 : 5, 6, 13, 16, 21, 22). And so Zechariah declares, also, that some shall escape of the nations destroyed of the Lord when they come against Jerusalem, and that these shall afterward serve Him (ch. 14 : 16). And so John declares in the Revelation : That, after the desolating judgments foretold in ch. 19 : 13, 21, there will nevertheless be nations living during the Millennial era, who are not deceived by Satan then bound (Rev. 20 : 3).

8. That this Regeneration shall be attended by the national repentance and their gathering to their own land, and their perpetual residence there, exalted as a people to be a blessing in all the earth. This, many passages already quoted, declare. (See Isaiah 61 : 7–9 ; 60 : 9–14.)

9. That in the "Regeneration," therefore, there will be living men in the flesh, distinct from the glorified saints who rule with Christ, and these men will be organized as nations. For so Isaiah speaks of the remnant who are escaped of the nations after the Lord's judgment of the ungodly. So John speaks of the nations of the earth (after the curse is gone) as walking in the light of the New Jerusalem.

10. That to bring about this blessed condition of things the Spirit shall be poured out in an unprecedented manner on all flesh. So the Prophet Joel declares (ch. 2 : 28–32) pointing, by his predicted signs to the end of this dispensation of the Spirit, and to the conversion of the Gentiles (that are spared) most probably by Jewish instrumentality, a pregnant prophecy that takes in the whole Messianic time, as one vast period, the beginning and end of which are foreshortened into one and the same picture. And so Isaiah intimates, as to the times of the new heavens and new earth (Isa. 66 : 18–20). And so the Apostle James intimates (Acts 15 : 15–18).

11. That Satan, the arch-enemy, will be then bound so as to deceive the nations no more until the thousand years are past. So the Apostle John declares explicitly (Rev. 20 : 1–7).

12. That then

ALL THE NATIONS SHALL BE HOLY.

So Isaiah says to Israel : "All thy children shall be taught of God." "None shall say to another, know the Lord, for all shall know Him." "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea." "All nations shall come and worship before Thee" (Isa. 54 : 13 ; Jer. 31 : 34 ; Isa. 11 : 9 ; Rev. 15 : 4).

13. That the race, on earth then made holy, will continue on the earth, in perpetual generations. For so Psalm 72d intimates, as already quoted (vv. 5, 7, 8, 17). So God declares that the earth will abide safe from destruction by flood under His everlasting covenant, throughout "perpetual generations" (Gen. 9 : 12–17). So Psalm 145 : 13 testifies that the Lord's kingdom continues, as an everlasting kingdom (Heb. kingdom of the ages) "throughout all generations." And thus generations continue as long as the kingdom continues. So Daniel also declares (chap. 7 : 13, 14, 18, 27) that Christ's kingdom on earth is to be a kingdom wherein "all peoples, nations and languages shall serve Him," and that this kingdom, embracing all nations and languages, "shall not pass away nor be destroyed forever." Paul also speaks of "glory being given to God by the church in Christ, unto all the generations of the age of ages." The "church" is the one body of believers of Jews and Gentiles, fellow-heirs in Christ, of which Paul had just been speaking. They are to be raised from the dead and glorified together as Christ's bride reigning with Him over the nations. And Paul tells us that praise shall be rendered to God by this glorified church, throughout all the perpetual generations of men dwelling on the earth.

And so, finally, the Apostle John, in the Apocalypse, gives not the slightest intimation of any cessation of the nations on the earth. On the contrary, even after the second resurrection is passed, and Satan cast out, and after the kingdom is established in its glory, these nations are represented as still walking in the light of the heavenly rule of Christ and His saints symbolized by the New Jerusalem come down out of heaven (Rev. 21 : 22–27 ; 22 : 1–5).

14. That the curse shall be removed from the earth itself, and in the joy of the "sons of God." So testify the prophets. The waste places are to be made like Eden, and the deserts like the garden of the Lord (Ez. 34 : 27 ; 36 : 11, 29, 30, 34–36 ; Isa. 51 : 3 ; Ps. 67 : 4–6). And so the Apostle Paul represents the case in his account of the Palingenesia, toward which the creature, "made subject to vanity for man's sake," looks forward with ardent expectation (Rom. 8 : 18–23).

Thus the Regeneration will be a blessed change affecting the whole earth and the race living upon it. The long winter has indeed stripped off the foliage and made it for a long time look like waste and barren. But the reviving spring is soon to come and bring forth a "summer" of glory, forever (Luke 21 : 30). The centuries of earth's curse and earth's disorders and sins will indeed have been among men endured. That fact must remain forever true. And they "who knew not God, and obeyed not the Gospel" and died in their sins, must indeed be cast out from God forever. But the race, as a race, is redeemed, and sees at length all nations of the earth walking with God. Christ's blood avails to the uttermost generation. "None need say to another—Know the Lord, for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest." "All thy children shall be taught of God and great shall be the peace of thy children." "From generation to generation they shall come up to Jerusalem to serve the Lord." "For all the ends of the world shall worship God." So testify Isaiah and all the prophets.

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Extraordinary Legislative Proposal has made its appearance in the House, indorsed by the Committee on Education and Labor. It appears to be an extension in modified form of the Anti-Chinese law. If it should be enacted, immigrants under agreement to work for persons or corporations engaged in mining, manufacturing, building, or transportation will not be allowed to settle in the United States. Employers, however, who need skilled labor from abroad are permitted by the bill to apply to the President, and if they can convince him that native workmen of the kind they need cannot be obtained, he will have the power to license a fixed number of skilled foreign workmen whom the employers may import. The bill is a clumsy device ostensibly to protect native workmen, which if passed would be easily evaded. It is significant only as showing the means legislators adopt to make themselves popular among unthinking people. If the bill passes, skilled mechanics will come from Europe without an agreement, and will compete for the higher wages as successfully as they do now. If Congress really cared to help the workingman it could do so in many ways. This scheme is worthless, and intended to deceive him.

Eighteen Republican Conventions were Held last week, which elected about three hundred delegates to the National Convention. They were held in Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Wisconsin, Iowa, California, Nevada, Oregon, West Virginia, and Florida on Wednesday. On Thursday, Rhode Island, Minnesota, Kentucky, Nebraska, Colorado, Maryland, and North Carolina held conventions and elected delegates. Those elections close the list as far as the Republican party is concerned. Mr. Blaine's strength was materially increased by last week's elections. In Maine, Iowa, California, Nevada, Oregon, West Virginia, Rhode Island, and Colorado a solid Blaine delegation was elected. Mr. Blaine's organ now calculates that he will have at least 379 votes on the first ballot, only lacking 32 votes of the number necessary for a choice. Other tables published, place his strength on the first ballot at 294, but as so many delegates have been elected uninstructed, later ballots may show startling changes. President Arthur's number of delegates is variously estimated from 272 to 323. His weakness is explained concisely by a prominent Republican in the words: "He has been a good President for the country, but not for the party." Those politicians who think more of the party than of the country are much influenced by such an objection. It is evident that the majority of Republican voters in Republican States are in favor of Mr. Blaine's nomination, but as they cannot elect a President without the aid of the Independent voters in New York and other doubtful States, who are resolutely opposed to Mr. Blaine, his nomination is generally regarded as improbable. The prevalent impression is that some arrangement will be made similar to that of 1880, by which the Blaine strength will be given to a candidate whose record is less objectionable to the voters than that of Mr. Blaine, and who will, if elected, make Mr. Blaine his chief adviser.

A League for Revenue Reform was Organized in Boston on April 29th. A large number of prominent citizens of both political parties responded to the call for the conference and assisted in settling the platform of the League. Mr. Charles Francis Adams, Jr., was elected president. In stating the objects of the League he endeavored to disarm opposition by stating that neither he nor his colleagues consider free trade to-day to be a living issue. He said, "All that we desire is that those trammels which have been thrown around trade during the last twenty years should be so far removed that the manufactures that we have built up—the infant of forty years' growth that has, we think, now arrived at man's estate—should be placed in a position where they can go out and compete in the markets of the word. However it may be as to a tariff for revenue with incidental protection, we are opposed to a tariff for protection with incidental revenue." There are indications that the programme of the League is attracting sympathy in both the political parties, and it is predicted by men usually far-sighted, that if neither party honestly and earnestly undertakes revenue reform a new party will be organized with that as the chief plank of its platform.

The Question of Prohibition was Voted upon in the Assembly of New York on April 29th. When the proposal was made to submit to the vote of the people a prohibition amendment to the Constitution, sixty-three votes were recorded for it, and sixty against. The majority, however, was not sufficient, sixty-five votes being required under the Constitution; and the other two votes could not be secured. Eight Democrats voted in the affirmative, and eighteen Republicans were among those members who voted in the negative.

Another Star Route Case was Before the criminal court in Washington last week. Mr. William Pitt Kellogg, M.C., ex-Senator from Louisiana, was placed on trial on April 29th charged with having received money while a United States Senator for services rendered in relation to a contract with the United States. The penalty for this offence is imprisonment for not more than two years and a fine of not more than $10,000, and the defendant, if convicted, is to be rendered "forever thereafter incapable of holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the Government of the United States." The contracts in question were for the performance by J. B. Price of mail service upon star routes, and Mr. Kellogg was charged with having received from Price notes and drafts of the aggregate value of $20,000 in consideration of influencing Thomas J. Brady, Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to make certain orders for expedition of service on these routes, resulting in a large increase of the contractor's pay. As a matter of fact Price's annual pay on one route was raised from $2733 to $28,403, and on the other route from $9380 to $22,367. The principal witness for the government was John A. Walsh, a banker and broker who dealt in postal drafts. He has testified that the five drafts and the note were deposited in his hands by Senator Kellogg for collection, one half of the proceeds to be credited to the Senator and one half to Second Assistant Postmaster-General Brady. He exhibits checks and other papers to show that the collections were made and the proceeds disposed of according to instructions. The court directed the jury to return a verdict of "not guilty," on the ground that the offence was not committed when the note and drafts were paid, but on April 18th, 1879, the date when they were said to have been received by Kellogg, and that being so the trial was barred by the statute of limitations. There was also a defect in the indictment which charged Kellogg with receiving "lawful money," whereas the evidence was that he was paid in a note and drafts which are not "lawful money." The Springer Committee will now take up the case. For the credit of the country it should be stated that this is the first instance in our history of a United States Senator being charged with an offence so disgraceful.

A Colored Convention was in Session at Pittsburg, Penn., last week. It was styled "An Inter-State convention of representative colored men of the country," and was called to discuss the interests of their race. The total number of delegates present was 60, representing the States of Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, New York, Illinois, Michigan, New Jersey, Rhode Island, Virginia, Kansas, and the District of Columbia. The convention resolved in executive session, that no action should be taken in favor of either political party or of any candidate. The delegates from Illinois were more determined on this point than on any other. One of the delegates, when asked how he regarded Robert T. Lincoln as a Republican Presidential candidate, said, "Singular as it may seem, the colored people are opposed to him, notwithstanding their indebtedness to his father. Why? Because Mr. Lincoln does not like colored people himself. Some of the delegates from Illinois know him well, and they say that he actually dislikes people of our race." A marked feature of the convention was the unpopularity of Mr. Fred. Douglass. The colored delegates were so incensed by his marriage to a white lady that they would not listen to him, and they elected a comparatively unknown man as their chairman in preference to him.

The Thetis Sailed from the Brooklyn Navy Yard on Thursday last for the Arctic. She is the most important vessel of the Greely Relief Expedition. The general anxiety about the fate of Lieutenant Greely and his companions, combined with interest in the brave men who have volunteered to go on the dangerous mission of rescuing them, made the departure of the Thetis an occasion of considerable excitement. The Secretaries of War and of the Navy came to see the vessel sail and to wish God-speed to the men. The officers and the crew were photographed standing on deck. The scene as they stood side by side in full uniform on the deck was very impressive. Engineer Melville, his long hair streaming in the wind, kept in the background, while Commander Schley, his strong, clear-cut features moved with emotion, stood directly in front. Standing near the cabin stairs watching the men as they were grouped before the camera stood a woman and a young girl sixteen years of age. Both were robed in black. The girl had a ribbon pinned around her neck, upon which appeared in gilt lettering the word "Thetis." They were the wife and child of Commander Schley. Tears streamed down their cheeks as the photographer silently proceeded with his work. The after part of the Thetis contained other sad groups. Friends and relations of the sailors were there, bidding good-by to the noble fellows who were going so far away from home.

Ohio was Visited by a Destructive Tornado Sunday, April 27th, which passed over ontgomery and Greene counties, doing great mage. An eye-witness writing from Dayton s the storm appears to have originated near oodburn, a small town ten miles south of ere, and was appalling in its fury. The cy- ne was formed by the union of two light rm-clouds from the south and north-west, ich immediately assumed the form of a water- ut, rising and descending like waves of the , and destroying everything in its way. Its th was fully one eighth of a mile wide, the rm moving over the country like an im- nse cloud of smoke, while everywhere in its urse the air was filled with trees and the ins of houses. Forests were mowed down like eds, fences were destroyed for miles, and it is imated that in one county alone, at least enty residences are in ruins, to say nothing the loss on other buildings, live stock and m property. The towns which suffered the l force of the storm were Alexandersville, rrollton, Bellbrook, Xenia, and Jamestown. e last named thriving town is described as utter wreck. Six persons are known to ve been killed.

Extensive Forest Fires Desolated large Tracts country in Pennsylvania and New Jersey last ek. Fifty square miles of forest land were rned over near Ashland, Penn. Fires were o reported in Pennsylvania in the vicinity of ranton, Pottsville, Easton, and Emporium, d in New Jersey near Washington and Mat- an. A strong wind on Saturday swept the mes in the direction of Gilman's Station, and ough all the inhabitants turned out to fight e fire, their efforts were futile. Houses, hools, mills, and post-office were swept away, d the people fled for their lives. Over one ndred people are rendered homeless in that lage alone. The aggregate loss of property all this widespread conflagration will be ormous. It cannot be estimated yet, but the ildings destroyed will make a heavy showing, d the timber, of which more than two hun- ed million feet have been burned, is a serious ss. The need of more trees is severely felt in any parts of the country, and organized forts have been made to check the wholesale tting down of our forests. Those efforts ould now be extended to prevent the negli- nce which renders the extensive forest fires ssible.

Ben Hogan's Work in Pueblo, Col., is Produc- g good results. The Rev. E. W. Oakes says, a letter to the editor of THE CHRISTIAN ERALD, recently received: "Ben Hogan is oing a good work here. The beauty of Ben's ork is that he keeps testifying that nothing at the blood of Jesus can save from sin. He ses the Bible for his foundation. He is a truly ospel temperance worker. He spoke the first unday night in my church to an overflowing udience. Since then he has been working in hall on one of our leading avenues, and the all keeps full. He speaks on Sunday next in he Presbyterian church."

A Prediction of an Impending Social Con- ulsion was made by Dr. Talmage in the course f his last "Friday Evening Talk," which was n the subject of the May moving-day. He aid: "The trouble is, that the few in this ountry own all the real estate. The gathering f so much wealth into the coffers of a select umber compels the great mass of people to ake up residences they dislike. Society is out f joint, or every industrious man would own his wn house." He then spoke of the deserving en, who, because of being strictly honest, had ot what they merited, while others less crupulous became possessed of this world's oods in excess of their deserts." Continuing, e said: "This first of May moving is to be as- ribed to a radical defect in our social econ- my—a defect so deep, so wide, so overmas- ering that no one but God can ever eradicate it. he time will come when the law of the land ill put a limit to one's right to accumulate. I do not think that anything will be accomplished by the gospel of dynamite. But that something must be done and will be done to stop this monopolistic devastation and give a chance to every man to achieve for himself an unmortgaged home, I am as certain as that yesterday was the first of May." He then showed the tendency of existing monopolies, and predicted that if things were allowed to go on as at present they were going, the troubles of Ireland would be upon us, only in a tenfold more dangerous form. Concluding, he said: "It will not be London fighting Dublin, but New York at the throat of New York; Brooklyn against Brooklyn; a death-grapple from St. Lawrence to Mobile Bay, and from ocean to ocean. May God avert this tremendous issue."

The New Jersey Temperance Crusade is being earnestly pressed forward. Messrs. Mabee and English are now at Rahway, where the interest rivals that aroused at Plainfield. They held their first meeting on April 30th in the Opera House, which was crowded with people. At the conclusion of their exhortations two hundred and eighty persons signed the pledge of total abstinence. Among the number were many of the best known drinkers of the town. On Friday night the Opera House was again filled to overflowing, and nearly a hundred men signed the pledge. The crusade is being carried on under the auspices of the Rahway Reform Club, through whose efforts nine saloons have been closed within the past week. At Princeton the temperance people are agitating against saloons and the college faculty are assisting. On May 1st an immense prohibition mass meeting was held in the First Presbyterian Church. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Drs. Hodge, McCosh, Worden, and Janvier, Prof. Johnson, and Mr. Baldwin. Several hundred voters signed the no-license petition, whch is to be presented this week to the new Republican Common Council.

A Peculiar Yellow Mist Covered New York, Brooklyn, and the adjacent cities on Friday last. It lay thick like fog on the rivers and delayed traffic. It is supposed to have been smoke carried by the wind from the burning forests of New Jersey and Pennsylvania. A despatch from Philadelphia states that the same phenomenon was observed there, and that it was so thick along the railroads in the valley that engineers had much difficulty in running their trains, white lights appearing red and being mistaken for danger signals." The inconvenience thus caused involved less peril than if the conditions had been reversed, and the red or danger signals made to appear white, indicating safety. A worldly atmosphere frequently acts in that way on the minds of young people and careless Christians, who, looking through the mist of worldly motives and sophistry do not recognize the warning signals God sends them (1 Tim. 6 : 4-10).

A Gold Nugget was Found among some dead leaves recently in Rhode Island. One of the citizens of Narragansett formerly resided in California, where he found a small nugget which he had made into a breastpin and wore upon his scarf. Several years ago while he was getting birch bark in the Rhode Island woods he lost the pin, and though he searched carefully could not find it. Two weeks ago he was again in the woods near the spot where he believed he had lost the pin. Though so many years had passed, something impelled him to search the spot again. He was almost ashamed to look, the idea of finding it seemed so silly, but he did look, and brushing away the dead leaves and twigs he saw the pin, with its gold-nugget top uninjured though tarnished. It looked worthless, but the finder knew its value, and was delighted at recovering it. We read that "the precious sons of Zion," though despised, are "comparable to fine gold" (Lam. 4 : 2), and some of them through backsliding are lost. Those who find them and restore them, though they may have become tarnished by sin, are promised an eternal reward (James 5 : 19, 20).

"MY LORD AND MY GOD."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God."—JOHN 20 : 28.

The Absent One a Doubter—Christ's Patience—Value of a Convinced Sceptical Witness—Christ's Care for Those who Lag Behind—I. The Exclamation of Thomas—A Plain Confession—Accepted by Jesus—Not a Profane Exclamation—An Expression of Wonder—Of Delight—Did Thomas Touch the Lord?—A Confession of Faith—A Profession of Allegiance—II. How he Came to the Exclamation—Why he went to the Meeting—His Thoughts Revealed—The Sight of the Wounds—III. How we may Come to it.

WHEN the apostles met on the first Lord's-day after Jesus had risen, Thomas was the only disciple absent out of the eleven; on the second Lord's-day Thomas was there, and he was the only disciple doubting out of the eleven. How much the fact of his doubting was occasioned and helped by the fact of his former absence I cannot say; but still it looks highly probable that had he been there at the first, he would have enjoyed the same experience as the other ten, and would have been able to say as they did, "We have seen the Lord." Let us not forsake the assembling of ourselves together as the manner of some is, for we cannot tell what loss we may sustain thereby.

On the second occasion Thomas is present, and he is the only one out of the eleven who is vexed with doubts. He cannot think it possible that the Lord Jesus, who was nailed to the cross, and whose side was pierced, could have really risen from the dead. Observe joyfully the Lord's patience with him. All the others had been doubtful too, and the Lord had gently upbraided them for their unbelief and the hardness of their hearts; but Thomas is not convinced by the tenfold testimony of his brethren, who each one well deserved his implicit confidence. After the plain way in which the Lord had told His disciples that He should be crucified and would rise again from the dead, they ought to have expected the resurrection; and inasmuch as they did not they were to be blamed: what shall we say of him who in addition to all this had heard the witness of his ten comrades who had actually seen the Lord? Yet there he is, the one sturdy questioner who has laid down most stringent requirements as to the only way in which he will be brought to believe. Will not his Lord be provoked by his obstinacy? See how patient Jesus is! He rebukes their unbelief: for that was needful for their sakes; but He manifests no vexation of spirit. Especially on this occasion He shows His tenderness toward Thomas, and addresses His first words to him. If Thomas will not be convinced except by what I must call the most gross and materialistic evidence, He will give him such evidence; if he must put his finger into the print of the nails, he shall put his finger there; if he must thrust his hand into His side, he shall be permitted to take that liberty. Oh, see how Jesus condescends to the weaknesses and even to the follies of His people! If we are unbelieving it is not His fault; for He goes out of His way to teach us faith, and sometimes He even gives what we have no right to ask. It is not His will that one of His little ones should perish; and therefore He chases away unbelief, which is their deadliest foe.

Our Lord had special reasons for turning as he did to Thomas that day, and for taking so much trouble to bring Thomas out of his unbelieving condition. The reason must have been, surely, first, that He desired to make of Thomas a most convincing witness to the reality of His resurrection. Here is a man who is determined not to be deceived; let him come and use the tests of his own choice. In Thomas we have a man who was specially hard to be convinced, a man who was so obstinate as to give the lie to ten of his friends with whom he had been associated for years. Now, if I had a statement to make which I wished to have well attested, I should like to place in the witness-box a person who was known to be exceedingly cautious and wary. I should be glad if it were known that at the first he had been suspicious and critical, but had at length been overwhelmed by evidence so as to be compelled to believe. I am sure that such a man would give his evidence with the accent of conviction, as indeed Thomas did when he cried, "My Lord and my God." We cannot have a better witness to the fact that the Lord is risen indeed than that this cool, examining, prudent, critical Thomas arrived at an absolute certainty.

This note is also to be heard in reference to this matter: After all, it is to be feared that the dull, the slow, the questioning, the anxious, the weak in faith, make up a very considerable part of the church; I do not know that they are in the majority, but they are certainly far too numerous. If all Christians were arranged and classified, I fear we could not many of us place ourselves in the front rank; but a large portion would have to go among the Little-faiths. Our Lord here shows us that He has a condescending care for those who lag behind. Thomas is a week behind everybody else, yet his Lord has not lost patience, but waiteth to be gracious. The other ten apostles have all seen the Lord, and been well assured of His resurrection for the last seven days; but that is no reason why the late-comer should be left out in the cold. Our Lord does not leave the rear rank to perish.

Now, if there should be any in this assembly who honestly have to put themselves down in the sick list, I beg them to take comfort while I try and set forth the experience of Thomas and what came of it. First, I shall call your attention to the exclamation of Thomas, "My Lord and my God;" secondly, we will consider, how he came to it; and thirdly, how we come to it; for I trust many of us have also cried, "My Lord and My God."

I. Let us consider

of Thomas, "My Lord and my God." This is a most plain and hearty confession of the true and proper Deity of our Lord Jesus Christ. It is as much as a man could say if he wished to assert indisputably and dogmatically that Jesus is indeed God and Lord. We find David saying, "O Lord of hosts, my King, and my God," and in another place (Psalm 35 : 23) he says, "My God and my Lord," terms only applicable to Jehovah. Such expressions were known to Thomas, and he as an Israelite would never have applied them to any person whom he did not believe to be God. We are sure therefore that it was the belief of Thomas that the risen Saviour was Lord and God. If this had been a mistake, the Lord Jesus would have rebuked him, for He would not have allowed him to be guilty of worshipping a mere man. No good man among us would permit a person to call him God and Lord. The perfect Jesus accepted divine homage, and therefore we are assured that it was rightly and properly given, and we do here at this moment offer him the like adoration.

To escape from the force of this confession, some who denied our Lord's Deity in olden times had the effrontery to charge Thomas with breaking the third commandment by uttering such a cry of surprise as is common among profane talkers. Just as thoughtless persons take the Lord's name in vain and say, "Good God!" or "O Lord!" when they are much astonished, so certain ancient heretics dared to interpret these words—"My Lord and my God." It is clear to any thoughtful person that this could not have been the case. For, in the first place, it was not the habit of a Jew to use any such exclamation when surprised or amazed. An irreligious Gentile might have done so, but it was the last thing that would occur to a devout Israelite. If there is one thing about which the Jews in our Lord's times were particular beyond everything, it was about using the name of God. Why, even in their sacred books they have omitted the word "Jehovah," and have only written "Adonai," because of a superstitious reverence for the very letters of the divine name. I do not know what an Israelite might have said under the influence of a great surprise, but I am absolutely certain that he would not have said, "My Lord and my God."

In the next place, it could not have been a mere exclamation of surprise, or an irreverent utterance, because it was not rebuked by our Lord, and we may be sure He would not have suffered such an unhallowed cry to have gone without a reprimand. Observe, too, that it was addressed to the Lord Jesus—"Thomas answered and said unto Him, My Lord and my God." It was not a mere outburst of surprise addressed to no one, but it was an answer directed to the Lord who had spoken to him. It was also such a reply that our Lord Jesus Christ accepted it as for in the twenty-ninth verse He says, "Thou hast believed," and that confession was the only evidence of his believing which our Lord had received from Thomas. A mere outcry of confused astonishment in irreverent words would never have been received as a satisfactory proof of faith. Sin is not an evidence of faith. The slander proposed by the Arian must, therefore, be rejected with derision. I am almost ashamed to have mentioned it, but in these days, when every kind of error is rife, it is needful to bring to light and break in pieces many idols which we had rather have left with the moles and bats.

I regard this cry of Thomas, first, as a devout expression of that holy wonder which came upon him when his heart made the great discovery that Jesus was assuredly his Lord and God. It had flashed upon the mind of Thomas that this august person whom he had regarded as the Messiah was also God. He saw that the man at whose feet he had sat was more than man, and was assuredly God, and this amazed him so that he used broken speech. He does not say, "Thou are my Lord and my God," as a man would say who is making a doctrinal statement, but he brings it out in fragments, he makes adoration of it, he cries in ecstacy, "My Lord and my God."

He is amazed at the discovery which he has made, and probably also at the fact that he has not seen it long before. Why, he might have known it, and ought to have perceived it years before! Had he not been present when Jesus trod the sea? when He hushed the winds, and bade the waters sleep? Had he not seen Him open the blind eyes, and unstop the deaf ears? Why did he not cry, "My Lord and my God," then? Thomas had been and the Lord might have said to him, as He did to Philip, "Have I been so long time with you, and yet hast thou not known me?" Now on a sudden he does know his Lord—knows Him to such a surprising extent that such knowlege is too wonderful for him. He had come to the meeting to prove whether He who appeared to his brethren was the same man who had died on Calvary, but now he seems to have forgotten that original question; it is more than answered, it has ceased to be a question; he is carried far further by the flood of evidence, he is landed in a full belief of the Godhead of Jesus.

Next, I believe that this was an expression of immeasurable delight; for you observe he does not say, "Lord and God," but "My Lord and my God." He seems to take hold of the Lord Jesus with both hands, by those two blessed "my's"—"My Lord and my God." Oh, the joy that flashed from the eyes of Thomas at that moment! How quickly his heart beat! He had never known such joy as at that instant, and though he must have felt deeply humbled, yet in that humiliation there was an excessive sweetness of intense satisfaction as he looked at his divine Lord and gazed on Him, from the pierced feet up to the brow so marred with th crown of thorns, and said, "My Lord and m God."

More than this, I believe that the words Thomas indicate

A COMPLETE CHANGE OF MIND

—in other words, a most hearty repentanc He has not asked of the Lord Jesus to be pe mitted to put his finger into the print of th nails. No, all that has gone without debat If you look at the chapter you will find n statement that he ever did handle the Lord ; he had at first proposed. I put the question t a dear companion of mine; I read the passag and then I asked, "What think you, di Thomas put his hand into Christ's side?" an the answer from a thoughtful mind and gentle heart was this—"I do not think h could; after the Master had so spoken to hi he would shrink from doing so, and would thin it wilful unbelief to attempt it." This repl coincided exactly with my own convictions. feel sure that had it been my case I should hav felt so ashamed at ever having proposed such test, and so overwhelmed to find the Lord yield ing to it, that I could not have gone an inc further in the way of seeking tokens and proo unless I had been absolutely commanded to d so. The Saviour said to him, "Because tho hast seen me, thou hast believed." Now, I la no stress upon it; but it would seem probabl that the Saviour might have said, "Becaus thou hast touched me thou hast believed," Thomas had indeed touched Him; but inas much as He only speaks of sight, it may be tha sight was enough for Thomas. I do not insis upon it, but I think it right to suggest it; I fe it is not unreasonable to conclude that a Thomas did was to look at his Lord.

This exclamation is also a brief confession faith, "My Lord and my God." Whosoeve will be saved, before all things it is necessar that he be able to unite with Thomas heartil in this creed, "My Lord and my God." I d not go in for all the minute distinctions of th Athanasian Creed, but I have no doubt that was absolutely needful at the time it wa written, and that it materially helped to chec the evasions and tricks of the Arians.

THIS SHORT CREED

of Thomas I like much better, for it is brie pithy, full, sententious, and it avoids thos matters of detail which are the quicksands c faith. Socinians may call Jesus what the please; to me He is God over all, blessed fo ever. I know that you say, "Amen."

Further than this, do you not think tha these words of Thomas were an enthusiasti profession of his allegiance to Christ? "M Lord and my God." It was as though he pai Him lowliest homage, and dedicated himsel there and then in the entirety of his nature t His service. To Him whom He had onc doubted he now submits himself, for in Him h fully believes. He does as good as say "Henceforth, O Christ, thou art my Lord, an I will serve Thee: Thou art my God, and I wil worship Thee."

II. Our next division is to be headed wit the question—

HOW DID HE COME to that exclamation? Have you ever though what Thomas's feelings were when he went t the meeting that evening? His going needed complicated explanation. Why did he mingl with men whose solemn assertions he doubted Could he have fellowship with them, and ye give them the lie? Suppose Jesus Christ to b dead, and not risen, why does Thomas go? I he going to worship a dead man? Is he abou to renounce the faith of the last two years How can he hold it if Jesus is not alive? Ye how can he give it up? Was Jesus Christ Lor and God to Thomas when he first entered tha meeting? I suppose not. He did not, wher he entered the room, believe Him to be th same person who had died. The other disciple did believe, and Thomas was now the lone doubter, peculiar, positive, obstinate, Has i never happened to other disciples to drift into much the same condition? Thomas was a lot out of catalogue that evening; he was the odd person in the little gathering, and yet before service was over the Lord had completely altered him. "Behold, there are last which shall be first, and there are first which shall be last."

The first thing, I think, that led Thomas to this confession of his belief in Christ's Deity was that he had his thoughts revealed. The Saviour came into the room, the doors being shut; without opening the doors He suddenly appeared before them by His own divine power. There and then pointing to Thomas He repeated to him the very words which Thomas had said to his brethren. They had not been reported to the Saviour, but the Saviour had read Thomas's thoughts at a distance, and He was therefore able to bring before him his exact words. "Oh," saith he, "He who now speaks to me is none other than God, and He shall be my Lord and my God." This helped him to his assured conviction that one who had read his thoughts must be God.

But perhaps the most convincing arguments of all were our Lord's wounds. It seems a long way round to infer the Deity of Christ from His wounds; yet it is GOOD AND CLEAR ARGUMENT.

I shall not set it out in order before you, but leave you to think it out for yourselves, yet one little hint I would give you; here is a wound in His side more than sufficient to have caused death; it has gone right to the heart; the soldier with a spear pierced His side, and forthwith flowed there out blood and water, proving that the heart was pierced. The opening was still there, for the Lord invited Thomas to thrust his hand into His side, and yet Jesus lived. Heard ye ever such a story as this?—a man with a death-wound gaping wide inviting another to thrust his hand therein. Had our Lord been living after the way in which we live, by the circulation of the blood, one can hardly see how this could have been possible. Flesh and blood, being subject to corruption, cannot inherit the kingdom of God; but the Saviour's risen body came not under that description, as indeed His buried body did not, for He saw no corruption.

I invite you to note well the distinction which may be seen in our Lord's words concerning His own body; He does not speak of His body as flesh and blood, but He says, "Handle Me, and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see Me have." It was a real body and a material body; for He took a piece of a broiled fish and of a honeycomb, and did eat before them; but still his resurrection body, living with an open wound in His side, reaching to the heart, was not after the manner of men. So even in the wounds of Christ, we read that He is man, but not mere man; His wounds in various ways were evidence to Thomas of His Deity. Anyhow, the glorious fact rushed upon Thomas's astonished mind in a single moment, and therefore he cried out, "My Lord and my God."

III. Finally, let us see

HOW WE MAY COME TO IT.

That is our final point, and the most practical of all. I doubt not that the Spirit of God was at work with Thomas at that time very mightily, and that the true cause of his enlightenment was heavenly illumination. If ever any one of us shall cry in spirit and in truth, "My Lord and my God!" the Holy Spirit must teach us.

But I will tell you when believers do cry, "My Lord and my God." I remember the first time it filled my heart. Burdened with guilt, and full of fears, I was as wretched as a man could be outside of hell-gate, when I heard the voice of the Lord saying, "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else." I did look there and then; I gave a faith-glance to Him who suffered in my stead and in an instant my peace was like a river. My heart leaped from despair to gladness, and I knew my Lord to be divine. If any one had said to me then, "Jesus Christ is not God," I would have laughed him to scorn. He was beyond all question my Lord and my God, for He had wrought a divine work in me. It may not be an argument to anybody else, but forgiveness consciously known in the soul is a conclusive argument to the man who has ever felt it.

This first avowal has proved to be only the beginning of these confessions. We remember many other acknowledgments of the same fact. We were severely tempted, and yet we did not slip, nor stain our garments. What a wonder that we escaped! He that kept us from falling must be God. I know some moments in my life when I could stand and look back in the morning-light upon the valley through which I had passed in the dark; and when I saw how narrow the pathway was, how a little step to the left or to the right must have been my total destruction, and yet I had never tripped, but had come straight through in perfect safety, I was astounded, and bowing my head I worshipped, saying, "The Lord has been my refuge and my defence."

Such, also, has been the case in time of trouble, when you have been comforted and upheld. A very heavy affliction has fallen upon you, and yet to your surprise it has not crushed you as you feared it would have done. Years before you had looked forward to the stroke with agonizing apprehension, and said, "I shall never bear it;" but you did bear it, and at this moment you are thankful that you had it to bear. The thing which you feared came upon you, and when it came it seemed like a feather weight compared with what you expected it to be; you were able to sit down and say, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Your friends were surprised at you; you had been a poor, wretchedly nervous creature before, but in the time of trial you displayed a singular strength such as surprised everybody. Most of all for you were full of amazement that in weakness you were made so strong. You said, "I was brought low, and He helped me." You could not doubt His Deity then.

There have been other occasions less trying. Bear with me if I mention one or two more. When we have been musing, the fire has burned. While studying the story of our Lord, our faith in His Deity has been intensified. When the Spirit of God has revealed the Lord Jesus to us and in us, then we have cried, "My Lord and my God." Though not after the flesh, yet in very deed and truth we have seen the Lord. On a day which I had given up to prayer, I sat before the Lord in holy peacefulness, wrapped in solemn contemplation, and though I did not see a vision, nor wish to see one, yet I so realized my Master's presence that I was borne away from all earthly things, and knew of no man save Jesus only. Then a sense of His Godhead filled me till I would fain have stood up where I was and have proclaimed aloud, as with the voice of a trumpet, that He was my Lord and my God. Such times you also have known.

I will tell you yet again when Jesus has been Lord and God both to me and to you, and that is in times and laid His arm bare in the salvation of men. When our report has been believed by those who rejected it before, and the Lord has sent us a happy season of revival, we have given to Him the glory, and rejoiced in His omnipotent love. We prayed for our children, and when to our surprise—it is a shame to say to our surprise, for it ought not to have surprised us—the Lord heard our prayer, and first one and then another came to us and said, "Father, I have found the Lord," then we knew that the Lord He is God, and our God too. We looked up from our poor prayers with tears in our eyes to think the Lord Jesus could have heard such weak petitions, and we said in the depths of our hearts, "My Lord and my God."

We went out and tried to teach a dozen or two in a cottage—poor, broken words were all that we could utter; but the Lord blessed it, and we heard a poor woman crying for mercy as we came out, and we said inwardly, "My Lord and my God." If you have been in the inquiry room after some brother whom God greatly honors has been proclaiming the Word with power, and if you have seen the people falling right and left under the shafts of the divine word, you must have cried, "This is no cunningly devised fable, no fiction, and no fancy," and your heart must have throbbed with all its life, "My Lord and my God."

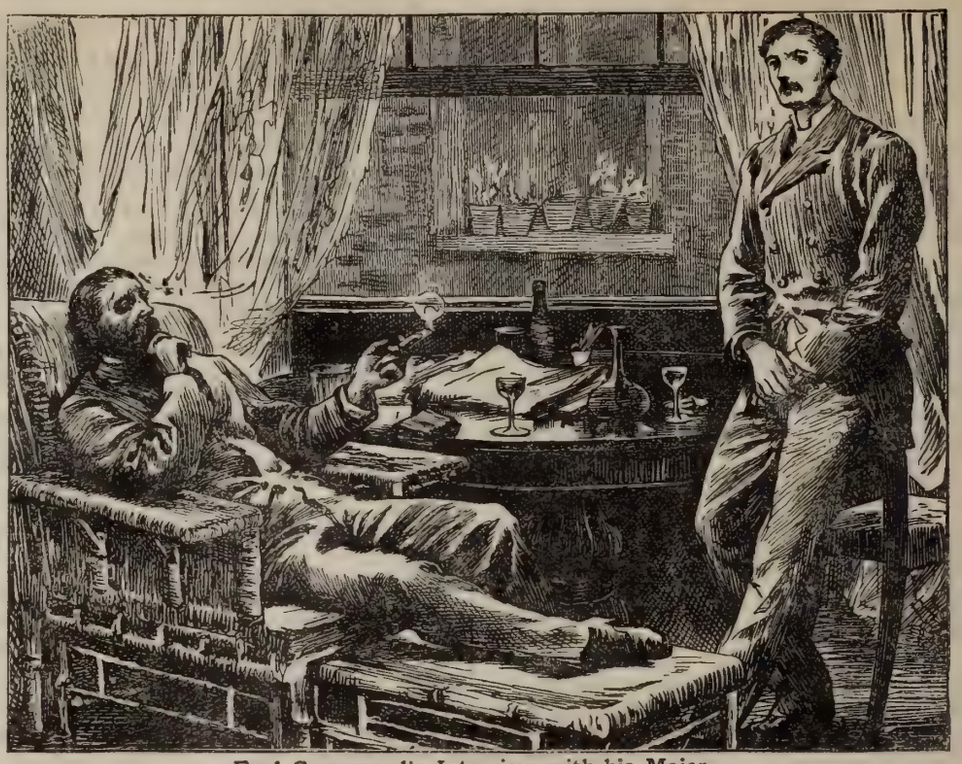
The time is very soon coming with some of us when we shall have our last opportunities in this life to find this true. How comforted and refreshed have I often been when visiting dying saints. Truly the Lord has prepared a table for them in the presence of

THE LAST ENEMY.

I can truly say that no scenes that these eyes have ever beheld have so gladdened me as the sight of my dear brethren and sisters when they have been departing out of the world unto the Father. The saddest scene has been the happiest. I have known some of them in life as self-distrusting, trembling, lowly-minded believers; and when they have come into the valley of death-shade they have displayed no fear, no doubt, but all has been full assurance. How sweet to know Jesus as our living God in our dying moments! In Him we rejoice with joy unspeakable and fully of glory, as we say unto Him in death, "My Lord and my God." Come, brothers and sisters, be of good cheer! A little further on we shall come to the narrow stream. This we shall cross in an instant, and then———! It will be but a short, short time; twenty years is soon gone, a hundred years even fly as on eagles' wings, and then we shall be forever with the Lord in the glory land. How sweetly will we sing to His eternal praise, "My Lord and my God!" There shall be no doubters in heaven; no sceptics shall worry us there; but this shall be the unanimous voice of all the redeemed—"Jesus is our Lord and God." The united Church, freed from every spot and wrinkle, and gloriously arrayed as the bride of Christ, shall be conducted to His throne, and acknowledged as the Lord's beloved, and then shall she with full heart exclaim, "My Lord and my God."

Morphine Instead of Quinine was Administered on April 14th by an Alabama physician. A patient was suffering from tonsillitis, and the doctor having given medicine to abate the fever, left the house, giving directions that she should take certain capsules later in the day. At the time indicated one of the capsules was given her. In a short time she complained of "feeling foolish" about her head, and soon afterward fell into a stupor. The physician was again summoned, and the patient's mother said to him: "Doctor, are you certain you have given the right medicine?" By this time he had discovered his error, and replied, "Lord have mercy on me! I have given the wrong medicine." Naturally the doctor was excited, but he had presence of mind enough to order hot coffee to be made and put those present to rubbing the patient and dashing cold water in her face, while he went in search of an antidote. But it was all in vain. The young lady was dead in an hour. By mistake the doctor had given morphine instead of quinine. It was an agonizing mistake, and the doctor was overwhelmed with sorrow for his irreparable blunder. Similar mistakes are sometimes made by false spiritual guides. The souls of awakened sinners in spiritual agony have been lulled into false peace by those who should have led them to the Saviour. The responsibility of those who thus deal with anxious inquirers is appalling (Jer. 8; 11).

Queen Pomare V. of Tahiti.



Fred Greenwood's Interview with his Major.

POMARE V.,
Queen of Tahiti.

THE royal lady whose portrait appears above, spent a few days in New York two weeks ago. She made no fuss, had no formal reception, and went about much as other ladies do. With one lady attendant, she rode in the horse-cars and on the elevated road, strolled about Central Park, and purchased herself, such articles as she needed from the stores on Broadway. It may have surprised other royal ladies that nothing dreadful occurred, and that after the contact of royalty with the common people neither the Queen nor the common people were any the worse.

Queen Pomare was on her way home from a visit to France, and after she left New York she travelled to San Francisco, where she will take the steamer for Tahiti. Her majesty is tall and of graceful figure, has olive complexion, dark eyes, and black hair. She speaks English, French, and Spanish fluently, and is witty and intelligent. Her power in the country of which she is Queen has been curtailed of late years, and, as has happened to other royal personages, she cannot rule her subjects as her predecessors did. In addition to the checks imposed on royalty by the democratic tendencies of the times, the monarchs of Tahiti have been further controlled by the protectorate of France. This protectorate was first established in 1844, France adopting her favorite pretext of "protecting" Roman Catholic missionaries. On June 29th, 1880, the mask was formally dropped, and Tahiti and the other Society Islands were annexed. The Pomare dynasty, however, still nominally rule in Tahiti.

Queen Pomare, on the occasion of her visit, thus described the government and people:

"We have a double government in many respects. For instance, there are three courts in Tahiti. The first is the Toohita Court, in which judge, jury, and people are all natives. Then there are the Supreme Court and Lower Court for Europeans. The natives sometimes come under the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in important cases, but the King has the power of keeping people of native blood out of the Supreme Court if he so desires. The people are well satisfied with the present form of government. They are quiet, peaceable, and strictly honest. In the past fifty years only three murders have been committed on the island. There are 10,000 natives and 1500 Europeans on the island. We have no railroads, or other of your modern inventions. I do not know that we need them."

The Protestant missionaries were vehemently opposed by the French, and many of them were forced to fly from the island. A concession was, however, ultimately obtained from Louis Napoleon by the English Government, and since that time their presence has been tolerated, and they continue preaching with success.

FRED GREENWOOD'S RESOLVE.

(See Illustration.)

Two young officers of the army were pacing the parade ground one sultry summer evening. They were engaged in earnest conversation, and only by a passing nod of recognition noticed the acquaintances whom they met. The elder of the two, Lieutenant Greenwood, was talking seriously and encouragingly, while his companion, Ensign Harding, was moody and despairing. The conversation continued until after sundown, and at last Lieutenant Greenwood parted from the other, and walked rapidly in the opposite direction. He halted at the door of the Major's quarters, and was admitted.

Greenwood was a great favorite of the Major, and was received with a cordial welcome. The Major, a well-preserved man of some five and fifty years, was stretched at length in his Indian chair enjoying his customary evening cigar. A glass of iced liquor stood at his elbow, and the materials for making more of the same beverage were on the table. Major Bolton was a bachelor, and very hospitable; he laid down the little volume of poetry he was reading, and bade his young friend "light up" and mix for himself.

"Glad to see you, my boy," he said; "it is too hot to go out to-night, so I settled myself for a solitary evening, but I had rather have company. Sit down and make yourself comfortable."

But Fred Greenwood was not in the mood to be comfortable, and fidgeted about the Major's room in a nervous manner. He was at a loss how to open the subject he had in hand.

"What is the matter with you, Greenwood?" the Major asked. "You are as restless as a monkey."

"The fact is, Major, I have a miserable business in hand, and I have come to see if I can get some aid from you; but I am a bad hand in such matters."

"What is the trouble, Fred? Be sure I will help you if I can. You are the last of our men I should have expected to get into trouble. I have always considered you a model officer, and wished Harding and the other fast young fellows would follow your example."

"The trouble is not mine, Major, though I am afraid I am not guiltless. The fact is Harding is in difficulties. I have just been talking with him. He is a good fellow, but as weak as water. He has been drinking, and betting, and playing poker until he has gone all to pieces. He is so cornered now that I have had great difficulty in keeping him from committin suicide."

"Well, Fred, that is neither your affair nor mine. We have not won any of his money. If young fellows will act in that way they must take the consequences."

"Yes, I know that, Major, but I am uneasy about it, nevertheless. You see, I know his family. His mother is a widow, and she and his sisters are the most refined, affectionate, gentle ladies in the world. He has two younger brothers, too, bright little fellows they are; his disgrace would break their hearts. I wish we could save him for their sakes."

"I wish that, too; but when a young fellow makes up his mind to go to the devil, it is hard work to hinder him. How much does he owe?"

"About eight thousand dollars, I believe."

"That might be arranged," said the Major, "but I doubt whether it would do him any good. If he could be induced to swear off and keep his oath there would be some encouragement to arrange this money; but, as you say, he is so deplorably weak that if we helped him now he would soon be in another difficulty."

"Yes, I know, but I cannot bear to let him go to ruin. I feel some responsibility myself. When he joined, he was as respectable and virtuous a young fellow as there was in the regiment. I could scarcely get him to drink a glass of wine. I wish I had never persuaded him to do it. Knowing his family I had him at my quarters a good deal, and it was there he learned to drink. He never drank to excess at my place, but he went away with other men and had more liquor, and so got into trouble. He is a perfect fool when he has taken a few glasses, and will play with any one and for any stakes. When he is sober he is careful and economical. He loves his mother and sisters dearly, and it is the thought of them that has driven him to despair. If we could make a total abstainer of him he would be safe."

"He has not the backbone for that, Fred. You know how he would be laughed at and ridiculed. No, make a temperance man of him. One or two glasses and no more; that is his line."

"That has been his line in intention, Major, but not in practice. When he has had the two glasses he weakens, and nothing stops him. God forgive me, I have pressed him to take more myself, and he yielded."

"So have I," said the hospitable Major. "I did not know of his weakness, or that he was making a struggle, or I would not have done it."

"My conscience accuses me of assisting in his ruin," said the younger man. "I feel bound to try to help him to recover."

"But how can you do that, Fred?"

"I don't quite know, but there is one thing I could do. I could become a total abstainer with him, and so help him bear the ridicule. He could never do it alone, but he might do it if there were two of us."

"That is rather a self-sacrifice, Fred, is it not? Do you feel so much regard as that for him?"

"It is not only regard, Major, it is a sense of my responsibility that impels me. I have had a share in the awful work of leading him wrong, and I must pay the penalty of a little loss of pleasure to bring him back. It will not cost much self-denial."

"You are a brave fellow, Fred, and a noble friend; I hope you will succeed. I suppose you want me to attend to the money part of the difficulty? Well, your enthusiasm has affected me. I will see what can be done. When does your total abstinence commence?"

"I have taken my last glass, Major. I have made up my mind. I will have no share for the future, neither by example nor invitation, in leading a young man astray. Good-night, Major. I'll go and take the good news about the money to Harding, and see if I can make a teetotaler of him."

Fred Greenwood shook the Major's hand heartily, and strode off toward Harding's rooms. He felt sure that he could put the young man on the right track and help him to keep to it. When he arrived at his friend's quarters he knocked, but received no answer. "Gone off for another spree," he said to himself. "That is too bad; I wonder where he is. I'll go after him if I can find out."

"Mr. Harding, sir," said the man who acted as Harding's valet and whom Greenwood questioned, "he is in his room, sir. I saw him go in, and he has not been out since."

Greenwood was alarmed, and knocked again more loudly. Then no answer being given he forced the door open. He had come too late. The young man lay on his bed, dead. A pistol shot had done the fatal work. It was too late to help him now. Greenwood, brave and manly as he was, sat down by the bedside and wept.

It was a sorrowful task to carry the melancholy intelligence to the bereaved family, but Fred undertook it. The sight of their woe confirmed him in the resolution he had taken; he never again touched liquor, and when he was tempted the thought of Harding's fate and the consciousness that he had a share in bringing it about nerved him to resist. Many a young man in after days was indebted to Fred Greenwood's example and advice for assistance in avoiding the first step on the fatal road of dissipation.

A HAWAIAN EQUESTRIENNE.

THE missionaries who have labored with so much success in the Sandwich Islands speak of the gracefulness with which the ladies of that locality sit their horses and of their fondness for that exercise. Our illustration represents a spectacle that may be witnessed every day in that land which was once the scene of idolatry and wickedness, but which now has been gloriously changed by the blessing of God on the labors of the devoted men of God. Formerly it was to enjoy pleasures, cruel and barbarous, that the native ladies mounted their horses and rode through the avenues of palm trees; but now they go with greater pleasure to attend the Gospel services.

Previous to 1819 the Sandwich Islands were the abode of cannibals, and human sacrifices were regularly offered there. Captain Cook, the famous navigator, was there killed and eaten in 1778. But in 1819 a missionary expedition was organized, and sailed from Boston, Mass. God had wonderfully prepared the way before it. Only a month or two before the arrival of the missionaries a new king, more enlightened than his predecessors, ascended the throne, whose name was Leholiho. There soon followed an event, which has scarcely a parallel in history, giving an affirmative answer to the inquiry of the prophet, "Hath a nation changed their gods which are yet no gods?" (Jeremiah 2 : 11.) The tabu system of restrictions and prohibitions, which was inseparable from the national idolatry, was overthrown. This tabu extended to sacred days, places, persons, and things; and the least failure to observe it was punished with death. But the king and queen set their faces against it, and the people soon followed their example. When the Americans arrived not only were they welcomed as missionaries, but as apostles of civilization, and Dr. Judd, their leader, became the adviser of the king and the chiefs. He organized the finances of the government, and was Minister of Finance almost to the time of his death, about 1867. The Rev. Dr. William Armstrong, of Pennsylvania, went out as a missionary in 1831, and remained at the mission until 1848, when King Kamehameha induced him to become Minister of Public Instruction, a place he held until his death, in 1859. Almost his first act was to establish a private school for the education of the children of the chiefs. It included among the classmates Kalakaua, now king of the islands, the dowager Queen Emma, and the three previous kings.

In our life of Dr. Titus Coan, published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 25th, 1883, one of the most indefatigable of these missionaries, full particulars were given of the progress of the Gospel work there.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A Budget of News.

THE following letter was mailed from Little Aston by the surgeon who was attending Robert Waldron. It was addressed to his friend Carl, a theological student, and explains the course of events in the Morley household:

"LITTLE ASTON, February 21, 186–.

"DEAR CARL: 'Where is Little Aston? and whatever is Grant doing there?' you are asking at this moment. Little Aston is a very small town, noticeable chiefly as a junction on the Midland Counties Railway, the town being nearly a mile from the station. Grant is being head-doctor, nurse, and general valet de chambre for a stranger who narrowly escaped assassination in the streets of the same small town three nights ago. I must explain to you how it all came about.

"You are aware that it is my usual luck to miss my train at a junction; and this luck threw me, at nine o'clock last Wednesday night, upon the tender mercies of the good innkeepers of Little Aston. As I am not rich, I sought a more humble tavern than the great hotel in the square, and I turned up a narrow, old-fashioned, dimly-lighted street in search of one. Here I stumbled against a man lying across the pavement, who, on examination proved to be not drunk, but half dead. There was not a sound to be heard in the street. I have learned since that every other night the police are sent out of the town into the country in pursuit of poachers, an admirable arrangement! I knocked with all my might at the nearest door, and as soon as it was opened, I carried in my man, and examined the extent of the mischief done. He had been wounded within an inch of his life. As he had neither blood nor time to lose, I demanded a room and a bed, which were immediately put at my disposal; and here I have been ever since.

"The whole affair is queer, excessively queer. The gentleman—he is a gentleman, there is no mistake about that; dress, jewelry, etc., are first-class, and his voice and language those of a well-born man—as soon as he recovered a little consciousness, begged me to keep this assault upon him a secret, and to remain with him until he can go away in order to avoid calling in a doctor and nurse. I have not any very particular business demanding me in any other part of the world, so I agreed to stay and bring him through it alone if there were no access of danger. I was anxious for the first forty-eight hours, but my anxiety is over now. He will do, and in another few days he and I may go on our separate ways; though I rather expect the 'Good Samaritan' will get a handsome fee for his time and trouble upon this occasion.

"The household subjected to this unpleasant invasion is as interesting as my patient. It consists of a father and daughter, with one very ordinary maid-of-all-work. I wish you could see them, Carl. Don't let Annie read this letter. The girl—her name is Hester—is different from any young creature I have ever seen. She produces upon me the impression of having always lived in moonlight, and having never seen the sun. She reminds me of primroses with the scent of spring in them, but which one knows will die before the summer sun comes. Or she is like her namesake, Queen Esther, stately, austere, and beautiful, but with the pallor of famine in her cheeks as she stands meekly in the outer court before the king has stretched out his royal sceptre to her. See how poetical I grow? But this girl has been starving all her life. There has been a famine of sunshine and laughter, and music; and she has grown up sad and pale. I should like to see her brought out into the full light; but I do not know how she could bear it.

"The father is a man bordering upon fifty, but he looks sixty, for his hair is snow-white, and his face seamed with lines. It is a gray mask, a dull, unnatural gray; but it lights up at times as from some smouldering flame behind it, and you see intense light and heat in his eyes. Do you remember that story we read when boys of the Hall of Eblis, where each tortured ghost walks solitarily, with his hand pressed upon his breast, and whenever the hand is raised, one can see a heart of fire beneath? I have thought once or twice, when I have come unexpectedly upon this man, that he was about to show me his heart on fire. He would perhaps do it to you, Carl; but you will never come across him. He is a bookseller; but reads more books than he sells. It is evident that money is scarce here. But who knows? perhaps this stranger, who tells me he is a rich man, will lift them out of their poverty. Perhaps he will fall in love with Hester. If I were he, and if I had never seen thy sister, Carl, I would woo this girl, and take her out into the fullest, brightest sunshine of fortune. She shall see him soon, and help me to nurse him; and—who can tell?

"I had written so far when I made the acquaintance of another member of this strange household. I was building a castle for my hero in bed here and my pale young heroine downstairs, when I heard the door very warily turned upon its hinges, and a new face peered round it. My patient had fallen asleep, and I beckoned angrily to the intruder to go away. Instead of doing so he entered on tiptoe, with his finger to his lips, and advanced into the middle of the room, steadfastly regarding the face of the sleeper. It was a small, shrunken man, wearing a linen apron and a brown paper cap. He glanced at me deprecatingly, but persisted in disregarding my gestures until I took him by the arm and led him to the door. He submitted meekly enough; and, as soon as we were in the passage outside, I whispered in a passion, 'What on earth brought you in there?'

"'Do you know who he is?' he asked, in a whisper also, but in a tone of horror which aroused my curiosity.'

"'No,' I said.

"'He ought not to be in this house,' he continued, energetically; 'not in the same house as the master and Miss Hester, of all places in the world. He ought never to have been brought in here, and he must be taken away at once, or worse will come of it. Everybody would say the same.'

"'Tell me why,' I said.

"'Who are you?' he asked.

"'A stranger; my name is James Grant, and I am a surgeon by profession.'

"He looked at me searchingly—it was like being scrutinized by a sparrow—and nodded. 'Come to my room,' he said.

"My patient was sleeping quietly, and would probably sleep for an hour. I followed the little man through three or four black-looking rooms which had formerly served as printing-offices, for there were some old presses still left, till we reached a large and light garret. Upon some shelves there were specimens of bookbinding which would have charmed your heart, and all other biblio-maniacs; but my new friend did not draw my attention to these. He gave me his stool to sit upon, and placed himself upon a heap of books. There was a chair in the window, but he did not offer it to me.

"Then, Carl, he unfolded to me a story. The man, whom I found well-nigh murdered, is the only son of that David Waldron who is one of your greatest men, and a trustee of your college. Ten years ago, he, the son, ran away with the young wife of the man whose home he is now in, and the husband has never since lifted up his head or let a smile dawn upon his face. He is here, sheltered by the roof he has dishonored; owing his life to the prompt humanity of the household he has wronged.

"My mind stopped there suddenly. Who, then, was the enemy that struck the blow—the deadly blow which nearly killed the man whom John Morley must needs hate? It seems that young Waldron only returned to his father's house a few months ago, on condition that he never set foot in the street where John Morley lives. What then brought him where I found him, at their very door? Whose hand but John Morley's own could have been lifted against him?

"'He must be taken away,' said the little man, trembling with excitement; 'you must get him away at once. Suppose the master should see him again, and know him! or Miss Hester!' Just then we heard the rustle of a dress on the staircase, and a step so light that we could hardly hear it. The workman rose hurriedly and placed a gorgeous book in my hand. It was a marvel of curious binding, with gilding as fine as gossamer and as rich as lace.

"'Yes,' he said, as Hester glided softly into the attic, 'it is very costly. Ah, Miss Hester! this gentleman is looking at some of my old work. But I can't do anything like this now, sir. My handy is not steady, and my eyesight is growing dull.'

"'I am learning this work myself,' she said to me, with a faint smile; 'but are you able to leave your charge? Is he so much better?'

"'He is going on well,' I answered; 'so well that he will soon be able to tell us something about himself. Your father and you must wish to know who he is?'

"The workman looked at me over her shoulder with an air of warning and entreaty.

"'I wish to know,' she said, 'and so does Lawson here; but my father cares very little about anything. He inquires after him, as you know, every day, and that is all.'

"I understood perfectly this absence of curiosity in John Morley.

"'Do you know who he is yet?' she inquired.

"'He has not been well enough for me to ask him any questions,' I answered, 'and he is quite a stranger to me. But I will ask him soon. He ought to communicate with his friends.'

"'It would be well,' she replied, with that dignity which reminds me of Queen Esther, and then she unfolded a large apron and sleeves, and attired herself in them for her singular occupation. I remained a few minutes watching her. I took up mechanically a short but heavy iron bar, technically called a pin, with which the binder screws and unscrews his press. It crossed my mind that such as this might easily be the blunt instrument with which Waldron had been struck. I threw it down hastily and returned to my patient.

"He was lying awake, and looking more collected than he had done since his accident. His eyes were clear, his pulse steady, and his face, though colorless, perfectly calm. As well as he could, he was promenading his regards, as the French say, about the room. It is a pleasant, simply-furnished chamber, with no ornament except the splendidly-bound volumes I have already mentioned. He was in a mood for talk; and I told him at some length who I am, and how I came to be at Little Aston in the right nick of time for him.

"'Do you see much of the people of the house?' he inquired.

"'Not much,' I answered; 'they are poor, and we give no little trouble in the house. They keep only one servant, and Hester has to work hard herself; especially since we two have been here.'

"'Hester!' he repeated, in a low tone; 'is she a little girl, demure, but merry at times? I fancy I know something of her and her father. Have they seen me, either of them?'

"'Yes,' I said, 'they have both seen you, and say you are a stranger to them. But Hester is not merry. Merry! she has not laughed these ten years, I should judge.'

"He winced, and turned his head away uneasily.

"'I want to see her,' he said, fretfully, and as if speaking to himself. 'I must tell little Hetty who I am. I could tell it to her; some good might come of it. Besides, I must see her; I have thought of nothing else since I knew where I was. I must and will speak to Hester.'

"He did not talk any more, but fell into a restless sleep, muttering to himself that he must see Hester. I am watching beside him now. The night is come on, and the house is as silent as a grave. I long to stamp heavily down the stairs, slam the doors, and whistle loudly; but the instant I set my foot out of this room the gloom conquers me. I tread on tiptoe, and close the doors as quietly as if some one lay a-dying somewhere. It has been a long dying here, Carl—a lingering death of ten years, and it is a man's heart that has been slowly breaking. It would have been more merciful to have killed him at once. I pity greatly John Morley.

"Good-by, old fellow. Write me a sermon for my romance. We ought to go through life together, you and I—to you the souls, to me the bodies. Together we might heal many sicknesses. GRANT."

While Robert Waldron had been lying in a state of stupefaction bordering upon delirium, he had possessed a dull but constant realization of the fact that he was in John Morley's house.

There was, it is strange to say, a species of satisfaction to him in this. The place which he d been forbidden to approach had become a elter to him, and had received him into its ost intimate recesses. He could hear, night d morning, John Morley's footsteps upon the airs; and he listened with a thrill of interest d a momentary triumph that he could hear it. ie soft sweet voice at his door was the voice the little Hester whom he had loved with the licate and chivalrous fondness which young en sometimes feel for children just entering on girlhood. There was a vague, weak grati-ation in knowing that he was with them—in e house where he had come and gone as a miliar friend in the days long gone by. In his upor, he was not sure that that time was ite past, or that Rose herself might not come his side and lay her cool hands upon his rning head. The past and present mingled iriously in his mind; and, upon the whole, his eling was one of contentment in being where was.

But when that lethargy was ended, his memo-es and fears awoke strongly within him. It as impossible to drive away the suspicion, on ripening into conviction, that it was John orley's own hand which had so nearly eprived him of life. He had no other enemy; ere was no other fellow-creature to whom he ved such a debt, which only revenge could y. He did not blame his assailant; he rather wned that it was no more than he deserved. ut if this were true, then John Morley knew m to be lying helpless, and within his power. e was in the hands of a deadly and stealthy e, with no protector but this stranger who d chanced to find him bleeding to death in ie street. He began to be suspicious of the ccor given to him. What could it all mean? as it an artifice to avert suspicion? Or did hn Morley wish to keep him yet within reach a subtle vengeance? The more he pondered er his position, the more bewildered and dis-uieted he became.

In his perplexity, he at last came to the solution to see Hester, and trust himself to er; and for that reason he endeavored to gain d preserve the calm which Grant assured im was essential to his speedy recovery. here were three wills at work in the house: obert Waldron had resolved to see Hester, nd speak with her; Grant was decided that it ould be best and wisest to get him away from ie place without letting her known who had een their guest; while Hester herself, in the ewly-awakened stimulus of curiosity, was bent pon discovering all she could concerning their trange inmate.

THE UPROAR AT EPHESUS.

S. S. Lesson for May 16, Acts 19 : 23-34. Golden Text, verse 36. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

"WHEN the enemy shall come in like a flood, he Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard gainst him" (Isa. 59 : 19). And equally might ve say, "When the Spirit of the Lord is most anifestly at work, the devil rages most." imothy and Erastus (a Corinthian of some ote, formerly the chamberlain of Corinth) Rom. 16 : 23) were gone into Macedonia on he work of the Lord. "And the same time here arose no small stir about that way."

SATAN TIMES OUR TRIALS

at seasons of greatest difficulty. He takes care hat a child shall fall ill, or an unexpected vis-tor come, just at the time one is changing ser-vants. He will manage that an unusual run of correspondence shall come just when one's cor-responding clerk is out of the way; there is some special need to use a conveyance just when the horse has lost a shoe; or a servant finds that breakfast is rung for early, just the very morning that the fire won't burn. If we have the care of these things in our hands, he soon succeeds in getting us into a state of worry. If the Lord reigns within, Satan meets with his Conqueror.

It was at the time when the loss of these two brethren made changes necessary in the church at Ephesus, that Satan stirred up Demetrius, a silversmith, to consider, in common with the heathen tradesmen and workmen of Ephesus, the bearing of the new religion upon their mercantile prospects. They held a public meeting, which was largely attended, and Demetrius addressed the audience. He was no enthusiast for his religion, and did not attempt to prove it was superior to Christianity. Quite another thing preoccupied him. "Sirs, ye know that

BY THIS CRAFT WE HAVE OUR WEALTH."

Perhaps there is not a brewer or a distiller in this country who would dare to say that the manufacture of drink was really good for the country; and yet they defend it tooth and nail, because by this craft they have their wealth. Probably there is not a tobacconist or a cigar manufacturer who would say that the country was the better, the richer, the more religious, or even the more intellectual for smoking; but by this trade they get their wealth, and so they must defend it. Few opium growers would maintain that the public health and morals of China were improved by the opium traffic; but guilty England winks at the sacrifice of life, and says, "By this trade we get our wealth." "If you can make money by it, it is lawful;" such is practically the creed of those who "seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's" (Phil. 2 : 21). Awful revelations come to light of members of churches whose revenue comes from houses of ill-fame, and the unholy excuse with which all is covered up is but that of the heathen Demetrius, "By this craft we have our wealth."

Demetrius, however, is a witness to the spread of the Gospel; he says: "Moreover ye see and hear, that not alone at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, this Paul hath persuaded and turned away much people, saying that they be no gods, which are made with hands." Like other outsiders, Demetrius only sees the negative side; he represents Paul as taking away the old superstition and giving nothing in the place of it: true disciple of his master, the devil, who always represents the service of God as a dead loss. Demetrius continues, "So that not only this our craft is in danger to be set at nought (this first); but also that the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed, whom all Asia and the world worshippeth." Business first, religion second. The people, roused by this appeal, and their self-interest and superstition touched, they raised a cry which they spread throughout the city, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians."

How far Paul and his helpers knew of what was stirring we know not; this we know, that God cares for His own, and nothing can come upon them without His permission. The whole city was filled with confusion, and the leaders of the riot caught two of Paul's companions in travel, Gaius and Aristarchus, and rushed, carrying them along, into the theatre. Arrived there, they held one of the most impossible things that can be; some "cried one thing, and some another: for the assembly was confused; and the more part knew not wherefore they were come together." Paul was not the man to hide and run away at such a time; he desired to go into the theatre, but "the disciples suffered him not." Probably he would not have been hindered by all their entreaties but that some of the chief of Asia, men in authority, desired him not to adventure himself into the theatre. Paul always recognized the authority of "the powers that be," and he yielded. This was not from fear; he had already "fought with beasts at Ephesus" (1 Cor. 15 : 32), probably in that very theatre. We see from this history that Paul did not court persecution, but he was ready for it when it came. Unless the Lord had sent him into the theatre, it is not likely that there would have been quiet enough for him to speak, and Paul could trust God for his companions as much while himself outside, as though he were present with them. We may be sure that Paul was engaged in trusting his God for the issue of this outbreak of persecution, and

THE LORD DID UNDERTAKE.

The people, not knowing on whom to vent their rage, "drew Alexander out of the multitude, the Jews putting him forward." We have no evidence that this was the same Alexander as that "Alexander the coppersmith," who did Paul much harm, and who was probably an Ephesian citizen, and the same of whom he speaks in connection with Hymeneus (1 Tim. 1 : 20). This Alexander wanted to make his defence unto the people—a hopeless thing amid such dire confusion! It only drew upon him the deafening cry of an excited multitude, continuing for two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." How helpless man is in such a scene as this, but how easily God can manage any multitude of people! He sent the town clerk, who appeased the people; they would give audience to him when to none else. The town clerk must have been a man of sense and with more reverence for the religion he professed than Demetrius had. He appeals to the people as Ephesian citizens, and to the reputation of Ephesus as the temple-keeper of the great goddess Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter (supposed to be an ærolite, but superstitiously worshipped by the Greeks of those days). He argues, "Seeing then that these things cannot be spoken against, ye ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly. For ye have brought hither these men, which are neither robbers of churches, nor yet blasphemers of your goddess." This was true, and the people must have felt it so, and that they looked very foolish in having thus taken the law into their own hands. And when their chief magistrate said that if Demetrius, or the craftsmen had a matter against any man, the law was open, and they could obtain redress in the ordinary way, the more thinking portion of the multitude must have felt very small, and that they had made

"MUCH ADO ABOUT NOTHING."

The town clerk would countenance nothing that was illegal, and consequently they had to go away feeling that they had lost their time and gained nothing. Thus the assembly was dismissed, and no man received any harm.

We are not told so, but the context would lead us to conclude that this blessed intervention was in answer to the prayers of Paul. It is also very apparent that God made use of this occasion to tell Paul that He needed him elsewhere. God has a voice in every circumstance; His language cannot be reduced to human rules. It would never answer to think that because Paul left Ephesus at this time, therefore whenever the multitude becomes excited in a city then is the time for God's messenger to flee. Neither is it a rule of God that His people are never to flee in time of persecution. He reserves to Himself the direction needed in each individual case. But He has taught us not to look at persecution as a strange or unusual thing, but to rejoice inasmuch as we are partakers of Christ's sufferings. Again and again He teaches us to rejoice in persecution. "If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye" (1 Pet. 4 : 13, 14). "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations" (James 1 : 2). "All that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution" (II Tim. 2 : 12). "Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice and be exceeding glad" (Matt. 5 : 11, 12). As apostolic piety revives, apostolic persecution will revive also; we can be ready for it only as we abide in Christ and as He lives His life in us.

General Gordon's Perilous Position in Khartoum is causing serious apprehension in England. As the government is indisposed to send an expedition to rescue him, it has been proposed to raise a fund to defray the expense of a private expedition. Many wealthy people have written to the newspapers stating their readiness to contribute to the fund. One person offers $125,000. The newspapers, however, decline to receive the subscriptions, contending that it is the duty of the government to provide for the safety of the distinguished general. The government express their conviction that General Gordon is not in any danger, but the publication of his urgent and pathetic appeals for assistance, his indignant declaration that he considers himself abandoned, and the fact that Sir Evelyn Baring, the British Minister in Egypt, urges that a force be sent to his succor, have created a painful impression. A motion of censure on the government for its negligence has been introduced into the House of Commons.

The Proposed Conference on the Egyptian financial difficulty is still under consideration among the great Powers of Europe. The chief obstacle is the opposition of the French Government. It protests against the scheme to reduce the claims of the bondholders and also against the Conference being limited to the discussion of the financial question. The French Minister has informed the English Secretary of State that the contemplated Egyptian Conference cannot be confined altogether to consideration of the obligations of Egypt to her creditors. The security of bondholders cannot be reduced to defray the expenses of recent adventurous enterprises which caused the difficulties that now embarrass the Egyptian Treasury Department. If appropriations are made partially on the ground of present necessities, a precedent will be established which will be certain to result in a renewal of the practice at recurring troubles of a similar character.

A Royal Marriage was Solemnized at Darmstadt, in Germany, on April 30th. The bride, Princess Victoria, is the daughter of the late Princess Alice of England, who married the Grand Duke of Hesse Darmstadt. The bridegroom, Prince Louis of Battenberg, is the son of Prince Alexander of Hesse, and brother of the Prince of Bulgaria. The bride's grandmother, the Queen of England, attended the ceremony, which especially interested her on account of her love for her favorite daughter, Princess Alice. A photograph was taken during the progress of the festivities which is likely to become popular among Her Majesty's loyal subjects. It was of the Queen as the centre of a group in which were her daughter, the Princess Imperial of Germany, and that lady's daughter and grand-daughter, four generations being thus represented of this prolific family.

An Extensive Scheme to Aid the Irish Peasantry will, it is said, be proposed by the British Government at an early date. Mr. William Shaw, one of the members of Parliament representing the city of Cork, is authority for the statement. He says: "I have the most positive knowledge that the government will announce within the next fortnight a new and important proposal for the extension of Irish peasant land-proprietorship. In this Mr. Gladstone will name two leading Irishmen, who will be asked to serve on the commission to be created for carrying out the plan. This plan will place at the disposal of the commission $25,000,000, to be lent out in small sums, at low interest and long terms, to Irish peasants who desire to purchase their present holdings at official valuation, which the government will force as low as possible. This is wonderful liberality, and the step, if carried out, will do more to place Ireland in the hands of the Irish and secure genuine home rule in Ireland than all the political fuss which any number of leagues could make in a century." Mr. Shaw, who is much respected in Ireland, is an advocate of home rule, but is opposed to Mr. Parnell's tactics. He regards that leader as a visionary who would prevent hungry Irishmen from getting bread unless they can get the whole loaf.

An International Confederation Against Socialism is being organized by the Russian Government. It has proposed to Austria to enter into an agreement to refuse all harbor to social refugees, and to surrender suspects to the complaining Powers. The Russian Government believe that if all the European Powers joined in such an association, the extreme forms of socialism, such as anarchism, would soon be crushed out by legal prosecutions and the inability of the revolutionists to find harbor or basis of operations. It is stated that Austria will reply favorably to Russia's proposition.

Distressing Anxiety and Suspense has been caused by the intelligence that the steamer State of Florida has foundered at sea. She sailed from New York for Glasgow on April 12th. She had on board eighty-five passengers, and her officers and crew numbered eighty men. On April 27th the steamer Devon picked up two empty life-boats belonging to the State of Florida, and passed a quantity of wreckage of the same vessel. It is believed that some of those on board were rescued. The City of Rome passed on April 23d a sailing vessel which made signals to her that she had on board a shipwrecked crew, but the signal giving the name of the vessel to which the crew belonged was not understood, though the first word was believed to be "State."

Disturbances have Occurred in Spain in Connection with the election of members of the Cortes. The government exercised its influence with a shameless disregard of the wishes of the people. So openly were electoral rights suppressed that in many cases the popular candidates withdrew from the election before the poll opened. The people were much excited by the oppression of the officials, and there were several risings which were suppressed by force. There were indications in some districts that the Nihilistic society called the Black Hand has largely extended its influence and membership. There is also in existence a military secret society affiliated with the Black Hand, which includes a large number of the rank and file of the army and a considerable proportion of the officers. The existence and rapid growth of these societies menaces the permanence of the present government of Spain.

The Liberals of Germany are Organizing an extensive movement having for its object the creation of a great national liberal German party, to embrace the entire Empire, with the view of uniting the whole German people in the pursuit of patriotic liberalism. A national conference of the party was held last week at Stuttgart for the purpose of arranging a final plan for the conduct of the coming campaign for election of members to the Reichstag. Three hundred and forty regular delegates, representing all the northern sections of the Empire, attended.

Dynamiters have been at Work in Toronto. On April 30th a boy whose father is a care-taker of the Parliament buildings in Toronto was playing around the western end of the buildings in which are situated the Crown Lands offices. From the ventilator under the window lighting the Commissioner of Crown Lands office he saw a roll of paper protruding, and his curiosity was aroused. He pulled it out, and he saw that it was a dynamite cartridge. Wire and a fuse were attached ready for explosion at a very short notice. The boy at once gave the alarm, and an instant search was made of the whole of the buildings. In the ventilator corresponding to the one in the western end, under the steps approaching the Speaker's chambers, two more cartridges were found in a similar position. The dynamite was in the cartridges, the wire was attached, and preparations had been made for the attachment of the fuse, which lay a short distance away. This demonstrates that the miscreants had been disturbed in their purpose and compelled suddenly to abandon it. "Th is enough in one cartridge," said Mr. McDon a gentleman who had one in his hands, blow up either the east or the west wing of Parliament buildings."

MUCH has been said and written during the past few months of the horrors of "Outcast London." The London correspondents of the American newspapers have sent us thrilling narratives of the misery and wretchedness in which the poor f that monster city live. We know by our tenement-house revelations how deplorable is the condition of our own poor; but not the worst scenes in the worst quarters of New York can parallel the scenes described by the newspaper correspondents as existing in London. Much has been said, too, of the responsibility for this shameful condition of affairs. It is intimated, or explicitly stated, that wealthy nobles own the wretched hovels in which these poor creatures live, and that they extort high rents from their tenants, while neglecting to provide for them decent accommodation. Nor has Christianity escaped censure. The Church in London is charged with forgetting her Lord's injunction to care for the poor and with omitting to carry the Gospel to the heathen at home, while spending large sums in evangelizing the heathen abroad. There is ground for these charges, but it is not right in this case—it is seldom right in any case—to condemn a class in the bulk. There are among English aristocrats many philanthropists, many Christian workers, who turn their backs on worldly pleasure and frivolity, and give their time, and labor, and wealth to the great undertaking of improving the condition of the poor. Prominent among these workers is the gentle lady whose portrait adorns this week the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Lady Hope, formerly Miss Elizabeth R. Cotton, is already known by her writing to our readers; a tale from her pen, entitled "Touches of Real Life," having appeared in these columns during the early months of 1881. She has written many similar works, full of incidents in the lives of the poor, and proving how intimately she must have associated with them, how deeply she sympathizes with them, and how anxious she is to awaken a similar sympathy in the minds of others. Her own personal labors in the slums of London are well known in English philanthropic circles. They are of various kinds, but all directed to the one end of improving the condition of the poor, both spiritually and physically, and they are all prompted by one motive—love to Christ and those whom He specially designated as on earth. By preaching the Gospel in mission halls, by visiting the sick and telling them of Christ, by helping the mothers and the children in their daily duties, and by inculcating temperance principles among the rough and brutal men, she has sought, and with no small success, to mitigate the sorrow and suffering incidental to their lot.

Lady Hope is now about forty years of age, is prepossessing in appearance, gifted with a voice of singular sweetness, an indefatigable capacity for hard work, and a most tender and sympathetic heart. Her father was General Sir Arthur Cotton, who in 1861 received the honor of knighthood for his public services in India, and in 1867 was nominated lieutenant-general in the army, attaining the rank of general in 1876. He was placed on the retired list in 1877.

Shortly after this event Miss Cotton married Admiral Sir James Hope, a relative of the Earl of Hopetoun, but her wedded life was only of brief duration, as Sir James died in 1882. He held the chief command of the English naval forces, on the East Indian Station and on the Chinese coast, in 1859–60, and he was nominated a K.C.B. for his ability and skill in that capacity, especially in the operations which led to the capture of Pekin. He was promoted to the rank of admiral in 1870; was appointed principal naval aide-de-camp to the Queen in 1873, and was placed on the retired list in March, 1878. His widow since his death has continued the labors of her earlier years, and in a recently published work she sketches the scenes amid which she has worked. One of those scenes is in the very district about which so much has been written lately.

IN THE MIDST OF "OUTCAST LONDON."

The details given are drawn from the records of a devoted missionary, who, having been blessed in his labors for Christ elsewhere, had entered upon this new and trying sphere of labor. Missionaries one after another had deserted the post, and curates left in rapid succession, borne down by the sights, and sounds, and smells, under which their courage had ebbed and their health given way. The scene which met the new-comer's eye when he ventured to inspect the district he was about to enter is shown in our frontispiece picture, No. 1, and is thus graphically depicted by the authoress:

He looked around. He was surrounded by houses, houses, houses! overtopping one another right into the gray dimness of smoke, and vapor, and cloud, of every shape, and size, and degree. Leaning, and jutting, and slanting, and bending, all jostling and crowded together like the huge iron limbs of a great forest, they seemed to have entangled in their meshes a tiny yard and imprisoned it. An oppressive load of foul air seemed to suffocate him as, with his friend, he found himself travelling the defiles of the court. It was called, as if in grim irony,

PARADISE PLACE!

Strange misnomer. A rush of comparisons entered his mind, and he said to himself, "Where am I? Surely 'Fiends' Court' would be the truest name for this fearful spot!" But another thought came—"Have not these people souls—precious souls? Souls that may be lost or saved, won or ruined?" And the softer feelings of pity and sorrow filled his heart.

At the further end of the court two wretched, half-clothed women were fighting desperately, striving to tear one another to pieces in their rage and fury. It was a sickening sight. Their hair was wild and unkempt; their clothes ragged; their voices shrieks from some evil depths, reminding one of the words applied to the unhallowed tongue,

"SET ON FIRE OF HELL."

Costermongers were filling their barrows, children were screaming and rolling in a sea of blackened filth at the open doors. Rags, in every stage of dirt, were hanging in rude festoons from the windows, garlanding the wretched yard, like archways, fluttering poison from their wreaths with every fresh breeze that passed them. Men and women, sleeping a half-drunken sleep, lay in the doorways, and groaned aloud in their misery as the two men passed, begging for money—"browns," they said, and "ha'porths of gin."

Sick, wearied, horrified, he turned his steps to another court. The name of this was

THE "QUEEN'S GARDENS."

In the first house three women sat upon an empty orange box, playing cards. "You are the man I want!" said one woman, springing to her feet as he came in. She had an awful face, bad and bold, discolored with sores and bruises. "You are the man for me," she repeated again. "Look at me! Don't I look bad? See what my man did the other night. He pitched me out of bed and hit me about. He declares he will murder me some day. I want you to convert him! When he is good we save a lot of money; when he is bad it's dreadful, that it is. Oh! do convert him. If you do, I'll stand treat!" (See picture No. 2 on frontispiece.)

No wonder that after a day spent among such scenes as these, the record affirms, "Our friend went back to his lodging very weary."

While ready to hail all agencies put forward for improving the condition of the dwellers in this pitiable region, Lady Hope has no faith in the efficacy of mere externals. She observes—and the experience of all who have studied the subject will support the opinion thus expressed—"Just take these poor creatures from the London slums, and put them into the most beautiful and aristocratic mansions of Belgravia—transplant them to Mayfair—do it to-day, and in one month's time Belgravia and Mayfair will be a rookery like the lowest depths of the East End. We all know this perfectly well. We see it every day."

The mischief is largely traced to its source, when we are reminded that amid it all the grog-shop is more or less defined, more or less tangible, such as this—drunken sleeps, perverted affections, unnatural cruelty, violations of decency. Murder, death, and infamy, with every other sin included, are fostered and sustained, created by this fearful liquor, put before the people as it is in its cheapness and intoxicating power.

The true remedy for all the trouble is thus tersely pointed: "Give the people better homes!" we cry. This is true. It is right. But at the same time take from them this deadly curse, and provide them with the living water of the Gospel. It is the only one. It is the only medium of salvation for man.

A VISIT TO A THIEVES' DEN.

To illustrate the missionary's difficulties in visiting haunts such as we have described, and worse, Lady Hope relates the following incident: "As he was walking down a court one day a woman stopped him, saying: 'Could you sign a paper for my man to get his money? He's a sojer, and he's got the roomatics very badly, so he can't go to get it done hisself.' The woman seemed in a great hurry, earnestly begging that her request might be attended to instantly. The visitor's only course seemed to be a walk in the direction that was indicated. He therefore followed his guide through the intricacies of courts and doorways. At length he found himself in a long dark passage underground. Escape was now impossible, as he possessed no clue to his entrance. On and on they went, till finally a door opened, and he found himself in a long, low room, where a fire was burning in the grate. By its light he could perceive a man sitting by the table.

"'This is the man,' said his guide; 'he wants his paper signed, he do.' Just as a few precautionary questions were being asked, the wall itself appeared to open. There was no visible door, and from the opening there advanced a man, horribly ferocious looking, with a heavy bludgeon uplifted. The next instant he rushed upon the stranger, evidently intending to strike him down. (See frontispiece picture No. 3.)

"The woman, who seemed quite at home in this desperate abode, also rushed forward, and seized the uplifted hand, parrying the blow. 'Don't touch him!' she screamed. 'It is the missionary!' We may imagine that the servant of Christ was not sorry to escape when his work was done, by her aid returning through the labyrinths he had traversed. When once more he breathed the fresh air, his courage returned, and he made one or two inquiries about the strange haunts he had discovered. It proved to be a thieves' den, and the man who had emerged from the wall so suddenly was only mistaking his guest for a detective in plain clothes! Had it not been for the woman's speedy intervention, there is not the slightest doubt that a life would have been sacrificed that night and a silent murder committed."

There came a day in the missionary's calendar when he thought he would carry his portable harmonium into one of the very worst haunts, named Gold Court, at a little distance from his house. It was to some degree untrodden ground. Though he had visited the houses in it, and was more or less acquainted with many of its families, he had not yet attempted anything like open-air preaching in it. The demons of drink and immorality revelled unchecked here; with them, of course, there dwelt the companion spirits of disloyalty and insubordination.

But one Sunday afternoon the harmonium was placed in the centre of the court. A hymn was started. A few chords had been played, when out from a door near there came an Irishman, of noticeable stature, storming with rage—a veritable ruffian! In a loud voice, and with an unquestionably threatening attitude, he asked: "What be you going to do with that there thing?" "I am going to cheer you up a bit, that's all," said the visitor.

"I AM GOING TO SING TO YOU."

"None of your noise!" answered the Irishman. "None of your noise, or I'll smash the thing all to bits." "The thing" meant the unfortunate harmonium. Just as the missionary was replying to his adversary in some mollifying strain, another man rushed out of another doorway and began to interpose his questions. "Now then! what are you going to sing?" he said. "Have it out! What is it all about?" "I was going to sing," he replied; "but I cannot do it now, for this man says he will smash my instrument if I play or sing." "What!" the new-comer demanded fiercely; "smash your music, when you come round to cheer us up a bit? Never! I'll smash him first!" In an instant his coat was off and he was ready for a fight. "You go ahead!" he shouted to the missionary; "and I'll dare him to touch you. I'll see that you are not meddled with." So the missionary played, and sang, and spoke for about half an hour, his friend standing by him with turned-up shirt sleeves, closed fists, and folded arms, ready to protect him from any shadow of interference that might arise. (See frontispiece picture No. 4.)

"You see," Mr. Felix, the missionary, explained at the close of his discourse, which he had thus been permitted to carry on unmolested to its close—"you see, our friend here who wanted me to 'move on,' did not know me. He was a stranger. But you all know me, and you know why I come." "We do know you!" answered the man in the shirt sleeves; "and we know why you come. And we ask you to come again. And nobody shall ever touch you when you come here. No, never! You are ALWAYS WELCOME."

Beside a bright fire, his wife in front of him, his babe upon his knee, sat Mr. Felix, as Lady Hope describes him, on one winter's evening. A timid knock at the door recalled his thoughts and brought him once more to his work. A woman, ill-clad and desperate-looking, stood at his door. "Sir, may I speak to you?" she said. "Don't people sign the pledge here?" He replied in the affirmative, showing her his pledge-book, and at the same time offering her a seat.

A FALLEN MUSIC TEACHER.

She had hardly taken her place beside the table, when she began her story. It was a very sad one. She had sold everything she possessed for spirits. In two days she had spent nearly ten dollars. Now she had just left the gin palace in disgust because, finding she had no money left, the landlord had threatened to take out her earrings, in payment for his liquor. This had vexed her, and she had replied indignantly: "I would rather let you draw every tooth in my head than part with my earrings!" and so saying had passed through the heavy swing door, out into the chill, damp night, and had found her way to the missionary's parlor, where she was now resolving never to "touch the drink again."

"Oh, sir!" she said, "it is the company that drags one down. The society here is so evil. I have a home and five children and a good husband. But—but—I have been a bad wife to him. There, now, I have told you the truth." "Will you kneel down with me?" Mr. Felix asked, "and let us pray the Lord to help you to keep this pledge."

"No! I won't!" said the woman. "I won't be a hypocrite. I am too wicked to pray." Mr. Felix was struck by the ladylike manners and faultless diction of his guest, which seemed to stand out in strange contrast to her appearance, as well as the description of her depraved surroundings.

She had risen from her chair in the excitement of her story, and now seemed to be anxious to leave. However, Mr. Felix interposed. "I cannot let you go away like this," he said. "Do sit down again, and see if I cannot help you. There is something the matter, somewhere, I can see that. Now, what is it? Let me be a friend to you. Try and tell me your troubles." "No," she said; "my troubles are too bad to tell anybody."

Seeing the little portable harmonium near her, she exclaimed, "I am passionately fond of music." "Sit down, then, and play, if you like," Mr. Felix said. She immediately put her hands upon the keys, and began to play most exquisitely. Gradually she added a vocal accompaniment, her voice rising and falling with intense pathos in its clear, beautiful notes. "I only wish I could play on my instrument as you do," Mr. Felix remarked, "and sing as well." "Oh," she replied, "I have given many a music lesson. I have played at many a concert, and sang too. I have had a good education. I understand several languages. But nobody cares for me now. I know I am wicked. I know I have done wrong."

By degrees she confessed that she had sunk from her proper station in life. Her brother was a clergyman, her husband was a solicitor. Now she was living in a low street near with a shoemaker, who by her own account was the worst of characters. But she loved him! this she positively declared, saying that nothing would ever induce her to leave him.

A SCENE OF SHOCKING MISERY.

She left her address at parting, and a day or two after the missionary called upon her. There he found two half-naked children upon the floor. They had been brought away by her from her rightful home! and now sat crouched together in all the horrors of starvation. They were cold and hungry, their fingers pressed upon their lips as though they would keep down their cries of hunger. The mother had broken the pledge and was drinking still.

It was all that the visitor could do to forbear from commenting on the horrible scene before him. He did ask, as kindly as his feelings would let him, the name of her brother. "Will you not tell me his name?" he said, "and I will go and find him at once. I know several clergymen. I am sure he would forgive you. I think that he would be glad to find you." "I don't want to see him," she answered harshly; "nor should I like him to know where I am. You must not ask me too many questions."

"Then may I not go to your husband, and tell him where you are? I am sure he would heartily welcome you home again. You must not despair. There is forgiveness for the vilest." She said: "Not for me!

I WAS ONCE A PURE, BRIGHT GIRL,

but I have sunk so low now!"

"Will you come and get some tea at my house to-morrow?" he asked, "and we will have another talk." "No, I won't!" she said decidedly. "If I can find your brother or husband, and they will receive you, will you go home again?" he inquired. "No, sir!" she answered hotly. "They would not let me drink; and I like the liquor. I must have it! I cannot live without it!"

"To be plain with you," Mr. Felix now said, using his last argument, "it just comes to this: you say you love the shoemaker, with whom you are living, better than your own husband, because he lets you drink; and he drinks too, I suppose!" "Yes," she answered, "that's it. You have it now."

"Then I ask you once more, will you give up Bob and the drink, and accept the Saviour, who alone can keep you, and make you a bright, happy woman yet; or will you stick to Bob and the drink, and be lost forever?" She said: "I'll be lost, then, sir!" (See frontispiece picture No. 5.)

A REPULSIVE PARAMOUR.

She was visited several times. The shoemaker was a strange creature to have inspired passion in the breast of an educated woman; he was a disciple of the atheist, Bradlaugh, holding his opinions firmly, and declaring vehemently, in indecent language, the falsity of the Bible, and expressing his hatred of the English laws. He was a terrible-looking man, repulsive to a degree; always ready to argue, and, judging by his words and his appearance, also ready to strike. With all his boastings he confessed that his "conscience" was a "hell to him."

The passages we have quoted from Lady Hope's book sufficiently indicate its character. It is an attempt to make the Christian public acquainted with the ulcer that is eating its way into the social life of the country. That people who love the Lord Jesus and desire to live in the light of His life should know that such a state of things exists and should make no effort to change it, Lady Hope does not believe. She assumes that a personal and united public effort will be made to discharge so fearful a responsibility. The question is, what kind of an effort promises success, and how it shall be initiated.

One method she suggests is the establishment of coffee-rooms, where, with refreshments provided at the lowest rate, there shall be innocent amusements and an abundance of wholesome literature. These, she believes, would compete successfully with the rum-shops, which now are the only places which open their doors to the men and women who, weary of their wretched homes, pine for society and amusement of any kind that will help them to forget their misery. The experiment is being tried with encouraging results, but much yet remains to be done.

The urgent need of considering this problem is not confined to London. In our own cities the evil is not so stupendous, but it is sufficiently serious to demand our attention, and it is developing with appalling rapidity. It menaces the very existence of society. How long such people may endure their misery in patience, who can tell? The time may come when desperate men, seeing on all hands the presence of abundant wealth, will rise and demand their share of it, and attempt to seize it by force. Then there will be a struggle such as was seen on two occasions in Paris, and then the streets of the city ran with blood. For the most part the poor are patient now, but it is easy to understand that men who are hungry, who have not a dollar to buy clothing, who see their wives and children, whom they love, pining and dying before their eyes, and realize that the lives they love might be saved if they had but five dollars to spend in nourishment for them, may come to an end of their patience. They meet men on the streets who possess millions, and who go on hoarding their money—men who waste in one hour money that would, if they had it, save the lives of their loved ones, and yet who hold out no helping hand to their brethren. The sight may some day turn law-abiding men into rioters, plunderers, and murderers.

Our cities exist on the crater of a volcano; it remains to be seen whether there are in them those few wise men of whom Solomon spoke, who, by their wisdom, can save the city. It is a question for patriots and statesmen, but more especially for Christian men, who are taught that every man in need is their neighbor, to whom they are bound, by the most solemn obligations, to render help. The Christian millionaire—and there are in all our cities many of them—may wisely go into the slums and see how the poor live, and then go home, and on his knees ask the question, "Lord, what wilt thou have me do?"

IS LIFE WORTH LIVING?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 11, 1884.

"Wherefore doth a living man complain?"—LAMENTATIONS 3 : 39.

A Question Every One Asks—Solomon's Answer—Due to a Polygamous Life—Jeremiah's Answer—Modern Diversity of Opinion—A Prosperous Young Man's Opinion—A Middle-aged Unfortunate—The Right Answer—A Money-getting Life a Failure—Worldly Approval Disappointing—Social Position Unsatisfactory—Wealth the Passport to Society—A Life that is Worth Living—Taking Stock—A Comprehension of Responsibilities—Life a Brief Preface—A New Hampshire Home—A Devoted Mother's Life—Peter Cooper's Beneficent Years—Heroic Lives—The True Test.

IF we leave to the evolutionists to guess where we came from and to the theologians to prophecy where we are going to, we still have left for consideration the important fact that we are here. There may be some doubt about where the river rises and some doubt about where the river empties, but there can be no doubt about the fact that we are sailing on it. So I am not surprised that everybody asks the question, "Is life worth living?"

Solomon in his unhappy moments says it is not. "Vanity," "vexation of spirit," "no good," are his estimate. The fact is that Solomon was at one time a polygamist, and that soured his disposition. One wife makes a man happy; more than one makes him wretched. But Solomon was converted from polygamy to monogamy, and the last words he ever wrote, as far as we can read them, were the words "mountains of spices." But Jeremiah says in my text

LIFE IS WORTH LIVING.

In a book supposed to be doleful, and lugubrious, and sepulchral, and entitled "Lamentations," he plainly intimates that the blessing of merely living is so great and grand a blessing that though a man have piled on him all misfortunes and disasters he has no right to complain. The author of my text cries out in startling intonation to all lands and to all centuries, "Wherefore doth a living man complain?"

A DIVERSITY OF OPINION

in our time as well as in olden time. Here is a young man of light hair, and blue eyes, and sound digestion, and generous salary, and happily affianced, and on the way to become a partner in a commercial firm of which he is an important clerk. Ask him whether life is worth living. He will laugh in your face and say, "Yes, yes, yes!" Here is a man who has come to the forties. He is at the tip-top of the hill of life. Every step has been a stumble and a bruise. The people he trusted have turned out deserters, and the money he has honestly made he has been cheated out of. His nerves are out of tune. He has poor appetite, and all the food he does eat does not assimilate. Forty miles climbing up the hill of life have been to him like climbing the Matterhorn, and there are forty miles yet to go down, and descent is always more dangerous than ascent. Ask him whether life is worth living, and he will drawl out in shivering and lugubrious and appalling negative, "No, no, no!"

HOW ARE WE TO DECIDE

this matter righteously and intelligently? You will find the same man vacillating, oscillating in his opinion from dejection to exuberance, and if he be very mercurial in his temperament it will depend very much upon which way the wind blows. If the wind blow from the northwest and you ask him, he will say, "Yes;" and if it blow from the north-east and you ask him, he will say, "No." How are we then to get the question righteously answered? Suppose we call all nations together in a great convention on Eastern or Western hemisphere, and let all those who are in the affirmative say "Aye" and all those who are in the negative say "No." While there would be hundreds of thousands who would answer in the affirmative, there would be more millions who would answer in the negative, and because of the greater number who have sorrow and misfortune and trouble the "Noes" would have it. The answer I shall give will be different from either, and yet it will commend itself to all who hear me this day as

THE RIGHT ANSWER.

If you ask me "Is life worth living?" I answer, it all depends upon the kind of life you live.

In the first place, I remark, that a life of mere money getting is always a failure, because you will never get as much as you want. The poorest people in this country are the millionaires, and next to them those who have half a million. There is not a scissors-grinder on the streets of New York or Brooklyn that is so anxious to make money as these men who have piled up fortunes year after year in storehouses, in government securities, in tenement houses, in whole city blocks. You ought to see them jump when they hear the fire-bell ring. You ought to see them in their excitement when Marine Bank explodes. You ought to see their agitation when there is proposed a reformation in the tariff. Their nerves tremble like harp-strings, but no music in the vibration. They read the reports from Wall Street in the morning with a concernment that threatens paralysis or apoplexy, or, more probably, they have a telegraph or a telephone in their own house, so they catch every breath of change in the money-market. The disease of accumulation has eaten into them—eaten into their heart, into their lungs, into their spleen, into their liver, into their bones.

Chemists have sometimes analyzed the human body, and they say it is so much magnesia, so much lime, so much chlorate of potassium. If some Christian chemist would analyze one of these financial behemoths he would find he is made up of copper, and gold, and silver, and zinc, and lead, and coal, and iron. That is not a life worth living. There are too many earthquakes in it, too many agonies in it, too many perditions in it. They build their castles, and they open their picture galleries, and they summon prima donnas, and they offer every inducement for Happiness to come and live there, but

HAPPINESS WILL NOT COME.

They send footmaned and postillioned equipage to bring her; she will not ride to their door. They send princely escort; she will not take their arm. They make their gateways triumphal arches; she will not ride under them. They set a golden throne before a golden plate; she turns away from the banquet. They call to her from upholstered balcony; she will not listen. Mark you, this is the failure of those who have had large accumulation.

And then you must take into consideration that the vast majority of those who make the dominant idea of life money-getting fall far short of affluence. It is estimated that only about two out of a hundred business men have anything worthy the name of success. A man who spends his life with the one dominant idea of financial accumulation spends a life not worth living.

So the idea of WORLDLY APPROVAL.

If that be dominant in a man's life he is miserable. The two most unfortunate men in this country for the next six months will be the two men nominated for the Presidency. The reservoirs of abuse, and diatribe, and malediction are gradually filling up now, gallon above gallon, hogshead above hogshead, and about midsummer these two reservoirs will be brimming full, and a hose will be attached to each one, and it will play away on these nominees, and they will have to stand it, and take the abuse, and the falsehood, and the caricature, and the anathema, and the caterwauling, and the filth, and they will be rolled in it and rolled over and over in it until they are choked, and submerged, and strangulated, and at every sign of returning consciousness they will be barked at by all the hounds of political parties from ocean to ocean. And yet, there are a hundred men to-day struggling for that privilege, and there are thousands of men who are helping them in the struggle. Now, that is not a life worth living. You can get slandered and abused cheaper than that!

Take it on a smaller scale. Do not be so ambitious to have a whole reservoir rolled over on you. But what you see in the matter of high political preferment you see in every community in the struggle for what is called

SOCIAL POSITION.

Tens of thousands of people trying to get into that realm, and they are under terrific tension. What is social position? It is a difficult thing to define, but we all know what it is. Good morals and intelligence are not necessary, but wealth, or the show of wealth, is absolutely indispensable. There are men to-day as notorious for their libertinism as the night is famous for its darkness who move in what is called high social position. There are hundreds of out-and-out rakes in American society whose names are mentioned among the distinguished guests at the great levees. They have annexed all the known vices, and are longing for other worlds of diabolism to conquer. Good morals are not necessary in many of the exalted circles of society.

Neither is intelligence necessary. You find in that realm men who would not know an adverb from an adjective if they met it a hundred times a day, and who could not write a letter of acceptance or regrets without the aid of a secretary. They buy their libraries by the square yard, only anxious to have the binding Russia. Their ignorance is positively sublime. Making English grammar almost disreputable. And yet the finest parlors open before them. Good morals and intelligence are not necessary, but wealth, or a show of wealth, is positively indispensable. It does not make any difference how you got your wealth, if you only got it. Perhaps you got it by failing four or five times. It is the most rapid way of accumulation in this country—that is, the quickest way to get in social position. Those who fail only once are not very well off, but by the time a man has failed the second time he is comfortable, and by the time he has failed the third time he is affluent. The best way for you to get into social position is for you to buy a large amount on credit, then put your property in your wife's name, have a few preferred creditors, and then make an assignment. Then disappear from the community until the breeze is over, and then come back and start in the same business. Do you not see how beautifully that will put out all the people who are in competition with you and trying to make an honest living? How quick it will get you into high social position? What is the use of toiling with forty of fifty years of hard work when you can by two or three bright strokes make a great fortune. Ah! my friends, when you really lose your money how quick they will let you drop, and the higher you get the harder you will drop.

There are thousands to-day in that realm who are anxious to keep in it. There are thousands in that realm who are nervous for fear they will fall out of it, and there are changes going on every year, and every month, and every hour which involve heartbreaks that are never reported. High social life is constantly in a flutter about the delicate question as to whom they shall let in and whom they shall push out, and the battle is going on—pier mirror against pier mirror, chandelier against chandelier, wine cellar against wine cellar, wardrobe against wardrobe, equipage against equipage. Uncertainty and insecurity dominant in that realm, wretchedness enthroned, torture at a premium, and a life not worth living.

A life of sin, a life of pride, a life of indulgence, a life of worldliness, a life devoted to the world, the flesh, and the devil is a failure, a dead failure, an infinite failure. I care not how many presents you send to that cradle, or how many garlands you send to that grave, you need to put right under the name on the tombstone this inscription : " Better for that man if he had never been born."

But I shall show you

A LIFE THAT IS WORTH LIVING.

A young man says : " I am here. I am not responsible for my ancestry ; others decided that. I am not responsible for my temperament ; God gave me that. But here I am, in the afternoon of the nineteenth century, at twenty years of age. I am here, and I must take an account of stock. Here I have a body which is a divinely constructed engine. I must put it to the very best uses, and I must allow nothing to damage this rarest of machinery. Two feet, and they mean locomotion. Two eyes, and they mean capacity to pick out my own way. Two ears, and they are telephones of communication with all the outside world, and they mean capacity to catch sweetest music and the voices of friendship—the very best music. A tongue, with almost infinity of articulation. Yes, hands with which to welcome, or resist, or lift, or smite, or wave, or bless—hands to help myself and help others.

Here is a world which after six thousand years of battling with tempest and accident is still grander than any architect, human or angelic, could have drafted. I have two lamps to light me—a golden lamp and a silver lamp—a golden lamp set on the sapphire mantel of the day, a silver lamp set on the jet mantel of the night. Yea, I have that at twenty years of age which defies all inventory of valuables—a soul, with capacity to choose or reject, to rejoice or to suffer, to love or to hate. Plato says it is immortal. Seneca says it is immortal. Confucius says it is immortal. An old book among the family relics—a book with leathern cover almost worn out, and pages almost obliterated by oft perusal, joins to the other books in saying I am immortal. I have eighty years for a lifetime, sixty years yet to live. I may not live an hour, but then I must lay out my plans intelligently and for a long life. Sixty years added to the twenty I have already lived, that will bring me to eighty. I must remember that these eighty years are only to the five hundred thousand millions of quintillions of years which will be my chief residence and existence. Now, I understand my opportunities and my responsibilities.

If there is any being in the universe all wise and all beneficent who can help a man in such a juncture, I want him. The old book found among the family relics tells me there is a God, and that for the sake of His Son, one Jesus, He will give help to a man. To Him I appeal. God help me! Here, I have sixty years yet to do for myself and to do for others. I must develop this body by all industries, by all gymnastics, by all sunshine, by all fresh air, by all good habits. And this soul I must have swept, and garnished, and illumined, and glorified by all that I can do for it and all that I can get God to do for it. It shall be a Luxembourg of fine pictures. It shall be an orchestra of grand harmonies. It shall be a palace for God and righteousness to reign in. I wonder how many kind words I can utter in the next sixty years? I will try. I wonder how many good deeds I can do in the next sixty years? I will try. God help me!"

That young man enters life. He is buffeted, he is tried, he is perplexed. A grave opens on this side and a grave opens on that side. He falls, but he rises again. He gets into a hard battle, but he gets the victory. The main course of his life is in the right direction. He blesses everybody he comes in contact with. God forgives his mistakes, and makes everlasting record of his holy endeavors, and at the close of it God says to him : " Well done, good and faithful servant ; enter into the joys of thy Lord." My brother, my sister, I do not care whether that man dies at thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, seventy, or eighty years of age ; you can chisel right under his name on the tombstone these words, " His life was worth living."

A NEW HAMPSHIRE HOME.

Amid the hills of New Hampshire, in olden times, there sits a mother. There are six children in the household—four boys and two girls. Small farm. Very rough, hard work to coax a living out of it. Mighty tug to make the two ends of the year meet. The boys go to school in winter and work the farm in summer. Mother is the chief presiding spirit. With her hands she knits all the stockings for the little feet, and she is the mantuamaker for the boys, and she is the milliner for the girls. There is only one musical instrument in the house—the spinning-wheel. The food is very plain, but it is always well provided. The winters are very cold, but are kept out by the blankets she quilted. On Sunday, when she appears in the village church, her children around her, the minister looks down, and is reminded of the Bible description of a good housewife—" Her children arise up, and call her blessed ; her husband also, and he praiseth her."

Some years go by, and the two oldest boys want a collegiate education, and the household economies are severer, and the calculations are closer, and until those two boys get their education there is a hard battle for bread. One of these boys enters the university, stands in a pulpit widely influential, and preaches righteousness, judgment, and temperance, and thousands during his ministry are blessed. The other lad who got the collegiate education goes into the law, and thence into legislative halls, and after a while he commands listening Senates as he make a plea for the downtrodden and the outcast. One of the younger boys becomes a merchant, starting at the foot of the ladder, but climbing on up until his success and his philanthropies are recognized all over the land. The other son stays at home because he prefers farming life, and then he thinks he will be able to take care of father and mother when they get old.

Of the two daughters : when the war broke out one went through the hospitals of Pittsburg Landing and Fortress Munroe, cheering up the dying and the homesick, and taking the last message to kindred far away. So that every time Christ thought of her He said, as of old, " The same is my sister and mother." The other daughter has a bright home of her own, and in the afternoon of the forenoon when she has been devoted to her household, she goes forth to hunt up the sick and to encourage the discouraged, leaving smiles and benediction all along the way.

But one day there start

from the village for these five absent ones, saying : " Come, mother is dangerously ill." But before they can be ready to start, they receive another telegram, saying : " Come, mother is dead." The old neighbors gather in the old farmhouse to do the last offices of respect. But as that farming son, and the clergyman, and the senator, and the merchant, and the two daughters stand by the casket of the dead mother taking the last look, or lifting their little children to see once more the face of dear old grandma, I want to ask that group around the casket one question : "Do you really think her life was worth living?" A life for God, a life for others, a life of unselfishness, a useful life, a Christian life is always worth living.

I would not find it hard to persuade you that the poor lad, Peter Cooper, making glue for a living, and then amassing a great fortune until he could build a philanthropy which has had its echo in ten thousand philanthropies all over the country—I would not find it hard to persuade you that his life was worth living. Neither would I find it hard to persuade you that the life of Susannah Wesley was worth living. She sent out one son to organize Methodism and the other son to ring his anthems all through the ages. I would not find it hard work to persuade you that the life of Frances Leere was worth living, as she established in England a school for the scientific nursing of the sick, and then when the war broke out between France and Germany went to the front, and with her own hands scraped the mud off the bodies of the soldiers dying in the trenches, and with her weak arm—standing one night in the hospital—pushing back a German soldier to his couch, as, all frenzied with his wounds, he rushed toward the door, and said : " Let me go, let me go to my liebe mutter." Major-generals standing back to let pass this angel of mercy.

Neither would I have hard work to persuade you that Grace Darling lived a life worth living—the heroine of the lifeboat. You are not wondering that the Duchess of Northumberland came to see her, and that people of all lands asked for her lighthouse, and that the proprietor of the Adelphi Theatre in London offered her a hundred dollars a night just to sit in the lifeboat while some shipwreck scene was being enacted.

THE TRUE TEST.

But I know the thought in the minds of hundreds here to-day. You say : " While I know all these lived lives worth living, I don't think my life amounts to much." Ah! my friends, whether you live a life conspicuous or inconspicuous, it is worth living, if you live aright. And I want my next sentence to go down into the depths of all your souls. You are to be rewarded, not according to the greatness of your work, but according to the holy industries with which you employed the talents you really possessed. The majority of the crowns of heaven will not be given to people with ten talents, for most of them were tempted only to serve themselves. The vast majority of the crowns of heaven will be given to people who had one talent, but gave it all to God. And remember that our life here is introductory to another. It is but who despises the door of a Madeleine because there are grander glories within? Your life if rightly lived is the first bar of an eternal oratorio, and who despises the first note of Haydn's symphonies? And the life you live now is all the worth more living because it opens into a life that shall never end, and the last letter of the word " time" is the first letter of the word " eternity!"

The Singular Escape of a Dog from Death is mentioned in a despatch from Highland, Col., which describes a catastrophe in which five miners lost their lives. The miners lived about six miles from Highland, in a cabin which was buried under an enormous snow slide. The snow was twenty feet deep, and nearly a week elapsed before the men's bodies could be dug out as the snow was frozen and it was necessary to use axes and cut it away in solid blocks. One of the men was found with his pipe in his mouth and his pocket-knife clasped in his hand, and the others in positions showing conclusively that they were all instantly killed. One of the miners had a dog that he prized very highly, that always made his quarters under the bunk where the men slept, and of course everybody supposed the dog was killed. On April 14th a further search of the cabin was made in order to find a trunk containing valuable papers, which was known to be in the cabin, as the men were tunnelling to get at the floor of the cabin they heard the dog whine, and finally dug him out from under the bunk alive and well, but thin after his thirty-two days' imprisonment with nothing to eat but snow. The slide struck the cabin on the side where the bunk was, but left three rounds of logs standing, which protected the bunk and saved it from being crushed by the mass of snow, leaving a space of thirty feet for the dog. It was strange that of all in the cabin the dog should have been the only one to escape. But he did not save himself ; he simply lay still in his refuge and was unhurt. It is so in spiritual concerns ; the wise and prudent will not be saved but the simple and the despised who are in the Refuge provided, will be delivered (Ps. 57 ; 1).

A JOURNEY THROUGH FRANCE, ITALY, EGYPT, AND GREECE.

By Charles Cook.*

Gambling at Monte Carlo—Among the Prisoners at Rome—Brindisi, Cairo, and along the Nile—The American Mission in Egypt—Visit to the Soudan and Greece.

RUNNING through the length and breadth of France, and only stopping at Paris and Cannes,

TO VISIT THE PRISONS

there, we reached Monte Carlo, where we did some little work in distributing portions of the Word of God among the gamblers. The receipts from the gambling tables there amount to 16,000,000 francs, their expenses are 9,000,000 francs, they pay the Prince of Monaco, a tax of 2,000,000 francs, and net as profit, the remaining 5,000,000 francs. [A franc is worth about twenty cents.] The awful number of suicides demands that the place be speedily stopped.

Reaching Rome, we began our visitation of the Italian prisons, by first seeing the Castle of St. Angelo, on the banks of the Tiber. It was built by the Emperor Adrian, and is now used as a fortress and a military prison. Then driving out along the road along which Paul traversed on his way to execution, we came to the place where he was beheaded, and adjoining the three churches which are built in his memory, is a large convict establishment; and still farther on the Campagna is a second to which we also went. We then visited the prisons in the city, and in each one of these places we were allowed uninterruptedly to distribute the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, etc. There is a good deal more liberty in Italy than when I was last here, some years ago; the governors and officers of these places being as pleased to accept Gospels as the convicts themselves.

Eighteen hours' journey brought us to Brindisi, and on the Sunday afternoon we went to the old Castle, picturesquely situated on a high rock overlooking the harbor and the sea, and which has been turned into a convict prison. Here, in sorrow and in chains, are hundreds of our fellow-men, and, sad to say, hard at work on the Sunday. In the hospital were a number of men, very ill, and to these we gave our welcome books; and then on, through this huge, grim old prison, we wended our way, distributing as we went the bread of life. Sailing from here, after three days we reached Alexandria; thence to Cairo, and amid the streets of this strange and populous city we were soon wending our way. On the Sunday, we were permitted to hold services among the soldiers at the Citadel, and were pleased to help and take part in the work of the American mission. The Director-General of took me over the one in Cairo, and gave me permission to visit all the prisons in Egypt, telling me they were in a dreadful condition. He has cleansed four of them, and is doing all he can to remedy the others. I have been right through Egypt from end to end.

THE SOUDAN.

The prisons here, certainly, are very bad. No work to do, and in chains, the poor prisoners live their dreary life. There are over 1400 untried prisoners; many have been waiting trial over two years, some four, and even six years. No bed or bedding was given them. Dr. Cruickshank told me he believed that many of these men were falsely accused. Thank God, the doctor has done wonders; he has set the men to work in some places, made them clean the prisons, and given them a mat to lie on and a blanket to cover them.

At Assiout, a man condemned to death, presented a petition to me seeking my help and interference. I listened to the man's story, and according to the Governor's account, he seemed to have been hardly dealt with. He was a fine bright intelligent-looking man. His own sisters had been murdered by the man he was charged with killing, therefore if guilty, he had received great provocation.

I STAYED THE EXECUTION, and told him I would appeal to and petition the Khedive for him; the gratitude of the man could hardly be expressed; kissing our hands and heaping blessing on our heads in the name of Allah, he followed us to the door of the jail. On reaching Cairo, I at once went to the police, and was asked to write out the case. I appealed to His Highness for the life of the poor man and asked him to interfere in the cases of these poor untried prisoners.

As proof of the unsettled state of the country, the whole length of Nile Valley, I give the following incident. Our boat used to anchor each evening off one of the many towns on the river. At Soag, as we came down, we saw that the houses of all the people who were not Mussulmen, were marked in chalk with these words while on the houses of the Mohammedans was written "A blessing in the name of God." This was after the news of Braham's first victory, what would have been the result had the victory been on the other side we can hardly tell, but we know that the people, on both sides of the river, are in a state of ferment. I believe it is not so much that they want or expect the Mahdi, as it is they are tired of the continued oppression and bad government they have so long been under. Nearly all the officials are Turks, and they grind the noses of the poor fellaheen to extract the last farthing. Everybody here knows that an English Protectorate is the only hope for Egypt. As I left Egypt directly after writing to the Khedive, there has not been time for me to get an answer, but am thankful to say by the telegrams seen that the prisoners are being released at the rate of 120 per day. We thank God and take courage. I ought to add, that we gave Arabic portions of the Scriptures to those prisoners who could read, and scattered hundreds of copies among the Arabs during our long journey through the country.

"DESTRUCTION TO THE CHRISTIANS,"

Bidding good-by to the many friends in Cairo to whom I was known through our meetings, and the pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we sailed from Alexandria for

THE SHORES OF GREECE.

And now began our first real trouble. We had been annoyed by the flies of Egypt, bitten by the mosquitoes, disgusted at the dirt and filth, and greatly annoyed by the howling of the many dogs in this wonderfully interesting country, but all this was atoned for by the interest felt as we journeyed through this land, once so important and so great, but now existing only in ruins to prove the truth of the prophecy, "I will destroy the cities."

But these were trifles. On the first day out of Alexandria, my friend, Mr. Cole, who had accompanied us from Rome, was stricken with opthalmia in both eyes, and in addition suffered much from sea-sickness, a malady which also prostrated my other companion, Mr. Clark, leaving him for a time unconscious. Fortunately, I was pretty well, but the next morning my eyes gave me some anxiety, and for a week I suffered, but only in a very small degree in comparison with Mr. Cole. My eyes were bad, I believe, from the foul atmosphere of the prisons, while Mr. Cole's was caused by a fly bringing disease from another person. On reaching Athens, we put him under a skilful oculist, and though obliged to leave him there when we sailed for Italy, we think he was much better.

We have seen also

and in some respects they are worse than Egypt. In a room ten feet square ten men were sleeping, in another, twelve feet square, there were twelve, one of whom was very ill. No work, no books, and almost lying in filth. Thankfully, they received our books, and we gave them twelve francs between them, that they might all enjoy a good cup of coffee. The day after we arrived, three men escaped, one who was condemned to death, and two others. I wrote to the Prime Minister, suggesting to him that the prisoners should cleanse the prisons, and that they should have more air and room. Mr. Clark and I reached Italy safely, and in southern Italy inspected the prisons and gave the Word of God. I hope soon to return for a short visit to the prisons in the north of Italy. In no country visited have we been hindered in our work of Bible distribution, and have been successful in effecting much needed reform. Will the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD thank God on our behalf?

* A portrait of Mr. Charles Cook and a sketch of his life and work appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of Sept. 15th, 1881, when he was visiting this country.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Wood-Chopping City Missionary.—At a recent meeting Mr. Deware, a venerable city missionary, said: "I found it somewhat difficult to get a woman to attend a meeting where Christ was preached, or even to get inside her house to talk about Christ. One day I called when she was trying to cleave a bit of wood. She was going about it, as women usually do such things, in a rather clumsy way. I asked her to give me the hatchet and the wood, and let me break it for her. With some reluctance she gave them to me. Owing to some experience gained in my younger days, it was not long before I handed the wood, duly broken, and the axe back to her. From that day her door was always open to me, and she is favorably disposed now toward the Saviour."

A Maniac at a Window.—"A Minister informs us that when he was a young lad he was one day passing an asylum for the insane. Prompted by boyish curiosity, he paused, and gazed for some time at the dreary-looking building. As he stood there a wild, emaciated woman came to the iron railings, and pointing her finger at him, cried out, 'Young man! live for eternity. Young man! live for eternity.' Awed by the appearance and words of the woman, he turned away, and tried to blot out the memory of both from his mind, but they came before him again and again with such appalling vividness that at last he decided to give himself to Christ, and live for eternity. He at once set to work to lead others to make the same wise and safe resolution. His earnest endeavors were much blessed by the Lord, and he has had no cause to regret the day he listened to the words of a maniac."

A Sailor's Memories in Prison.—An Experienced Christian worker said: "Last week I was stopped in the street by an unknown sailor, who told me that twenty years ago he was a Sabbath-school scholar of mine, but that he had since led an extremely bad life till two years ago, when in prison for an offence against the laws, the old lessons learned in the Sabbath-school came back to his mind, and when the period of his sentence had expired, he went to a children's meeting, where he heard them singing the same hymns which he had sung when a child. They were the means of breaking his heart, and opened the fountain of tears which had been closed for many, many years. Just as he was, he gave himself unreservedly to the Saviour. Sabbath-school teachers! take heart; be not discouraged; 'ye shall reap if ye faint not.' This is a case in which the seed was sown twenty years ago, now bearing fruit after lying apparently dead nearly all that time."

Burned to Death through Deceit.—Dr. Cameron said: "I was called into a case the other day which shows how deceit or disobedience always brings punishment. 'As a man sows so shall he also reap,' is one of God's fixed and unalterable laws. A young woman wished to finish reading some light story, but her parents put the gas out, and forbade her to read any more that night. She pretended to retire to bed, but when the house was still she got up and sat down close to the kitchen fire to read. Worn out by the toils of the day, she speedily fell fast asleep, and, falling against the glowing fire, her dress was in a blaze instantly. Her scream of fright and pain awoke the house, and her father severely scorched his hands in a vain attempt to quench the flames. 'Father, save me! do save me!' the poor victim of sin cried; but, alas! no power on earth could do that. Her sin brought its own punishment; she burned to death. Every one who deliberately plans deceit imagines that it will never be found out, but it will as sure as God says it" (Ps. 101 : 7 ; 55 : 23).

A Reformed Laboring Man Testified at a recent Gospel Temperance meeting. He said: "I came home one Monday night very drunk; my two wee girls had come to this hall to see the magic lantern, but not having tickets they were refused admittance. They returned home crying, very sore with disappointment, and begged me to come with them, and they would get in; but I was not in a condition to accompany them. I could not get over their tears all next day, so that I came home sober that night, and the wee ones got me to take them to see the lantern. When the exhibition was over, a young man asked me to take the pledge, and I said I would. When he went for my ticket I bent my head on my hands, and asked the Lord Jesus to keep me, as I kent fine that I could not keep myself. The Lord heard my prayer and has kept me till now, and will keep me to the end. 'None but Jesus can do helpless sinners good.'"

Donald's Dying Discovery.—Mr. Clyde Said: "I was called upon to visit one Sunday evening recently a man who was apparently dying. He was so anxious about his soul that he sent a messenger to two meetings, so that he might be sure that a Christian worker would come to speak to him about Christ. I had a long conversation with him, pointing out the fact that Christ had finished the work of salvation, and that he, as a sinner, had nothing to do, confirming my assertions by appeals to Scripture. The truth came upon him like a shock, for he gave one leap in the bed, and cried out, 'It is finished! I see it! Oh, what a relief it is for me! Christ has done the work!' His aged mother was sitting beside him. Turning to her, he said, 'Mother, don't you see it? Christ has done it all; we have both been making the same mistake all along, trying to do something to save ourselves.' She answered, 'I can't say much, but I can say, "Christ for me!"' Last night I was told that Donald was dead. He was praising God for His great mercy and love when he passed away."

An Apostolic Kaffir.—Mr. McMicking Related: "Sixteen years ago a man left the far north of the Transvaal and went to Pietermaritzburg, to fight the battle of life. The late Mr. Alison, a gentleman living in that city, taught the poor Kaffir the principles of the Gospel. It made another man of him; his heart was fired with love to Jesus, and the Holy Spirit urged him to go back to his tribe and preach the Gospel. He walked back—seven hundred miles—and told the chief what he meant to do. The chief's answer was, 'Oh! you are come here to tell about the great chief, Jesus, to whom all the tribes are to submit? If you do so, you must leave the tribe, or I will put you to death. I am the only chief here.' Not at all disheartened, the Kaffir, instead of preaching publicly, told the old story of salvation from hut to hut till in a year or two the chief died and was succeeded by his wife, who proclaimed religious toleration. Then the work spread rapidly, so the heathen got alarmed and burned down the chapel and ordered the native Christians out of their huts, which they also burned, and then, beating the Christians with sticks, drove them out of the tribe. But instead of stopping the work, this only caused it to spread among the other tribes to which the confessors were driven. Mr. Owens, a missionary in Africa, said: 'This little Kaffir (he is only five feet three inches in height) has the courage of Paul, the love of John, and for the last nine years has done a grand work unrecognized, unknown, and unpaid, working with his hands for his daily bread; yet he has done greater good than any other of our missionaries in the African field.' It is men like this full of devotion to Christ whom God will use to convert multitudes of men to Himself."

Bill the Blacksmith's Pig.—Mr. Lee Narrated the following story: "In a Yorkshire village there lived a big, brawny, bearded blacksmith, called Bill. Naturally a strong man, his trade made him still stronger, so that with the help of his two assistants he earned a lot of money, but his wife got the miserable pittance of six or seven shillings to keep house with. A dirty miserable hovel was his home, and his two children, Nellie and Johnny, were as ragged and thin-faced bairns as you would see in a day's walk. One day Bill and his two assistants had finished some work at a farm-house, for which he got paid at once. On their way home they all entered a 'saloon,' and spent three hours and twelve shillings in drink; then they went on their way, and landed in another rum hole, where among the company Bill spent all the money he had gained. On his way out a butcher entered with a newly killed and dressed pig, which was slipping from the man's shoulder. Bill put up his hand to catch it, when the landlady called out, 'Keep your dirty paws off my pig, and get a pig of your own, you brute!' 'Oh,' thought Bill, 'get a pig of my own; I will do that.' The day passed on, and to his wife's pleased surprise he spent his evening at his own home. On the Saturday night he handed his wife ten dollars. Next day he went to church, and shortly afterward Bill gave his heart to Jesus, and began to work for Him. Once the landlord tried to get him into his house, but Bill replied, 'No, no, landlord, I can put my dirty paws on my own pig now; ay, and I have a house to keep it in, and one to put myself and family in.' Bill is now a loving, earnest Christian man, and much blessed in his efforts for the welfare of others."

THE PREDICTED RESTITUTION OF ALL THINGS.

DOUBTLESS, time will be needed, after the Lord comes to introduce the Millennial reign, before His glory is completed. God's word declares so. Peter speaks, not merely of the Restitution, but of the "times" of the Restitution—a vast period. And the Apostle Paul testifies "He must reign till He has put all enemies under His feet," and that "the last enemy which shall be destroyed is Death" (1 Cor. 15 : 25, 26).

It would seem from this that during the Millennial reign which is, indeed, a far brighter and more blessed era, and immeasurably more glorious than the present; and as Isaiah declares, the longevity of God's elect shall be "as the days of a tree" (Isa. 65 : 22), yet Satan is not completely overthrown until its close, and while other enemies are not destroyed Death must still continue. For, as Paul declares, Death is the last enemy to be destroyed. At the close comes Satan's final effort, his overthrow, the general judgment, the banishment of the wicked dead to hell, and last of all, Death and Hades are destroyed. And then the kingdom is seen in its final form of perennial blessedness—the Regeneration is completed.

Thus the Seed of the woman will have entirely destroyed all the works of the devil, and the curse, uttered in Eden, is wiped away. At the fall, there hung in hideous darkness over man, alienation from God, a cursed earth, pains and labors and tears, death, the grave, and Hades. Now at last all are gone—even the last enemy, Death, gone forever—and so the triumphant voice of gladness from heaven at last announces its arrival (Rev. 21 : 1–5).

What a contrast between the earth at its best estate now and the redeemed earth then! It is true, indeed, that even now, while the curse still hangs as a blight upon us, God's mercy does soften the curse. Like a bright star hung on the horizon, when clouds cover the sky, still giving token of the glories of the concealed heaven, so God's mercy-drops sweeten the bitter cup even of the present. But what will it be when the light fills all the heavens! Think of the households, for example, of the earth redeemed. Ye mothers of the present world, tried and anxious, think of them. There will be then no fear for that lovely circle around the mother's knee, for the inhabitants of that world shall never say, "I am sick;" no fear of evil passions springing up within those young hearts, for all temptation and sin will be gone; no doubt of their future character, for "all their children shall be taught of God;" no days of watching or nights of anxiety and weakness. All the earth filled with homes of holiness and peace! Oh, glorious day, begin!

Think of the intercourse of the nations in that day. Even now, indeed, we have Christian civilization, and this has meliorated the condition and the intercourse of the world. We go to a foreign shore, and we are sure of restraining laws and of mercy for strangers. We are sure of a guard for our persons and the means of health, and yet how every street and every abode, high and low, tells of sore needs, and of poverty, and crime, and sorrow, and sin. But what a brotherhood will the holy nations of that day present! The wanderer from his own home will only exchange one home and welcome for another. From North to South, from East to West, all nations sing the same song of redeeming love. All bow in fealty to the same glorious King; all show the same fruits of the Spirit. Every appointment of government shall be in conformity with the righteous rule, to do honor to the King of all the earth and to bless all under its sway. For, "A King shall reign in righteousness and princes shall rule in judgment; and a Man shall be as a hiding-place from the wind, and a covert from the tempest; as rivers of water in a dry place, as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land."

What God will do with this earth, regenerated, and with its saved race, we know not. One thing we know: He who will sit as King over all in human nature, our Brother, is appointed of the Father, Head over all things—the Head of creation. We know, too, as the apostle tells us, that it is God's design "to show in the ages to come the exceeding riches of His grace, in His kindness toward us in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2–7). But who may be the students of these marvels of mercy we know not. God's word reveals no more. Only let us be sure that a world redeemed by the blood of God's own Son, and bound to Him, through the requirements of the covenant of mercy in everlasting fellowship, is not saved without some object worthy of God who redeems it.

Let us then, brethren, hear the voice which comes to us through all God's holy prophets. Amid the temptations, and the vain show, and the sorrows of this world, let us cheer our hearts with a believing view of the coming glory, when all the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, and men shall say: "Behold, this land which was desolate is become like the garden of Eden." Let us pray for Israel, that the Lord may pardon his iniquities and bring in the day of his deliverance. Let us diligently spread the Lord's glorious "Gospel of the kingdom" to all lands under heaven, and by His aid gather out of every nation a people to His praise. Let us keep our garments white, that we walk not naked in the day of His coming, and men see our shame. Let us beware of having "our hearts surcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness and the cares of this life, and so that day which shall come as a snare upon all the earth," come upon us, too, unawares. Let us rejoice over our dying ones, that they are soon to come again with the Lord and see the glory of the Regeneration. And let us never cease to pray, as our only hope for the approach of that day of glory, "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly!"

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Defeat of the Morrison Tariff Bill was effected on May 6th by the coalition of Mr. Randall and his friends with the Republicans. The vote was 159 to 155. Of the majority 118 were Republicans and 41 were Democrats. Four Republicans voted with the minority. They were from Minnesota. The Southern and Western Democrats, with few exceptions, voted in favor of Mr. Morrison's bill. The Republicans in the House displayed remarkable shrewdness in this contest. They allowed the Democrats to take the lead in killing a Democratic bill. Mr. Eaton and Mr. Converse led the fight, and thus the Republicans escaped responsibility. It is evident that three fourths of the Democratic party are sincerely anxious for a reduction of the tariff, but yet, in a Democratic House, they could not carry so small a measure as the Morrison bill. They were defeated by the defection of their own party, and not by their opponents. The result is significant, because in the approaching struggle the party will be placed in an ambiguous position on the only vital question before the country. There were hopes, when Mr. Carlisle was elected to the Speakership, that the contest would have been one of principles; now it appears that it will be again a mere fight for the offices. Nevertheless the financial question will have to be decided. It is obvious that the present anomalous condition of the Treasury cannot be continued. The people are compelled to pay more than one hundred millions a year above what is needed for the legitimate expenses of government; thus the difficulty of living is unnecessarily and cruelly increased. The Forty-seventh Congress aggravated the wrong by squandering the enormous surplus, and the existence of the surplus will always be a temptation to other Congresses to do likewise. The excessive income must be reduced, and the question the people will have to decide is, in what department the reduction shall be made. The free-traders advocate a reduction of the tariff, proposing to admit into the country free, many articles on which a duty is now levied, and lowering the rate on others. The protectionists oppose that scheme on the ground that if there is no duty, or only a small duty levied, the foreign goods could be sold at a lower rate than those manufactured at home, notwithstanding that they would be burdened with the cost of transportation. The other scheme is to reduce or entirely abolish internal revenue. It would be impossible to discuss here the merits and advantages of these rival schemes, but there is no lack of information on the subject before the public. This, however, may be said: the proposal now so earnestly advocated to take the tax off whiskey and tobacco ought not to be entertained. It would give relief to those least entitled to it, and would leave the industrious, frugal citizen still groaning under his intolerable burden.

Two Financial Disasters Startled the Financial world last week. The failure of the Marine National Bank of New York, quickly followed by the suspension of the influential firm of Grant, Ward & Co., bankers and brokers of Wall Street, caused a flurry which at another time might have led to a panic. As it was, public confidence was not materially shaken, and only those immediately interested in the broken institutions were embarrassed. It appears that the president of the bank, Mr. James D. Fish, was a partner in the firm of Grant & Ward, and that Mr. Ward was a director of the bank. That fact explained the disaster being twofold. The bank had overcertified the cheques of Grant & Ward to the extent of $800,000, and Mr. Fish had joined Mr. Ward in speculations known in Wall Street as "wild-cat" operations. The firm of Grant & Ward enjoyed the confidence of the public, owing to the fact that ex-President Grant was one of the partners, and credit was consequently given to the representations made, that the firm had exceptional opportunities of investing profitably. The result was that many people intrusted to the firm all their capital. The accounts have not yet been balanced, but there are indications that the failures will involve serious and widespread calamity. General sympathy is felt for ex-President Grant, who appears to have been ignorant of the nature of his partner's speculations, and who will probably lose all he possesses. Happily for him, the fund of a quarter of a million dollars raised for his benefit four years ago is in the hands of trustees, and he will still enjoy its proceeds. There is also now a prospect of the bill passing to place him on the retired list as a general of the army, with the full pay of $19,000 a year.

The Third Vessel of the Greely Relief Expedition sailed from the Brooklyn Navy Yard on Saturday last. That was the Alert, the vessel the English Government presented to the United States. An immense concourse of people watched her departure. The Union Jack floated from the vessel, and was saluted from ships and the fort as the Alert sailed to the bay. After the ship had passed Fort Columbus the English flag was hauled down, and the Stars and Stripes fluttered in the breeze at the masthead. The officers and crew were in excellent spirits, and appeared to appreciate the enthusiasm evoked by their departure on their perilous voyage.

The Involuntary Contribution Liquor Sellers make to the institutions which take care of their victims in New York amounted last year to $616,650. That was the amount collected and turned over to the city by the Excise Commissioners for the year ending April 30th. This sum is $99,455 in excess of the excise collections for any previous year, and represents the amount appropriated from this source by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment to the support of charitable and benevolent institutions for the corresponding period of twelve months. The receipts in the Excise Board last month amounted to $102,975. It is quite right that the money should be so appropriated, but the liquor sellers cannot congratulate themselves on so paying for all the mischief they do. If they were compelled to support all those whom their poison ruins, liquor-selling would be a losing business. The burden is chiefly borne by the philanthropists.

The Forest Fires in Pennsylvania and New Jersey were extinguished last week, and the frequent showers of rain dispelled the fears of their again breaking out. The distress the conflagrations have caused is severely felt in many places, but the worst case is that of Brisbin, Penn., which was utterly destroyed. The inhabitants fled to Houtzdale, where the citizens have displayed splendid hospitality to the destitute refugees. An appeal has been made for assistance, as the homeless people are completely ruined. Clothes and means to erect temporary shelter are required. The loss in Elk County alone by the fires exceeds a million dollars.

Mr. John F. Slater, who Gave a Million Dollars to educate the freedmen of the South, died on May 7th at his home in Norwich, Conn. He was sixty-eight years of age. For more than a quarter of a century he has been actively engaged in philanthropic work. The munificent gift to the freedmen, by which he is best known, was made in 1882. He made his money in the cotton manufacturing business, which was established by his father and uncle, who were in early life employés of the firm of Strutt & Arkwright, the famous English manufacturers. When the elder members of the Slater family died John F. and his brother succeeded to the business, and extended and developed it. He leaves one son, who is one of the trustees of the Slater fund.

The Methodist Episcopal General Conference now in session in Philadelphia marks the centennial of American Methodism. It is exactly a hundred years since John Wesley ordained the first superintendent and lay preachers of the Methodist churches in this country, and in the same year the first General Conference was held in Baltimore. Six years later—in 1790—the number of members of the Church in the United States was reported to be about forty-three thousand. Now the entire number of lay members is more than one million seven hundred thousand in the American Methodist Episcopal Church proper; while, including all the sections in the United States and Canada, the Church numbers nearly four millions. Four hundred and fifty delegates are present at the Conference, and their decision on several vital questions, of which the itinerancy is the most prominent, is anxiously anticipated.

A Public Nursery was Opened in Brooklyn, N. Y., on Tuesday, April 29th. It has cost $35,000 and is a substantial and elegant building. The expenses have been defrayed by local philanthropists. Its object is to aid, instruct, and educate poor and friendless children by providing for them a home. None are to be received over three years of age. Some of the mothers are employed in the nursery, and by labor satisfactorily rendered secure a home for themselves and babes. Three of the wards have been well furnished by different Sunday-schools in the city. The building will accommodate one hundred children.

Christian Work in Utah was Described at the meeting of the Baptist pastors last week by Rev. Mr. Spencer, of Utah, who gave an encouraging report of Baptist progress within that Territory. Churches have been built at Ogden and Salt Lake, with respective memberships of one hundred and twenty. That in Salt Lake is the first church edifice in Utah, costing $13,000, all of which has been paid. In the school attached there are about one hundred Mormon children, all of whom also attend the Sunday-school. Several converts from the Mormons have been made, all of whom have been rebaptized. The first convert was a Mormon, who desired to be married to his so-called second wife, the first one having died. This was done, the witnesses being the eight children of the parents.

A Chinese Lady Eighteen Years of Age attended a missionary meeting in Philadelphia on May 8th. She had dark complexion and almond eyes, with rather pretty features, and wore the richly-embroidered sack and skirt and silk slippers of ladies of rank in China. This was Hu King Eng, who arrived in this country last week from China in company with the Rev. Dr. Whitney, a missionary stationed at Foochow. She is the daughter of Hu Yong Mi, a convert, who occupies the position of Presiding Elder in the Foochow Conference, and is held in high esteem in China. Her mother, who is a lady of high rank, assists her father in his missionary labor. Her grandfather, Hu King Hi, who died recently, was a mandarin of rank, and enjoyed the distinction of being the second convert to the Methodist Episcopal Church in China. The girl is unusually bright and intelligent. She has assisted her father in his missionary labors, and has rendered valuable aid at the hospital connected with the mission at Foochow, which is in charge of several ladies from this country. Her purpose in coming here is to obtain a medical education, which will enable her to take charge of the hospital on her return to her native country. With this object in view, she will take a regular course in the Women's Medical College in Philadelphia.

Mrs. M. F. Shipman, the Lady Evangelist from England, requests us to thank on her behalf numerous friends in all parts of the country, who during her sickness have written to express sympathy with her. Her weakness and prostration have prevented her sending direct acknowledgments of letters which have been a source of encouragement and comfort. She is now slowly recovering, and hopes to commence her work again in a few days. During the past nine weeks her sufferings have been severe. She regards the improvement made as an answer to the many prayers of God's people. Her departure to England has been postponed from June until August, in order that she may fulfil some of the engagements made prior to her illness.

Mr. John B. Gough, the Veteran Temperance orator, celebrated on May 2d the fortieth anniversary of his first temperance lecture. He addressed a large meeting in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, and received the congratulations of his numerous friends. In the course of his address Mr. Gough said: "Forty years ago last October I signed the temperance pledge in Worcester, Mass. I have since then given eight thousand five hundred lectures, but have never been able to give a literary entertainment, or hardly a logical argument. I have travelled more than four hundred and seventy thousand miles, and this is my three hundred and twenty-third speech in New York City. In Boston the other day I gave my three hundred and ninety-fifth lecture for that city. I was twenty-five years of age when I signed the temperance pledge. Up to that time I had never read a useful book, a scientific work, or a literary essay. But when I signed the temperance pledge I had a story to tell."

A Perilous Ride of Four Hundred Miles on the truck of a railroad car was accomplished without serious injury by a young man on May 6th. When the limited express arrived at Enon near Pittsburg, Penn., on that day, the man was discovered lying on the truck of the second car, between the wheels and the floor of the car. He had ridden from Chicago in that position, a distance of 400 miles. He said: "When the limited pulled out of the Union Station at Chicago last night I was lying on the truck of the second car. When the train got fairly under way, at the rate of forty-five miles an hour, I wished I was dead a hundred times. I was compelled to lie on my stomach and hold on with both arms and legs. In this position my face was exposed to the dust that was thrown up by the wheels, and I was almost blinded. Every time the car jolted I thought I would be thrown on the track and killed, and several times when we passed over high trestles I became dizzy, shut my eyes, and gave myself up for lost. Those feelings continued over the first hundred miles, after which, finding that no harm came to him, he concluded to finish the journey in that position, and might have done so had not he been discovered. So many men make the journey of life. At first they are troubled in the commission of sin by fear of punishment, but when it does not come they take encouragement from their apparent immunity to continue in their wicked and perilous way (Eccles. 8 : 11, 12).

A Bridge was Carried Away by a Landslide near Dover, N. H., on May 1st. A despatch from that city says: "The bridge over the Cocheco River, on the Boston and Maine Railroad, has been destroyed, and the tracks carried away by a heavy landslide. Trees and weighty rocks, and one thousand square yards of solid clay were deposited in the river, forming a complete dam. The damage is large. An engineer, with hoisting engine, was carried entirely across the river, and narrowly escaped being smothered." Happily, no train was crossing at the time, or the loss of life would have been terrible. The catastrophe shows how necessary it is to be careful about foundations. The bridge might have been the strongest of its kind, but the landslide would have destroyed it because it was built on an insecure foundation. That is the fault of humanly devised schemes of salvation. No man can reach heaven by them. "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid" (1 Cor. 3 : 11).

A Family of Children Tied Together with a rope were seen at the Union Depot, Milwaukee, Wis., recently. An early morning Chicago train brought in an immigrant family from Denmark, consisting of husband, wife, and fifteen children. When they alighted from the cars the man and woman each carried in their arms an infant, and were followed into the depot by the remainder of the numerous family. The thirteen children were all joined together by a small rope, which was fastened around the arm of each child. They were tied together in Denmark, and in this manner the long journey was made. The strangers remained at the depot until the afternoon, when they departed for Minnesota, where they will settle upon a farm. All were comfortably clothed, and the happy father appeared to be well supplied with money. Though the parents had so many children, their dread of any of them straying prompted this peculiar method of keeping them safe. The rope might have been taken as a badge of slavery, but it was really an emblem of love. So God holds His children sometimes with "cords of affliction" (Job 36 : 8), sometimes with the "cords of a man and the bands of love" (Hos. 11 : 4).

A Bride's Consternation was Amusingly described the other day by a New York barber. He had dyed her hair a beautiful auburn some time before, and had applied a wash from time to time to keep the color bright. When she was going away on her wedding tour she bought a bottle of the "auricomus" to take with her, intending to apply it herself. After a few days the barber received a despatch from Long Branch. It ran: "You're a fraud, and when I get back I'll bring an action against you for damages. I'm getting dark hourly. What you gave me was not what you applied while I was in your store. I am on my wedding tour, and would have given thousands of dollars to prevent this. Send proper stuff at once, with directions." It appeared that the lady had made a mistake in the manner of applying the wash, hence the change in her appearance and consequent mortification. We should infer from the chagrin expressed in her communication to the barber that her husband had detected the imposture, and resented it. Those who sail under false colors—and there are many such in the Church and in the world—are always liable to detection and exposure, and we are assured that a day will come in which such exposure is inevitable (Isa. 33 : 14-16).

UNBINDING LAZARUS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when he had thus spoken, he cried with a loud voice, Lazarus, come forth. And he that was dead came forth, bound hand and foot with grave-clothes: and his face was bound about with a napkin. Jesus saith unto them, Loose him, and let him go."—JOHN 11 : 43, 44.

IN many things our Lord Jesus stands alone as a worker. No other can unite his voice with the fiat which says, "Lazarus, come forth." Yet in certain points of gracious operation the Master associates His servants with Him, so that when Lazarus has come forth He says to them, "Loose him, and let him go." In the raising of the dead He is alone, and therein majestic and divine; in the loosing of the bound He is associated with them, and remains still majestic; but His more prominent feature is condescension. How exceedingly kind it is of our Lord Jesus to permit His disciples to do some little thing in connection with His great deeds, so that they may be with Him." Our Lord as frequently as possible associated His disciples with Himself; of course, they could not aid Him in presenting an atoning sacrifice, yet it was their honor that they had said, "Let us go that we may die with Him," and that in their love they resolved to go with Him to prison and to death.

Our Lord understood the fickleness of their character, yet He knew that they were sincere in their desire to be associated with Him in all His life-story, whatever it might be. Hence, when He afterward rode into Jerusalem in triumph, He alone was saluted with Hosannas; but He sent two of His disciples to bring the ass on which He rode, and they cast their garments upon the colt and they set Jesus thereon, and as He went they spread their clothes in the way. He sent Peter and John to prepare that passover, He directed them to the large upper room furnished, and there He bade them make ready. Anything that they could do they were allowed to do.

Their Lord was willing to have led them further still; but through weakness they stopped short. In the garden He bade them watch with Him on that dreadful night, and He sought sympathy from them.

> "Backward and forward, thrice he ran,
> As if he sought some help from man."

He cried in sorrowful disappointment, "Could ye not watch with me one hour?" Ah, no! They could go to the brink of the abyss with Him, but they could not descend into its deeps. He must tread the winepress alone, and of the people there must be none with Him; yet as far as they could go He disdained not their society.

Beloved, our Jesus Christ still delights to associate us with Him as far as our feebleness and folly will permit. In His present work of bringing sinners to Himself, He counts it a part of His reward that we should be laborers together with Him.

The chief subject of this morning's discourse is our association with Christ in gracious labor; but we must on the road consider other themes which lead up to it. First, I would call your attention to a memorable miracle which was wrought by our Lord in the burying-place at Bethany; secondly, I would set before you a singular spectacle, for in Lazarus we see a living man wearing the wrappings of the dead; thirdly, we will learn something from a timely assistance, which the friends around lent to the risen man after the Lord had said, "Loose him, and let him go;" and then, by way of conclusion, we will note a practical hint which this whole subject gives to those who are willing to hear what Christ their Lord will speak to them. Oh, that the Spirit of God may make us quick of understanding to perceive the mind of the Lord, and then diligent of heart to carry out His will! Come, O blessed Spirit, help thy servant at this hour!

I. First, then, this chapter records

A MEMORABLE MIRACLE.

Perhaps that writer is correct who speaks of the raising of Lazarus as the most remarkable of all our Lord's mighty works. There is no measuring miracles, for they are all displays of the infinite; but in some respects the raising of Lazarus stands at the head of the wonderful series of miracles with which our Lord astonished and instructed the people. Yet I am not in error when I assert that it is a type of what the Lord Jesus is constantly doing at this hour in the realm of mind and spirit. Did He raise the naturally dead? So doth He still raise the spiritually dead. Did He bring back a body from corruption? So doth He still deliver men from loathsome sins. The life-giving miracle of grace is as truly astounding as the quickening miracle of power.

I notice the memorableness of this miracle in the subject of it, because the man had been dead four days. Probably the sisters had perceived the traces of decay upon the body of their beloved brother before they buried him, for it is more than supposable that they delayed the funeral as long as possible under an undefined hope that perhaps their Lord would appear upon the scene. In that warm climate the ravages of decay are extremely rapid, and before many hours the loving sisters were compelled to admit, as Abraham had done before them, that they must bury their dead out of their sight. It was their full conviction that the terrible devourings of corruption had commenced. What then can be done? Surely it were an easier task to make a new man altogether out of the earth than to take this poor corrupted corpse which has turned to worms' meat and make it live again. This was the stupendous miracle of divine power which our glorious Lord performed upon His friend Lazarus.

Now, there are some men who are symbolized by this case; they are not only devoid of all spiritual life, but corruption has set in; their character has become abominable, their language is putrid, their spirit is loathsome. The pure mind desires to have them put out of sight; they cannot be endured in any decent society. They are so far gone from original righteousness as to be an offence to all, and it does not seem possible that ever they should be restored to purity, honesty, or hope. Blessed be His name, we have seen Him do this, and therefore we have cheering hope for the worst of men!

The next notable point about this miracle is the manifest human

WEAKNESS OF ITS WORKER.

He who had to deal with this dead man was Himself a man. I do not know of any passage of Scripture wherein the manhood of Christ is more frequently manifested than in this narrative. The Godhead is, of course, eminently conspicuous in the resurrection of Lazarus, but the Lord seemed as if He designedly at the same time set His manhood to the front. We cannot forget those memorable words, "Jesus wept." Who but a man should weep? Weeping is a human speciality. Jesus never seems to be more completely bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh than when He weeps. Next, our Lord made an inquiry, "Where have ye laid him?" He veils His omniscience; as a man He seeks information—where is the body of His dear departed friend? Being man, "Jesus therefore again groaning in Himself cometh to the grave."

When he has reached the spot He sees a cave whose mouth is closed by a huge stone, and now He seeks human assistance. He cries, "Take ye away the stone." Why, surely He who could raise the dead could have rolled away the stone with the self-same word! That done, our Lord lifts up His eyes to heaven, and addresses the Father in mingled prayer and thanksgiving. How like a man is all this! He takes the suppliant's place. He speaks with God as a man speaketh with His friend, but still as a man. Did not this condescending revelation of the manhood make the miracle all the more remarkable? The time came when the flame of the Godhead flashed forth from the unconsumed bush of the manhood. The voice of Him who wept was heard in the chambers of death-shade, and forth came the soul of Lazarus to live again in the body. "The weakness of God" proved itself to be stronger than death and mightier than the grave. It is a parable of our own case as workers. Sometimes we see the human side of the Gospel, and wonder whether it can do many mighty works. When we tell the story, we fear that it will appear to the people as a thrice-told tale. We wonder how it can be that truth so simple, so homely, so common should have any special power about it. Yet it is so. Out of the foolishness of preaching the wisdom of God shines forth.

Let us consider for a few moments the instrumental cause of this resurrection. Nothing was used by our Lord but His own word of power. Jesus cried with a loud voice, "Lazarus, come forth!" He simply repeated the dead man's name, and added two commanding words. This was a simple business enough. Dear friends, a miracle seems all the greater when the means used are apparently feeble and little adapted to the working of so great a result. It is so in the salvation of men. It is marvellous that such poor preaching should convert such great sinners. Many are turned unto the Lord by the simplest, plainest, most unadorned preaching of the Gospel. They hear little, but that little is from the lip of Jesus.

of the Lord's working must not be passed over, for it is a main element of wonder in this miracle. Lazarus did come forth and that immediately. The thunder of Christ's voice was attended by the lightning of His divine power, and forthwith life flashed into Lazarus and he came forth. Bound as he was, the power which had enabled him to live enabled him to shuffle forth from the ledge of rock whereon he lay, and there he stood with nothing of death about him but his grave-clothes. He quitted the close air of the sepulchre and returned to know once more the things which are done under the sun; and that at once. To me it is one of the great glories of the Gospel that it does not require weeks and months to quicken men and make new creatures of them; salvation can come to them at once. The man who stepped into this Tabernacle this morning steeped in rebellion against his God, and apparently impervious to divine truth, may nevertheless go down those steps with his sins forgiven, and with a new spirit imparted to him, in the strength of which he shall begin to live unto God as he never lived before.

The effect which this miracle produced upon those who looked on was very remarkable, for many believed in the Lord Jesus. Besides this, the miracle of raising Lazarus was so unquestioned and unquestionable a fact that it brought the Pharisees to a point—they would now make an end of Christ. They had huffed and puffed at His former miracles; but this one had struck such a blow that in their wrath they determined that He should die. No doubt this miracle was the immediate cause of the crucifixion of Jesus; it marked a point of decision when men must either believe in Christ or become His deadly foes. Oh, brethren, if the Lord be with us, we shall see multitudes believing through Jesus; and if the rage of the enemy becomes thereby the more intense, let us not fear it; there will come a last decisive struggle, and mayhap it shall be brought on by some amazing display of the divine power in the conversion of the chief of sinners. Let us hope so; let us not be afraid that Armageddon should be fought, for it will end in victory. We shall see greater things than these!

II. Secondly, I beg you to observe

A SINGULAR SPECTACLE.

A notable miracle was unquestionably wrought; but it required a finishing touch. The man was wholly raised, but not wholly freed. See, here is a living man in the garments of death! That napkin and other grave-clothes were altogether congruous with death, but they were much out of place when Lazarus began again to live. It is a wretched sight to see a living man wearing his shroud. Yet we have seen in this Tabernacle hundreds of times people quickened by divine grace with their grave-clothes still upon them. Such was their condition that unless you observed carefully you would think them still dead; and yet within them the lamp of heavenly life was burning.

Moreover, he was

hand and foot. How he moved I do not know. I know that I have seen souls bound and yet moving; moving intensely in one direction, and yet not capable of stirring an inch in another. Have you not seen a man so truly alive that he wept, he mourned, he groaned over sin; but yet he could not believe in Christ, but seemed bound hand and foot as to faith? I have seen him give up his sin determinedly, and crush a bad habit under his foot, and yet he could not lay hold on a promise or receive a hope. Lazarus was free enough in one way, for he came out of the tomb, but the blinding napkin was about his head; and even so it is with many a quickened sinner, for when you try to show him some cheering truth he cannot see it.

Moreover, here was a repulsive object, but yet attractive. Mary and Martha must have been charmed to see their brother, even though wrapped in grave-clothes. He startled all the assembly, and yet they were drawn to him. A man fresh from the sepulchre robed in a winding-sheet is a sight one would go a long way not to see, but such was Lazarus; yet a man restored from death it were worth while to travel round the world to look upon, and such was Lazarus. So have we come near to a poor sinner; it was enough to frighten anybody to hear his groans, and to see his weeping, but yet he was so dear to every true heart that we loved to be with him.

Moreover, here was a man

STRONG, AND YET HELPLESS.

He was strong enough to come forth from his grave, and yet he could not take the napkin from his own head, for his hands were bound, and he could not go to his house, for his feet were swathed. Unless some kind hand unbound him he would remain a living mummy. He had strength sufficient to quit the grave, but he could not be quit of his grave-clothes. So have we seen men strong, for the Spirit of God has been in them, and has moved them mightily; they have been passionately in earnest even to agony in one direction, yet the newborn life has been so feeble in other ways that they seemed to be mere babes in swaddling clothes. They have not been able to enjoy the liberty of Christ, nor enter into communion with Christ, nor work for Christ. They have been bound hand and foot; work and progress have alike been beyond them. This seems a strange sequel to a miracle. Such anomalies are common in the world of grace.

III. This brings us to consider

A TIMELY ASSISTANCE

which you and I are called upon to render. Oh for wisdom to learn our duty, and grace to do it at once. Let us consider what are these bands which often bind newly regenerated sinners. Some of them are blindfolded by the napkin about their head; they are very ignorant, sadly devoid of spiritual perception, and withal the eye of faith is darkened. Yet the eye is there, and Christ has opened it; and it is the business of the servant of God to remove the napkin which bandages it, by teaching the truth, explaining it, and clearing up difficulties. This is a simple thing to do, but exceedingly necessary. Now that they have life we shall teach them to purpose. Besides that, they are bound hand and foot, so that they are compelled to inaction; we can show them how to work for Jesus. Sometimes these bands are those of sorrow, they are in an awful terror about the past; we have to unbind them by showing that the past is blotted out. They are wrapped about by many a yard of doubt, mistrust, anguish, and remorse. "Loose them, and let them go."

Another hinderance is the band of fear. "Oh," says the poor soul, "I am such a sinner that God must punish me for my sin." Tell him the grand doctrine of substitution. Unwrap this cerement by the assurance that Jesus took our sin, and that "by His stripes we are healed." It is wonderful what liberty comes by that precious truth when it is well understood.

Souls are very often bound with the GRAVE-CLOTHES OF PREJUDICE.

They used to think so and so before conversion, and they are very apt to carry their dead thoughts into their new life. Go and tell them that things are not what they seem; that old things have passed away, and behold all things have become new. The days of their ignorance God winked at, but now they must change their minds about everything, and no more judge according to the sight of the eyes and the hearing of the ears. Some of them are bound with the grave-clothes of evil habit. It is a noble work to aid a drunkard to unwind the accursed bands which prevent his making the slightest progress toward better things. Let us tear off every band from ourselves that we may the more readily help them to be free.

But why are these bandages left? Why did not the miracle which raised Lazarus also loosen his grave-clothes? I answer because our Lord Jesus is always economical of miracles. Lazarus cannot be raised out of the grave except by a miracle, but he can be and therefore human hands must do it. If there is anything in the kingdom of God which we can do ourselves it is folly to say, "May the Lord do it," for He will do nothing of the sort. If you can do it you shall do it; or if you refuse the neglect shall be visited upon you.

I suppose that those bands were left that those who came to unwind him should be sure that he was the same man who died. Some of them may have said, "This is Lazarus, for these are the grave-clothes which we wrapped about him. There is no trickery here. This is the self-same man that was laid out and prepared by us for burial." For some such cause our Lord permits the quickened sinner to remain in a measure of bondage, that we may know that the man is the same person who was really dead in trespasses and sins. He was no sham sinner, for the traces of his sins are still upon him. You can see by what he says that his training was none of the best; the relics of the old nature show what manner of man he used to be. Every now and then the smell of the sepulchre meets your nostril; the mould of the grave has stained his grave-clothes; his was true death, and no imitation of it. So, too, we know that he is alive, for we hear his sighs and cries, and we perceive that his experience is that of a living child of God.

Moreover, I still think that the main object was that these disciples might enter into rare fellowship with Christ. They could each say, not proudly but still joyfully, "Our Lord raised Lazarus, and I was there and helped to unloose him from his grave-clothes." Perhaps Martha could say in after-life, "I took the napkin from my brother's dear face," and Mary could add, "I helped to unbind a hand." It is most sweet to hope that we have done anything to cheer, or to teach, or sanctify a soul. Not unto us can be any praise, but unto us there is much comfort concerning this thing. Brothers and sisters, will you not earn a share in this dear delight? Will you not seek the lost sheep? Will you not sweep the house for the lost money? Will you not at the very least help to feast the long-lost son?

We should do this because it is very possible that we those grave-clothes upon our friend. Some of the people who were at Bethany that day had assisted in the burial of Lazarus, and surely those should loose Lazarus who helped to bind him. Many a Christian man before his conversion has helped to make sinners worse by his example, and possibly after his conversion he may by his indifference and want of zeal have aided in binding new converts in the bonds of doubt and sorrow. At any rate, you have said of many a person, "He will never be saved!" Thus you have wrapped him in grave-clothes; the Lord never told you to do that—you did it of your own accord; and now that He bids you remove those grave-clothes, will you not be quick to do it?

I remember when somebody lent a hand to take the grave-clothes off from me, and therefore I desire to loose the grave-clothes of others. If we cannot repay what we owe to the precise individual who wrought us good, we can at least repay it by working for the general benefit of seekers. "There," said a benevolent man, as he gave help to a poor man, "take that money, and when you can pay it back give it to the next man whom you meet who is in the same plight as yourself, and tell him he is to pay it to another destitute person as soon as he can afford it; and so my money will go travelling on for many a day." That is how our Lord does; He sends a brother to loose my bonds; then I am helped to set another free, and he releases a third, and so on to the world's end. God grant that you and I may not be negligent in this heavenly service.

IV. Lastly,

A PRACTICAL HINT.

If the Lord Jesus Christ employed the disciples in relieving Lazarus of his grave-clothes, do you not think He would employ us if we were ready for such work? Yonder is Paul; the Lord Jesus has struck him down; but the lowly Ananias must visit him and baptize him, that he may receive his sight. Innumerable are the instances of souls blessed by human instrumentality; but I shall conclude by calling attention to one passage upon which I wish to dwell for a second or two.

When the prodigal came home, the father did not say to one of his servants, "Go and meet him." No; we read "when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck and kissed him." He did all this himself. The father personally forgave him, and restored him; but we read further on "the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet; and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry." Come, fellow-servants, bring forth the best robe. I am never happier than when I preach the righteousness of Christ, and try to put it upon the sinner.

"What!" cries one, "you cannot put it on!" So the parable says—"Bring forth the best robe and put it on him." I not only bring it out and show it; but by the Holy Spirit's help I try to put it on the sinner. I hold it up before him, just as you hold up a friend's great-coat to help him to put it on. You have to guide the poor sinner's hand into the sleeve, and lift it up upon his shoulders, or he might never get it on. You are to teach him, comfort him, cheer him, and, in fact, help him to be dressed like one of the family. Then the ring, can we not bring it forth? He has a long journey to go; he is to be a pilgrim, and we must with the preparation of the Gospel of peace. His feet are new in the Lord's ways; we must show him how to run on the Master's errands. As for the fatted calf, it is ours to feed the restored ones; and as for the music and the dancing, it is ours to make the hearts of penitents glad by rejoicing over them. There is plenty to be done: Oh, my brethren, try and do some of it this morning.

There are children of God who have not yet a shoe to their feet; there are plenty of shoes in the house, but no servant has put them on. When I come to look, I see some brethren who have not the ring on their hand. Oh, that I might have the privilege of putting it on! I charge you, brethren, by the blood that bought you, and by the love that holds you, and by the supreme bounty which supplies your need, go forth and do what your Master graciously permits and commands you to do; loose Lazarus, bring forth the best robe and put it on him, put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet, and let us all eat and be merry with our Father. Amen.

CASTAWAYS AMONG BANDITTI.

CASTAWAYS among banditti have sometimes proved that Jesus died for them. "Some time ago," says an earnest minister of the Gospel, "I was travelling in one of the mountainous regions of the Continent of Europe. At the close of a brilliant day I was anxious to see the last rays of the setting sun. I mounted a hill, and struck with admiration at the glorious coloring around me, I longed for a companion to unite with me in praising the Sun of Righteousness, thus visible in the beauties of creation. A distant whistle from a peasant, returning to his home, quickened my steps; but his speed far exceeded mine, and he was quickly out of sight. As I descended the height I walked close to a hedge, which bordered a deep ravine. The sound of voices from beneath arrested my attention; and looking through the bushes I beheld a body of men, having the appearance of banditti, at their evening meal. Here, I thought, is an opportunity of making known the plan of salvation; but my timid nature suggested the rashness of such an effort: one so totally defenceless as I could not be called on to face such a gang. So I moved on slowly, still listening to their rough language. Dissatisfied with my own cowardice, I went near an opening in the hedge to take another view. My foot trod upon unsafe ground, and I came down with the crumbling earth into the midst of the dreaded party.

"'A booty! a booty!' shouted the marauders.

"With strength given me, I think, from above, I echoed with a firm voice, 'A booty! a booty such as you have never received before!' An unpleasant expression passed over their faces. I heeded it not, feeling assured I had God's message to deliver. 'Yes!' I said, 'I bring you good news, glorious news of a Powerful Friend, who is able and willing to save both body and soul.'

"A tall, dark-featured man took up my words. 'Save my soul! No one has ever cared for my soul. I have been a castaway from my birth!'

"Opening my pocket Bible, I repeated from memory (for there was now little light) suitable invitations, exhortations, and promises. Oh, how quick and wonderful is the Word of God, discerning the thoughts and intents of the heart—imparting light, life, and hope. Finding the attention of my hearers riveted, I concluded with this verse, 'This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus came into the world to save sinners.'

"We all knelt down under the blue vault of heaven. Upon rising, the dark-featured man begged a favor of me. 'Will you give me your Bible?'

"'Will you promise,' I asked, 'to read it with prayer?' 'I will,' he answered.

"Three years after this interview I was accosted by a respectable-looking man in Piccadilly. 'Excuse the liberty of inquiry, sir; did you visit such and such a Canton, in such a year? and do you recognize this book?' producing from his pocket my Bible, well worn. When I answered in the affirmative, he grasped my hand, and said: 'This gift has been blessed to my soul; and often have I prayed that I might meet you on earth to thank you for this inestimable boon.' The castaway among banditti had proved that the sinners' Saviour had died for him."

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

CRUTCHES DISCARDED.

The Journal, of Augusta, Me., states that a well-known lady of that city, who has been unable for two years to walk without crutches, has been healed through faith and prayer. Mrs. Hannah E. Casey was thrown from a vehicle on October 11th, 1881, and so severely injured that she was unable to put one of her feet to the ground. The tendons of the hip were drawn up and were rigid, and the limb was contracted and disfigured. Thirteen physicians were successively consulted, and all pronounced her case hopeless.

Services were being held last month in Meonian Hall by Mr. and Mrs. Pierson, and Mrs. Casey hobbled to the meetings by the aid of her crutch. One night she begged the evangelists to pray for her that she might be healed. Mrs. Casey was asked if she had faith. The answer was in the affirmative. Mr. and Mrs. Pierson offered fervent prayers for her recovery. The next day she came to meeting again still using her crutch, and Mr. Pierson advised her to make kindling wood of it. The next time she appeared at the services the crutch was not to be seen, but in its place was a cane. Again she came, without support, and, to all appearances, could walk as well as any person. It was evident that she had been thoroughly healed. On April 7th she attended services at the Christian church on Sand Hill in the forenoon, at Eureka Hall on the east side in the afternoon, and at Meonian Hall in the evening, walking from and to her residence on Elm Street each time. Since then her walking powers have continued, and her recovery astonishes all who know her.

FRANK LEVISON'S CREED.

"WHERE is Miss Levison to-day? Do you know why she is staying away just as we are so busy with the examinations?" said a teacher in a large grammar school, as she came up to a group of other teachers who were standing together talking at recess.

"I know," said one of them; "it is Passover, and she has to go to synagogue, I expect. At any rate, she would not come to school. I saw her father's store was closed as I came by this morning, and a notice was on the doors that it would not be open until Monday, in consequence of Passover. They must think a good deal of their religion."

"It's only their superstition," said another. "You cannot call it religion. For my part, I cannot bear Jews. They are so unsociable and so proud and disagreeable. I never speak to that Miss Levison; I think she is horrid. I wonder how she got the appointment."

"I never speak to her either," said another. "She seems to be very clever, but I don't like Jews."

It appeared that none of the group of teacher was friendly with the Jewess. Some avoided her for one reason and some for another, but all of them were prejudiced against her chiefly on account of her race.

"I do not know Miss Levison," said Madeline Mathieson, a tall, handsome girl, the daughter of an aged clergyman, a newly appointed teacher. "I have never noticed her, but I shall try to get acquainted. I have no prejudice against Jews. They are the grandest race on earth. I think we Christians ought to respect them, and show them kindness whenever we have opportunity. We are indebted to them more than to any other people. Our Saviour was a Jew, and the best of all books was written by Jews. As God made them His chosen people, we ought not to despise them."

Madeline's enthusiasm only awakened mirth among the other girls, whose religion was of a less practical kind than Madeline's. But recess being over the teachers hurried away to their classes, and nothing was said in reply. Madeline, however, kept her word, and soon found an opportunity of doing the Jewish teacher a kindness, which led to an acquaintance that shortly became intimate. The isolation in which Rebecca Levison was placed rendered her grateful for the friendship of her fellow-teacher, and her proud reserve thawed under the kindly intercourse.

"Rebecca, I want you to come and spend the evening with me," said Miss Mathieson one day to her friend. "It is my birthday, and though we do not make any fuss, we always celebrate our birthdays by having a friend or two to see us. I should like to introduce you to my father and sisters."

"I thank you, Madeline, but I cannot come to-night. I have promised to go out with my brother. He is so seldom at home that I should not like to disappoint him."

"Oh, that need be no difficulty," said Madeline. "Bring your brother with you by all means. That will be an additional pleasure."

So it was arranged, and Frank Levison and his sister duly presented themselves in the evening at the Mathieson home, a quiet, unpretending house two or three miles from the city. The old clergyman's weight of years and infirmities precluded him from pulpit labor, but a moderate income was provided for him by the church he had served long and faithfully. This, with such additions as his daughters were able to make from their earnings, sufficed for the modest wants of the family. The Jewess and her brother received a cordial welcome from the clergyman and his daughters, and after supper the little party gathered around the piano. Frank Levison, like most of his race, was an enthusiast in music, and he listened with delight to the performance of Madeline, whose voice and touch betokened true genius. One piece succeeded another, until at last she took out Kücken's "Maid of Judah." Then her rich deep contralto voice thrilled every listener as she sang:

Frank Levison hears "The Maid of Judah" sung.

"O blest native land! O fatherland mine!
How long for thy refuge in vain shall I pine?
* * * * * *
Thy cities are ruin, thy valleys lie waste,
Their summer enchantment the foe hath erased."

Frank Levison thanked her warmly, and then asked her to sing some Christian hymns, mentioning one or two especially which he liked to hear. Madeline complied willingly, and her sisters joined in the singing.

"How sweet the name of Jesus sounds" was one of the hymns, and Madeline and her sisters threw into it deep feeling.

Frank Levison seated himself by the clergyman as the singing ceased, and said: "Your daughters, Mr. Mathieson, have charming voices; I cannot express to you the pleasure I have felt in listening to them."

"Yes," said the clergyman, "they have had but little instruction, and I suppose there are artistic faults in their performances; but in such pieces as they have given us to-night one loses sight of the faults in the earnestness and genuine feeling they throw into their singing."

"I felt that," said the young Jew. "As Miss Madeline sang that 'Maid of Judah' I could have imagined her a coreligionist. Yet scarcely that, for she seemed to feel a deeper yearning over the historic land than any of our sisters feel. We as a race are abandoning the expectation of returning to Palestine. The Reformed school, to which I belong, has no desire to return, though my father and his friends of the Orthodox school would sooner live there in poverty than anywhere else in luxury. It is a strange desire—a hope cherished through many centuries—but it will never be fulfilled."

"I am sure it will be fulfilled in God's time," said Mr. Mathieson, quietly. "The promises are as explicit and definite as anything contained in the Bible."

"The prophets, and poets, and dreamers of our race believed it, I know," said Levison, "and encouraged the people to hope for it. I think that is all the 'promises' amount to."

"I am sure there is far more than that in them. The prophets were merely the channels of God's revelation to the world. They spoke with authority, when they predicted the return of the Jews and their acceptance of Jesus as the Messiah."

"I wish I could believe that," said Levison, earnestly. "To me the literature of the Bible is very interesting; I venerate it as the legends of a bygone time, very beautiful and ennobling, but with no more truth in it than in the legends of other races, except that the pure monotheism, which is its centre, is true. As to Jesus and His teaching, I think He was the greatest teacher our race ever produced, but He was in advance of His time. Like Galileo and other teachers whom the world venerates now, He was misunderstood by His contemporaries, and He, with the courage and tenacity that Galileo and such men cannot reach as the ethical philosopher can, died a martyr to the truth. We of the Reformed school hold very much such a creed as Jesus taught."

"Why, then, are you not Christians?" asked Mr. Mathieson.

"Because Christianity, as it is now taught, is the philosophy of Paul, not of Jesus."

It was a rare opportunity for preaching Christ, which Mr. Mathieson was not the man to let slip. With simple, God-given eloquence he showed this young Jew that the philosophy of Christianity, true and excellent as it is, is but the dress that covers the living person of Jesus, the Redeemer of the world. That visit was only the first of a long series. The young man was in earnest in his search for truth. With devout thankfulness to God Mr. Mathieson had the joy of seeing as the fruit of his old age the conversion of him and his sister, and of witnessing their labors for Christ.

ANCIENT EPHESUS.

THE picture on page 316 represents Ephesus in its ancient grandeur. At the present day it is a heap of ruins, many of which are buried eighteen feet below the surface, and a village called Ayaseluk, with houses, trees, and fields, exists over the spot where once stood the famous temple of Diana. Ephesus was an important city three hundred years before Christ was born; and when Alexander's kingdom was divided among his four generals, Ephesus was one of the chief cities which fell to the lot of Lysimachus, who improved and beautified it. When the Romans obtained possession of it they made it the chief place for trade of all the Asiatic cities west of the Taurus. It was in the reign of Augustus that the Apostle Paul spent three years there and Ephesus was in the zenith of its prosperity.

The theatre referred to in the Acts as the scene of that tumultuous meeting which the town-clerk dispersed, was a magnificent building; fragments of it have been discovered recently. The city also contained a music hall and many other splendid edifices. The most famous was the great temple about which Demetrius expressed so much concern. It was the largest Greek temple ever constructed. Its cost was enormous, but so great was the enthusiasm of the people, that even the ladies gave their earrings and jewelry to be sold for the benefit of the building fund. It had 128 columns, 60 feet in height, many of which were exquisitely carved. It contained numberless statues, the work of the greatest sculptors the world has ever seen, and its altar was a masterpiece of art. The temple itself was 425 feet in length, 220 in width, and attracted visitors from all parts of Europe and Asia. It was destroyed by the Goths about 260 years after Christ.

The name of Ephesus will never be forgotten by the world, but the associations of the name are not with its power and splendor. It would be a comparatively unknown name to all but historical scholars and antiquarians had it not been immortalized by the residence there of the Apostle Paul. How incredulous would have been the priests and great public functionaries of that time, if they had been told what would be the association which would render the name of their city familiar to people eighteen hundred years later! The names of priests and rulers and public officers have passed away into oblivion; the fête days and grand festivals are forgotten, but a poor despised preacher, a mere working man, who spent three years there, has rescued the city from oblivion, and one day in which an insignificant disturbance arose and was easily suppressed is the day which is best known in its history.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A Surprise for Hester.

AT last the day came when Grant announced to Robert Waldron that he was well enough to spend an hour or two in another apartment. He shuddered at the idea of entering once again the room where he had spent so many hours with Rose. But Grant was not the man to whom he could confide his story with its episode of guilt. Had he not thought it might be part of the penance which, in some measure, by its sharp pang, would atone for his sin? He strung up his nerves, bade his heart be strong, and leaning tremblingly upon Grant's shoulder, left the chamber where he had been lying, half unconscious, on the edge of the grave.

The room to which he was conducted was scarcely larger than a closet, and contained only a very small table and two chairs; one of them the large antique chair, with high back and sides, which had been bought years ago for Hester's mother, and which had never since been moved from its station on John Morley's hearth. He sank into it exhausted. It was not until Grant had left him, asleep as he supposed, that he opened his eyes again, and gazed about him anxiously.

His seat was set opposite to a small window, the view from which was dismal; an outer staircase, black with smoke and rot, leading up to a discolored door, about which clustered some dingy ivy-leaves. This closed door, and the mournful leafage about it, fascinated him. It seemed to fill the little casement; for without going closer to it, nothing could be seen but this one gable with its blackened and worn-out steps leading to it. He could see, by the rust upon the handle and by the overgrowth of sickly tendrils stretching across the doorway, that it was a place fallen into disuse—a mere lumber-room shut up for long months together, and left to the dust and mildew; yet none the less did his mind, weakened and dizzy, imagine that there lurked in it some scene which it was necessary for him to see, and which would all lie before him, plain and intelligible and full of interest, if only the rotten panels of the door would give way. Somewhere outside the sun was shining, and in the grate a cheerful fire was crackling; but in spite of the light and warmth he shivered as one shivers sometimes at a ghastly thought in the depth of a winter's night. Day and night John Morley's house was a haunted house for him.

Robert Waldron started with nervous and guilty dread as the latch of the door clicked softly before it was pushed quietly open. He turned his eyes, large and sunken with his illness, upon the doorway, wondering who might be about to enter; for it was never with this slow caution that Grant came in. A girl's face looked in for a moment before advancing; a fair, grave face with a color upon it, soft and clear and delicate, and a light in the large gray eyes, like the shining of the spring sun behind a thin veil of mist. This surely could not be Hester, the little child whom he had been wont to nurse upon his knee, and to whom he had read fairy stories. Yet it could be no one else. He felt the sudden sting of hot tears under his eyelids. It was Hester—little Hetty—whose whole life he had clouded and saddened. He attempted to rise from his chair, but he found himself powerless and speechless. It was with an almost superhuman effort that he restrained himself from breaking out into loud and bitter weeping.

"I am Hester Morley," she said, advancing toward him, and speaking in a low and measured voice, which was somewhat monotonous in its accents, yet all the more soothing to him. "Mr. Grant told me you were going to sit here for an hour or two. Can I do anything for you? Shall I fetch you anything?"

"Stay with me a little while," he answered, stammering and hesitating; "I have something to tell you."

"Do you feel strong enough yet?" she asked, looking at him with an expression of grave anxiety. "Mr. Grant does not know I am come, or he would not let me be here; but I wished to tell you that you are among friends, and you need not hurry yourself to go away. We are your friends though we are strangers to each other yet. It would not be possible to watch over any one and think about them night and day, and pray to God for their recovery, without feeling that they are friends. I want you to feel this too."

The words were spoken softly, with that faint languor of a voice which had never been quickened by either mirth or passion; but they smote upon Robert Waldron with the keenest tone of reproach. He looked up speechlessly into her face; and her clear eyes, from whose grave scrutiny he shrank, looked down pitifully upon his agitation.

"Nay," she said, "I must leave you if you will excite yourself. I told you Mr. Grant does not know I am at home, and I think he would be displeased if he found me here. So you must be calm, and prove that I do you good and not harm, then he will let me come again. My father is John Morley, the bookseller; do you know us? He thinks of coming to see you this evening; do you know him at all?"

"I used to know him a little," answered Robert Waldron.

"Every one knows my father," said Hester, with a sad smile; "so you see you are not among strangers, and you may feel quite at home in our house. I do not know many people, for I have never been out of Little Aston, and it is no wonder that you are a stranger to me; yet I do not feel as if you were really a stranger. I suppose it is because I was afraid you were going to die here; and nobody has died in this house since my mother, nearly nineteen years ago."

She stood within reach of his hand if he had dared to touch her with it, a subdued and quiet girl, as if she had grown up in the shadow of her mother's death; but he knew well that was not the chill and the darkness which had fallen upon her life.

"Your father married a second time," he said, almost in spite of himself, and shuddering at the answer he had invoked.

"You know it," she said, "if you know my father."

"I have not seen him," he answered, laying his hand upon his heart, "these ten years."

"You would not know him again, then," said Hester, mournfully; "he is an old man now, broken down and infirm; are you sure you never heard of our trouble? Everybody knew it."

He did not answer; but Hester, in the dead silence which followed, could hear the heavy throbbing of his heart. She was about to call Grant, when he stretched out his hands to her.

"I am very ill," he muttered; "hold my hand in yours for a moment."

Hester took it between both her own and held it in a firm warm clasp, waiting for this paroxysm of weakness to pass before she hastened away. The tears which had been burning under his eyelids fell in torrents; and at length Robert Waldron bent down his fevered head, and rested it upon her hand.

"Don't you know who I am, Hester?" he murmured.

A slight shiver ran through Hester's frame. There was something in his tone now which startled her memory, and she tried to free her hands from those which held them; but he was grasping them too tightly for her to disengage herself.

"Hetty!" he cried, and no one had ever called her by that name since Rose had fled; "little Hetty, have pity upon me; I am very wretched!"

The first passionate moment in Hester's life had come. She thrust back the bruised head, and wrested herself from the grasp which held her, falling back from him as one who was an abhorrence to her. He had been the curse of her father's house, and through the long solitary years to which he had doomed her, his sin and her step-mother's had haunted her. And now he was within the very recesses of their home again—more than a guest now—an inmate, thought of, tended, and cared for. The pallor had passed away from her face and the soft lustre from her eyes; and when she spoke, her voice had the eager and vehement ring of passion.

"Oh!" she cried, "is it possible that you could be near dying, and yet not die, in this house? Many a man would have died here of grief and shame alone. How can you breathe the air my father breathes? How can you eat his bread and not be choked by it? Is it possible that any man can be so mean a thing, so miserable a thing?"

"Hester," moaned Robert Waldron, "I am the most miserable of men!"

He lifted up to her his wan, emaciated face, covered with grief and remorse. For the present he was stripped of all the self-sufficiency and pleasant palliation of his own faults, which in easier moments characterized Robert Waldron. Hester felt herself smitten with pity and compassion for him. If he had repented thus, he must have well-nigh borne the full penalty of his crime during the ten years which had passed so painfully over her father's head.

"My father must never know whom he has sheltered," she said, in a softer voice; "you must leave us as soon as you can, and with all the secrecy possible. No one must know you have ever been in this house, lest it should reach his ears. I believe it would kill him. Rouse yourself, and think what we can do to prevent him discovering it."

"Hester!" he cried, "say something pitiful to me."

"Oh, I pity you!" she answered; "I pity you all—her and you and my father; but what can I do? There are troubles which no one can lighten. They say that time will soften every sorrow; but it has not done anything for you, or my father, or for her."

For an instant Robert remembered how dim the past had grown to him.

"Forgive me, little Hetty," he said.

"I forgive you," she replied, touching with the tips of her fingers his hand which lay upon the table; "for you did not know what you were doing. Look at me; how different I should have been if I had grown up by the side of a mother who loved me. You cannot see my father or her; but me you can see, so different from what I might have been but for you."

He looked at her, standing before him with her pure young face, austere and grave, yet possessing a charm which made his heart throb again rapidly. Looking at her did not bring to his mind the evil he had committed; but he did not dare to put into words any of the thoughts which thronged his brain, and he kept a sombre silence.

"When can you go away?" asked Hester.

"Not to-day," he said, imploringly; "do not send me away to-day, Hester."

"You shall stay," she answered, in the old soft languid voice, "until you can go safely. But my father must not see you. Tell Mr. Grant enough to let him know why you must make haste to go, and he will arrange how you can be removed, so that no one may find out that you have been here."

A half smile crossed his face, which he had shaded with his hand, as he thought how well John Morley knew who he was, and how it was that he had been struggling against death these last few days. But he could not breathe a word of this to Hester; he did not know what he dared to say to her now she knew him. He longed to hear her voice again, and to lift his eyes to her sweet though reproving face. When he did so at last, feeling the silence too painful, he found himself again alone, for Hester had stolen away noiselessly; and his heavy and weary eyes fastened once more upon the dismal doorway opposite to him, with its smoky wreath of ivy.

Hester had to pay her price for the gratification of her curiosity. Grant had, as he supposed, made sure that she was safely out of the way before he had left his charge, to take the sleep he so greatly needed; and she had availed herself of his absence to visit the stranger about whom her mind had been busy with a thousand painful conjectures. It had been a romance to her, but now the romance had suddenly assumed the severe and hard aspect of a reality. That which, to more distant onlookers, added to the romance, brought it for her into the practical region of an unpleasant fact. Robert Waldron, whose name was never uttered in her father's hearing, was here, separated from him only by thin walls and a door whose latch could be lifted with a touch.

Hester believed in the implacable resentment of her father. He had forsaken many of the established forms of religion, had withdrawn from all prominent offices in the Church, had even given up the practice of assembling his little household for private worship, and never took into his lips the name of the God he had once professed to serve. These were signs of such tremendous import in the judgment of his minister, and of Miss Waldron especially, that it was no wonder Hester's mind was troubled by them; or that she attributed them, as they did, to an unrelenting hatred to those who had destroyed the honor and happiness of his existence. Secretly, though troubled, Hester had rather gloried in her father's implacability, as being in accord with the high-flown romances and poems with which her imagination had fed itself. But of late she had longed for some ray of tender light, some flash of possible relenting, to break in upon the gloom of his spirit; and now that Robert Waldron was positively in their dwelling, she was frightened. What would her father feel? What would he do? Into what might he be hurried if he came face to face with their unknown guest, and found in him the man whom he hated, his enemy and betrayer?

She went slowly down-stairs, deliberating within herself, until she reached her father's sitting-room. He glanced up at her entrance with a gleam of light upon his gray face which was his nearest approach to a smile, for neither lips nor eyebrows were unbended. She went forward with an involuntary movement, as if she would take his white head into her arms and kiss the furrowed face which had so sorrowful a story graven upon it; but caresses were rarely exchanged between them, and Hester checked her impulse. The hearth looked empty without the great chair which had kept its place there these twenty years—her own mother's chair; and Hester's face burned as she thought of Robert Waldron resting in it in her little study up-stairs.

"Ah!" said John Morley, looking toward the empty place, "I miss it, Hester. Is our poor guest up yet? Have you seen him?"

"Yes," answered Hester, briefly.

"I will visit him myself as soon as I am at liberty," he continued; "has he made known to you his name and family?"

Hester started, and hesitated. At all risks she must keep this terrible secret from him; and yet she was not practised in dissimulation, and was not ready with a reply. Fortunately he was habitually indifferent to any subject of conversation, and happily at that moment there occurred something that diverted his attention.

LIBERAL GIVING.

S. S. Lesson for May 25, II Cor. 9. Golden Text, verse 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Various Rules about Giving—A Gauge of Spiritual Life—The Jewish Tenth—How God's Work might be Doubled—A Law of God—Not of Law but of Grace—Simplicity Makes Life Easy—Christian Work in a Poor Room—The Macedonian Order.

"WHAT is your rule about giving?" is a question often asked among Christians. The replies are various, but they are always in accordance with the measure in which God is appreciated by the speaker. Many fall back upon the old Jewish law, and say with a kind of self-conscious righteousness, "I always give the tenth." Others, who do not make much stir about it, reverse this order, live on the tenth of their income, and give nine tenths to God. We know of one who always does so. "But how can such a man keep up his position?" some may say. When our position is to be at God's disposal as regards all we are, and all we have, the keeping of our position is in His hands, not ours; it does not consist in having a house furnished to our taste, in having a number of servants, horses, carriages, and the society which such surroundings always bring; but, on the contrary, in being free from all which cannot serve God's purpose. God forbid that we should say a word against those who are called of God to such surroundings; there are many who in these things serve God, but there are a thousand-fold more who in these things serve themselves, and, in so doing, serve the prince of this world.

Under the law,

of everything was God's portion, and a pious Jew would have counted himself guilty of sacrilege to appropriate this portion to his own use. Abraham was the first recorded who paid tithes to "Melchizedec, the priest of the Most High God" (Gen. 14 : 20). Jacob promised God tithes, if He really would keep His promises (Gen. 28 : 22). Under the law the tithes were the portion of the Levites (Num. 18 : 21, 24; II Chron. 31 : 5, 6, 12; Neh. 13 : 12). God's mind regarding these tithes is taught us thus: "All the tithes of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree is the Lord's: it is holy unto the Lord." This was by constraint; it was the order of God; the children of Israel might give free-will offerings, but these were always over and above the tithes. "If a man will at all redeem aught of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof." Thus any change must involve an addition; on no pretence was God's portion to be diminished; it was "holy unto the Lord." "He shall not search whether it be good or bad, neither shall he change it; and if he change it at all, then both it and the change thereof shall be holy; it shall not be redeemed" (Lev. 27 : 30–33).

Suppose that every converted person did only as much as this, what would be the result? The work of God would be doubled or trebled at once. But even then the principle would be defective. Are we to reckon ourselves living sacrifices, but exclude our possessions from the sacrifice? are we to be consecrated to the Lord with the exception of our capital and our income? Unhesitatingly we affirm that if all believers were really to God, so that position, reputation, in short, all were laid upon the altar, the world would get such a shock that it could never recover.

In the early days of the Church some few thousands of believers "were of one heart and of one soul; neither said any of them that aught of the things which he possessed (let alone the tithes) was his own. Then great grace was upon them all, then half-hearted men dared not join themselves unto them, then a lie could not live for half an hour, then all the sick were healed, and conversions took place in multitudes. What then would be the effect if some two millions of believers now living in the United States were to do the same? What would be the result if once again the spirit were abroad among us to leave all, and follow Jesus? Thank God, there are blessed instances of this spirit among us, but the majority of believers do not give to the work of the Lord much more, if as much, as respectable unconverted people do.

Paul has laid down

A LAW OF GOD

in this matter—"He which soweth sparingly shall reap also sparingly; and he which soweth bountifully shall reap also bountifully." Look at the joy of heart which that little girl has who denies herself sugar in her tea and butter on her bread that she may have money to send for Dr. Barnardo's homes. The joy of heart far outdoes the sweet taste of the butter and sugar, and she has a consciousness that she is doing some good in the world. Look at that poor laundress, working till midnight, and always on the Sunday morning putting her contribution into the missionary box, feeling that the smile of God is upon her, although it is not often she knows the taste of meat. Very near her there is a lady who spends on her housekeeping $75 a week, and when the missionary sermon is preached she puts half a dollar on the plate, and thinks this is as much as can be expected of her for one year, while the poor woman, whose hard-earned income amounts to less than three dollars in the week, has given in the same space of time more than five dollars. The lady would say, "Well, there are so many claims." Let us put them all together, and probably we should find that the sum given for all these different charities did not amount to four times as much as the poor woman's donation. In the one instance $50 or $60 is given in the year out of an income of $3750; in the other $5 is given out of an income of $156. We fear this is no uncommon thing.

God has one rule in our days, not of law, but of grace. He does not bind us to a tenth, or a fifth, or one half, but says, "Every man according as he so let him give, not grudgingly or of necessity, for God loveth the cheerful giver." What then is the purpose of our hearts? "All for me and a fraction for the Lord, to satisfy my own conscience." Is this the purpose of heart? "I must have my comforts, I must have the same appearance as my friends, or what would they think of me? I must keep my carriage, it is expected of me; I must have receptions, and then how can I give more? My income barely suffices." Who insists on all this? "Oh, everybody does the same." And is the purpose of heart to honor the claim of everybody but God? And are you, poor slave of everybody's opinion, a child of God? Oh, be free, honor God's claim, He "is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work . . . being enriched in everything to all [simplicity, see margin] which causeth through us thanksgiving to God." Simplicity or singleness of eye makes everything easy.

If we know that we are the Lord's, and that all we have is His, then He disposes of it. We have no need to lash ourselves into a strain of self-denial on certain points, but just be willing, when God calls us, to make any change He wills. He may not require us to alter our establishments; but if He prefers a claim upon our hearts, and it requires that we should forego a carriage, or a servant, or a journey, or a new dress, or a day's holiday, then is the time to praise Him. He is giving us the opportunity to proclaim His ownership of us, by the joy with which we make the sacrifice.

"For the administration of this service not only supplieth the want of the saints, but is abundant also by many thanksgivings unto God." Thankofferings on the part of those who are blessed bring forth thanksgivings on the part of those by whom they were blessed. Some twenty-four years ago was opened in a small town in Worcestershire. There was no door; the roof was hung with cobwebs; the glass was out of the windows, and the only seats were planks loosely laid on a few blocks of wood. But several precious souls were there gathered to the Lord, and although no collection and no mention of money was made in the meetings, thankofferings flowed in. One came in the shape of a door, others in that of benches, others in panes for the windows, one in the cleaning and kalsomining of the roof, another in a little stove; many came in the way of coal, candles, etc.; and thus the administration of this service supplied the want of the saints, and was also abundant by many thanksgivings to God. One thing is very noticeable, that thankofferings come much more frequently from the poor than from the rich. They always excite prayer for the donors, however much they may be received from the hand of God. Wherever a company of believers enter into the Pentecostal spirit, there is liberality in giving. The thought no longer reigns, I must live up to my income; what have I over? but rather, as the Macedonian Christians who "first gave their own selves to the Lord and unto Paul and the Church" by the will of God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Report of the Wreck of the Steamer State of Florida has been confirmed, and turns out to have been a more terrible catastrophe than was originally feared. The steamer collided in mid-ocean on April 18th, shortly before midnight, with the English bark Pomena, and both ships went down immediately. Forty-four persons of all those who were on the steamer and on the bark were saved in the boats, and were picked up thirty-six hours later by the Norwegian ship Theresa. Twenty-four were transferred from the Theresa to the Louisa on April 24th, and these were again transferred on May 5th to the Titania, which brought them to Quebec. Twenty others are therefore still on the Norwegian ship. One hundred and twenty-three persons went down with the State of Florida. Most of the passengers and crew were asleep when the disaster occurred, and there was no time to awaken them. The bark struck the steamer amidships, making a gigantic hole through which the water poured, and in fifteen minutes the steamer settled and sank. Blame is attached to the captain of the steamer, as the Pomena's lights were seen half an hour before she struck; but as the captain was among those drowned the exact facts cannot be ascertained. The inhumanity of the captain of the City of Rome, who saw the signal of a shipwrecked crew on board the Theresa and offered no assistance, is severely condemned on both sides the Atlantic.

The Triumph of Red Republicanism in Paris is the interpretation French journals place on the elections held in that city last week. The anarchists polled over 175,000, which is 60,000 more than they polled in 1881. The present government is decisively defeated, and only the anarchists and the Orleanists have gained ground. The Communist journals are jubilant, and announce that "the grand struggle is at hand." The Gaulois says: "The elections demonstrate—first, that the Republic has sprung a bad leak and is waterlogged; second, that a royalist party exists in every sense of the word, and, third, that France will not go the monarchy unless via the Commune, toward which she is advancing with rapid strides. The anarchists know exactly what they want, and they want it sufficiently to risk their necks for it. But the republicans of other stripes have neither a programme, enthusiasm, nor fanaticism. In short, everything promises the return of the Commune."

Indignation against the British Government for its desertion of General Gordon appears to be spreading throughout all ranks of society. On May 8th Mr. Gladstone's appearance at a public meeting was the signal for an outburst of hisses and groans, which the London Times interprets as an expression of "the feeling of discontent which has gradually been gathering force since the nervelessness of the government's policy in Egypt became apparent and which has been increased by the treatment of General Gordon." At a meeting of the Church Missionary Society, held in Exeter Hall, London, on May 6th, Canon Hoare, in the course of a speech, remarked that the English people were ashamed that General Gordon had been left in Egypt without support and without means of defence; thereupon the audience, numbering three thousand people, rose and tumultuously cheered the speaker. The incident was considered one of unusual significance showing, as it does, the strong undercurrent of feeling among people from whom such demonstrations are least to be expected. There is, however, among Liberals a disposition to continue their support of Mr. Gladstone in his Egyptian policy. They contend that General Gordon was sent to the Soudan with the distinct understanding that his mission was a pacific one, in which troops would not be employed. General Gordon overestimated his influence, and in the new situation which has come about, the government is reluctant to abandon its determination not to interfere by force in the Soudan. Nevertheless the personal respect Englishmen feel for General Gordon impels them to insist on his being rescued, even at the cost of sacrificing the policy of the government.

Daly and Egan, the Accused Dynamiters, have been committed for trial. The evidence given at the preliminary examination leads to the expectation that they will be convicted. The documentary evidence discovered by the police is described as very damaging, and, combined with the papers and explosives found in Egan's garden, is sufficient to make a good case for the crown, independent of oral testimony. The police yet hope to connect both Daly and Egan with the explosion last February in Victoria Station, but it is evident that proof is lacking, as it is said that they might consent to use Egan as an informer against Daly in this matter. The impression that the two men are guilty parties is increased by the rumors of plots for their rescue, which would scarcely exist if the men were not important members of the conspiracy. When Daly was removed from Chester to Birmingham last week a suspicious circumstance occurred. His escort were astonished to find fifty Irishmen on the platform of the station at Chester. The men were disguised as laborers. Daly was handcuffed to two officers, and others, armed with revolvers, prevented any one from approaching him until the train departed. It was afterward stated that the seeming laborers were really Invincibles.

Mr. Judah P. Benjamin, the Distinguished lawyer who was Secretary of State in the government of the Southern Confederacy, died in Paris last week. He had practised at the English bar since the dissolution of the Confederate Government, and had risen to the front rank among English barristers. His popularity among English lawyers and barristers had no parallel. During the comparatively short space of time between 1866, when he went to England, and the present he won the confidence and respect of suitors, his brethren at the bar, and of the justiciary, and enjoyed a brilliant reputation for learning and eloquence. He also wrote works on intricate questions of English law, which are regarded as standard authorities. Mr. Benjamin was the son of English parents of the Jewish faith. He was born in St. Croix in 1811, and his parents removed in 1816 to Wilmington, N. C., where his father became naturalized. Mr. Benjamin married a non-Jewish lady, and did not afterward identify himself with the synagogue.

The Privations of a Princess would be an appropriate title for the life of the Princess Alice recently published, under the sanction of her mother, Queen Victoria. It appears from the disclosures made in the book that the married life of the Princess was anything but a happy one. They display in the most glaring way the pitiful daily pinching which Princess Alice was compelled to resort to to make ends meet in her Darmstadt palace; the pathetic appeals she was forced to make to tradesmen for unpaid bills; the keenness with which she felt the disgrace of her poverty when entertaining royal visitors, and, worst of all, the penuriousness of her husband in making it necessary for her to often mend her own clothes, and even to turn the garments of herself and children for new use when too threadbare on one side for further exhibition. The disclosures have excited much indignation in England, because the English people supplied the Princess with an income of $30,000 a year from the national treasury. The treatment she received in her German home was in startling contrast to the liberality the English nation showed toward Prince Albert and a crowd of German royal and princely paupers who followed him to England.

The Meetings Held by Messrs. Moody and Sankey in the London district of Hampstead were attended with unabated interest and increasing blessing. The large hall was generally crowded at the evangelistic addresses; the Bible readings proved attractive and interesting, and the special meetings which were held for women realized signal blessing. The hearty co-operation and goodwill evinced by clergymen and ministers of the surrounding districts was most gratifying. The mission at Hampstead closed on May 5th, and, as announced, the evangelists went to Croydon on the following day for a three weeks' campaign; then they will commence a series of services to continue three weeks on the Thames Embankment, near Blackfriars Bridge, which will terminate their missions in London.

The Epitaph of Charles Reade, the English novelist—whose death was recently announced—which will be placed on his tombstone by his own desire, is as follows: "Here lie the mortal remains of Charles Reade, his last words to mankind are on this stone. I hope for a resurrection, not from any power in nature, but from the will of the Lord God Omnipotent, who made nature and me. He created man out of nothing, which nature could not. He can restore man from the dust, which nature cannot. And I hope for holiness and happiness in a future life, not for anything I have said or done in this body, but from the merits and mediation of Jesus Christ. He has promised His intercession to all that seek it, and He will not break His word: that intercession, once granted, cannot be rejected: for He is God, and His merits infinite: a man's sins are but human and finite. 'Him that cometh to Me, I will in no wise cast out.' 'If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the Righteous and He is the propitiation for our sins.'"

The Ladies' Manual of Fancy Work is the title of a useful book issued at the low price of fifty cents. It contains over four hundred illustrations, and has ninety-two pages of descriptive matter with directions for the manufacture of the articles mentioned. Those articles though technically described as "fancy work," are many of them of a useful character. Tasteful patterns for lace-work, embroidery for cushions and slippers, knitting, tatting, crochet work, and net-work are among the illustrations, and directions for making carriage rugs, school-bags, purses, door-mats, and innumerable articles which may be ugly, but which it is much more pleasant to have pretty, are given in plain and simple language. The book in paper cover may be had, postage paid, by sending fifty cents to Mr. J. E. Jewett, 77 Bible House, New York.

"Thy Healer." A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter, whose expositions of the International Sunday school lessons are published every week in the journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Earthquake in England on April 22—Fall of Stones from the Spire of the Cong. Church, Colchester.

THE EARTHQUAKE IN ENGLAND.

The Centre of the Disturbance in Colchester—Premonitory Symptoms—Scenes of Terror—Fall of a Portion of a Church Spire—A Woman Nearly Killed—Mersea Wrecked—Langenhoe Church Destroyed—The Shock at Wyvenhoe and Other Places—The Effects in the Metropolis—The Future Earthquake.

IN our issue of May 1st we mentioned, under the head of "Foreign Topics," an earthquake which, on April 22d, passed through the South-eastern Counties of England, doing considerable damage. Reference was made to a large church in Colchester, Essex County, the spire of which was partially destroyed. This week we give a picture of the church and a few particulars of the convulsion, which is described more fully in the English journals now received, than in the brief cablegram sent at the time.

The earthquake, which was the most serious on record since 1580, occurred about 9.20 A. M. on Tuesday, April 22d. Colchester was the centre of the disturbance, which, however, was distinctly felt not only in most of the Eastern Counties, but also as far away as Woolwich, on the south side of the Thames. In every case the shocks were preceded by and, in some instances, by sudden gusts of wind. The earthquake wave passed from south to north, and the distinctly felt shocks lasted from two to three, and in some instances, apparently to thirty seconds.

From the evidence of credible witnesses in Colchester, where the effects of the disturbance were most widely felt, it appears that at twenty minutes past nine o'clock a sudden terrestrial movement was experienced, followed almost instantaneously by another of greater severity. In this short space of time an extraordinary amount of destruction was effected. Chimney stacks fell in all directions, many of them crushing through roofs into bedrooms, while some houses rocked, and the contents were dislodged, innumerable articles of furniture, ornaments, and machinery being broken by the shock.

In a moment a large part of the population of Colchester had rushed into the open air, the most

as for the time no one guessed the real cause of the disturbance. Women shrieked and fainted, and the cries of children intensified the temporary panic which prevailed. The first impression, and that was general, was that the shock was the effect of some gigantic explosion; and it was only as the panic gradually subsided that it was seen that it was due to a seismatic disturbance of a violent character, so much so that some twenty feet of

of the Congregational Church in Lion Walk was hurled to the ground, smashing and defacing the pinnacles and corbels of the tower in its descent. The huge fragments of stone separated as they fell, and were scattered around the base of the steeple, demolishing several large tombstones, and smashing the iron gates of the churchyard. Providentially none fell on the surrounding buildings, one block only falling out, smashing the window-sill of a neighboring house. The remaining portion of the spire is in a dangerous condition, and the masonry has been displaced almost down to the base. The tower seemed to be lifted bodily, and it now stands with a marked inclination northward, as if it might topple over.

In the lower part of the town in the Hythe scarcely a house escaped damage from falling chimney pots and stacks. Two great stacks fell through the roof of St. Leonard's Vicarage, Dr. Manning, the vicar, having a narrow escape; while in his church two of the candlesticks on the altar were overthrown, but the building itself escaped injury. Fires were caused in three parts of the town by burning coals being ejected from stoves, but in no case did they spread. Houses were moved bodily from their foundations. An auctioneer's house and shop was seen to move away, leaving a huge fissure several inches wide, which, however, immediately closed up, not without severely shaking and damaging the property. A house partially fell, and the gable walls of others fell out or subsided, and several tall factory chimneys of unstable construction were nearly demolished.

In the consternation ensuing upon the first alarm, Mrs. Doe, wife of a tradesman, rushed out of her house, and was by a falling brick (see frontispiece), sustaining such a fracture that she lies in a serious state.

The Colchester Gazette says: "Not within living memory has Colchester been thrown into such a state of excitement, consternation, and panic as it was soon after nine o'clock on Tuesday morning, when the town was visited by a fearful and most appalling earthquake, which will remain in the recollection of those who experienced it to their dying day. An amount of damage was done to property, which it will take weeks to set right, and in some cases the destruction is irreparable. Not a house in the borough escaped its mighty influence, clocks stopped, bells were set a ringing, furniture displaced, pictures dislodged from the walls, vases and ornaments overturned, and no end of damage of a more serious character was done in the space of a few seconds, and it is impossible to exaggerate the feeling of consternation that prevailed.

EVERY ONE RUSHED INTO THE STREET, which they instinctively thought to be the safest place, and certainly, if much property had fallen, the amount of life that must have been sacrificed is fearful to contemplate. Providentially, however, this was not the case, and although there are reported several cases of persons having been injured when they rushed into the streets by the falling débris, yet no person is known to have received any fatal injury.

"The scenes in the different parts of the town were most heartrending, women shrieking and rushing into the street in the most frantic manner, and strong men seemed helpless to console them, being themselves completely unnerved and paralyzed. No one seemed to have the heart to recommence work, which was almost entirely suspended, all rushing about the town to see what damage had been done.

"The rumor quickly circulated that the spire of the Lion Walk Congregational Church had fallen, and this was ascertained to be partly true. The spire was rent asunder, portions of the débris fell upon the roof, above the north aisle of the church, and crashed through, causing fragments of broken slates to rain in all directions. At first from fifteen to twenty feet of the steeple was toppled over, and then to the basement. Immediately a vast crowd of people congregated round the edifice, but as it looked as if some portion of the masonry would subsequently descend, they kept at a respectful distance, and shortly a police-constable arrived, and kept the space immediately below perfectly clear.

"Go where one would, the fearful result of the devastation met the eye, the ground being here and there strewn with heaps of the débris, the remains of a stack of chimneys, slates, and other things which had all met with a similar fate at the hands of the sweeping power."

The shock seems to have been felt in some of the parishes around Colchester even more severely than in the borough itself, and certainly more damage has been done. This is notably the case in Abberton, Langenhoe, Peldon, and West Mersea, where the inhabitants were greatly startled and alarmed, and very many are rendered practically homeless. The scene from Abberton to West Mersea—the adjoining parish of East Mersea seems to have somewhat escaped—is almost an indescribable one, on account of the ruin which has been wrought. There is scarcely a house or cottage to be seen that does not tell the same tale of damage done—chimneys down, houses unroofed, and in numerous cases buildings entirely destroyed or rendered temporarily untenantable, while there are several cases of personal injury, and not a few

MIRACULOUS ESCAPES FROM DEATH.

At Abberton, the new rectory in course of construction for the Rev. J. Pilditch was considerably injured—the walls and chimneys were either cracked or shifted, and it must cost considerable sum to make good the damage. Langenhoe parish church is completely wrecked and presents a most extraordinary appearance. The rector of the parish (the Rev. W. Parkinson) thus graphically describes what occurred. He said: "On Tuesday morning, at 9.20, we had a very violent shock of earthquake here. The room in which I was seemed lifted up. Several persons thrown to the ground. My chimneys are all shattered. They seem as if they were twisted. A chest of drawers was moved several inches (four at least) from the wall, bottles were thrown down in the cellar, and glass, etc., shaken from the shelves. The church suffered very much; the battlements fell from the tower on to the nave and smashed about half the roof, carrying away the gallery beneath; the chancel is entirely stripped; many other places in the neighborhood suffered, but I have only heard of one case of personal injury—at Peldon."

THE SHOCK AT WYVENHOE

was really terrific, and a great deal of damage was done. The Hall, the residence of Mr. Jackson, was very much shattered and made uninhabitable, in consequence of which Mr. Jackson had to remove his family and household to London. Colonel Bowen was also obliged to leave his residence, the "Nook," for a similar reason and come to Colchester to stay with some friends. The tower of the church has suffered very much, about fourteen feet of it having fallen. A large yacht, weighing 15 tons, was uplifted bodily from the place where it had been moored for the winter, and moved six inches, and a large chimney fell down on to a small yacht, of about three tons, and completely smashed it. All along the quay the houses were wrecked so far as their roofs are concerned, and there is scarcely a house in the whole village which has not suffered some damage.

INJURY IN OTHER PLACES.

At Layer Breton one side of the church sustained serious injury, and a couple of chimney stacks fell through the roof of the glebe house, the floors being upheaved and the crockery upset. The church at Salcot was damaged. The yacht-building yard of Mr. Wilkins sustained some damage. Mr. Wilkins states that he was standing on the ground, near the stern of a schooner yacht of 180 tons placed near the buildings, and well shored up. He says the vessel was lifted up and down bodily, and swayed from side to side. One of the after shores dropped down, and another was shifted from its place. Fortunately, although a considerable number of men were working in the yard, no one was hurt. Eye-witnesses on board the yachts in the river state there was little water disturbance, but the masts of vessels whipped sharply and quickly from side to side, mooring chains strained and vibrated, and the vessels, themselves,

BUMPED UP AND DOWN IN THE WATER.

Service was being held in St. Peter's Church, Sudbury, when the first shock was felt. The massive piers supporting the roof and the walls perceptibly shook, the flooring seemed to upheave, and the windows rattled. The congregation, which was small, rushed panic-stricken from the sacred edifice; but no one was injured.

At Dovercourt and Harwich the shock was distinctly felt. In the South End district two shocks were felt. At Sheerness, on the opposite shore of the estuary of the Thames, the shocks were very marked, and considerable damage resulted.

in the dockyard were shaken to their foundations, and immense excitement for a time prevailed in the town, as it was feared an explosion had occurred in the government powder magazines on the Medway. At Coggleshall several chimney stacks were thrown down, and other damage was done. At the National Schools the girls instantly rushed to the staircase, frantically endeavoring to get into the open air, and in the panic a number were thrown down, three of whom were somewhat severely injured. At Malden the window of the post-office was shaken out of its frame, and the telegraph instruments were visibly affected. The shock was also felt at Woolwich, Stroud, Westgate-on-Sea, Cambridge, Northampton, Bristol, and Birmingham.

THE EFFECTS IN THE METROPOLIS.

In the metropolis the shock was very distinctly felt, more especially along the Strand, where the time of the alarming undulation was accurately fixed by the stoppage of a clock in Messrs. W. H. Smith & Son's establishment at 9.20.

One tradesman states that his attention was first arrested by a crackling sound, then came a violent shock, during which every article in the room shook. In a printing-office on the Strand every one rushed into the street, thinking the building was about to fall; a reader, in the same place, said the roof seemed to be about to fall in, while the floor oscillated under him. A surveyor had to examine and certify the safety of the building before the men could be induced to return to work. Several similar experiences are recorded.

Telegraphic instruments were everywhere affected, furniture was much shaken, bells were violently rung, and gasaliers swayed to and fro in the most alarming manner. So dreadful did the rocking of the walls seem to the employés in one large establishment in the Strand, that they rushed into the street, hesitating to return for some time. All over the Houses of Parliament the effect of the earthquake was fully experienced. Several officials were in the library of the House of Commons at the moment, and the impression was that several very heavy vehicles were passing over Westminster Bridge. There were violent tremors and a rumbling noise. It appears that for some time repairs have been in process of execution in the Victoria Tower, which stands at the extreme end of the House of Lords. In one of the four pinnacles of the tower six workmen were engaged. These men were engaged busily at their work some little distance apart, when they were all greatly alarmed at the sudden undulatory motion. They collected together in amazement, and another shock coming on, they instantly withdrew from the pinnacle to the roof of the tower, near the flag staff. Here they felt the tower still vibrate, and they immediately reported the matter, attributing the shaking of the tower to the wind.

There is no difficulty in mapping out the area affected by the convulsion. It was not felt to the east of the North Sea, nor, so far as yet appears, by vessels on the eastern coast of England, while the extreme western limit seems to have been near Leicester, and it was felt but slightly south of the Thames. In severity, as measured by the destruction caused at Colchester and the neighborhood, it has, undoubtedly, surpassed any English earthquake of modern times.

PREVIOUS EARTHQUAKES.

Though earthquake shocks have neither been very numerous nor very fatal in England, that country has not enjoyed complete immunity from them, there being about 255 instances recorded in history. As early as the year 974 there is a note of such an occurrence, and in 1101 William of Malmesbury tells us that all England was terrified "with a horrid spectacle, for the buildings were lifted up and then again settled as before." Thirty-two years later many houses were overthrown and flames issued from rifts in the earth, and in 1185, according to Holinshed, there "chanced a sore Earthquake throughout all parts of this land, such a one as the like had not been heard of in England since the beginning of the world, for stones that lay couched fast in the earth were removed out of their places, houses were overthrown, and the great church of Lincoln rent from the top downward." On September 12th, 1275, St. Michael's Church, in Glastonbury, was destroyed by an earthquake, and in 1361, in the "Metrical Chronicle" of John Harding, we read that a similar visitation "greatly gan the people all affraye, so dreadful was it and perilous."

Indeed, there is scarcely a decade during which one of these shocks did not terrify the nation, some so severely that Queen Elizabeth caused a special form of "Earthquake prayer" to be issued. It is even affirmed, though the statement lacks confirmation, that in the fifteenth century Lyme Regis was nearly destroyed, and it is certain that London escaped no better than the rest of the Kingdom. On Easter Monday, 1580, the great bell at Westminster and the bells of the various churches were set jangling, the people rushed out of the theatres in consternation, and the Templars, leaving their supper, ran out of the Hall with their knives in their hands. Part of the Temple Church was cast down, some stones fell from St. Paul's, and two apprentices were killed at Christ Church. On September 8th, 1692, the merchants were driven from 'Change, and the streets were filled with a panic-stricken crowd of swooning or wondering people. In 1750, as the readers of Horace Walpole's gossip will remember, there were so many shocks that White's was kept busy betting on the events, Grub Street inditing pamphlets regarding them, and quacks selling "pills good against the Earthquake." A crazy Life Guardsman having predicted a disastrous one on April 8th, 1750, thousands of all ranks passed the night in Hyde Park. "Earthquake gowns"—that is, warm robes to wear while sitting out of doors—being in great request with the women, who whiled away the time with the aid of cards and candles.

THE FUTURE EARTHQUAKE.

These appalling convulsions, which science is unable to explain, though various theories contradictory to each other have been advanced, will grow more violent—as the student of prophecy knows—as the end of this dispensation approaches. "Earthquakes in divers places" was a sign mentioned by Christ as an indication of the nearness of His coming. And in the Apocalypse we are told that when the seventh and last vial is poured out—and we are now living on the threshold of that event—there will be "a great earthquake such as never was since men were upon the earth, so mighty an earthquake and so great, and the cities of the nations shall fall." While men scoff and even Christians say, "Where is the promise of His coming? for from the day that the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation," yet the hour will come in which every word spoken in prophecy will be fulfilled. Happy are they whom that day will find watching!

DAVID'S SLEEP EXPERIENCE.

By Rev. Charles F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.

IN the third Psalm there is a verse which, however superficially read, it is pleasant to hear: "I laid me down and slept. I waked, for the Lord sustained me."

It is very easy for a Christian in ordinary circumstances to make that statement. Indeed, any man who believes in the superintending providence of the good God might say those words; but they have a peculiar significance as uttered by David, in his circumstances. It is to be remembered that the Psalm was composed when he was fleeing from Absalom, his son. His enemies were multiplying. His friends appeared to be failing. There were many who said of his soul: "No help for him in God." But David trusted in God, and prayed to the Lord, and felt sure that Jehovah heard him from His holy hill of Zion. To show the effect of this faith upon his mental and physical condition, he uses three words which are very striking under the circumstances.

He says first: "I laid me down." The word used here in the original denotes preparation and peace. He did not tumble down upon his couch, but he regularly prepared himself for bed, and quietly laid down to sleep as one does whose business has been completely finished, and who has no anxiety about the morning.

His second word is: "I slept." It does not imply a mere catching of such sleep as a soldier may obtain through the night-watches after a toilsome day; a slumber made tortuous by his thoughts and broken by his anxiety. It was sleep, God's gift of balm. It was not the heavy slumber of one who has cast himself into sleep as one might spring into a well till those who hunted him had passed by. This is indicated by what follows.

His third word is: "I waked." It does not signify a starting out of sleep as when one is frightened. It shows that he was not overwhelmed in a deep slumber. He went to bed at his regular hour. He took his natural, healthy sleep, and when that was finished he naturally awoke. The Lord had sustained him.

This is a more beautiful and touching picture of the triumph of faith than we sometimes see in its more heroic aspects. When a man is engaged in action, pushing things about him and making things fly, even when surrounded by enemies, the very exertion increases his faith; but when surrounded by hostile forces that are constantly increasing, a man has such trust in the Lord that his sleep is not invaded, when he can lie down in quiet like a baby in its mother's lap, and fall asleep in the arms of God, this is a triumph of faith that is beautiful indeed.

What is there more valuable for life than that which brings healthy, natural sleep. Our activities are good only as they bring about that state of fatigue which makes sleep sure and sweet. It is a triumph of faith that it can accomplish this. In times of peace many a man is so beset by the cares of business that unless he secures for himself a sufficiency of good and natural sleep, he cannot keep his health and sustain himself in his work. Merchants, mechanics, lawyers, physicians, men of all professions and occupations in this busy life, must sleep or be unfitted for their work. Better than all narcotics is simple trust in the sustaining, gracious providence of the good God. In view of this, a study of David's sleep experience will be profitable.

Temperance Work in Great Britain was Described in the course of a speech in New York last week by Mr. Thomas Barker, a noted English temperance advocate. He said: "We have been busy in England during the last thirty years extending temperance work. Our plans have been modelled largely after those in the United States, and we have had valuable aid from the leading temperance men in this country, such as Mr. Gough and the late Mr. Dodge. I do not suppose we have made the same proggress you have here, but we have done a good deal. Our counties have not the privilege of self-government as in the States, or we should to-day have local option in Scotland, Wales, and the northern counties of England. So much we have done. Sir Wilfrid Lawson, president of the Alliance, obtained for local option a majority in the House of Commons, and Mr. Gladstone has pledged himself that a bill shall be brought into the House dealing with the whole question. Formerly the members paid no attention to us, but now many are with us. Sir Wilfrid Lawson contributes $5000 a year to temperance work and many others contribute sums regularly from $500 to $2500. The expenditure in Great Britain for intoxicating liquors has averaged during the last twelve years six hundred and eighty million dollars a year; this is a decrease from the period preceding, a reduction partly due to the work of the United Kingdom Alliance."

IF true so many years B.C., how much more true so many years A.D. We so often see books we have no appreciation of what a book is. Stand it on end. Measure the height of it, the depth of it, the length of it, the breadth of it. You cannot. Examine the paper of the book and see what

from the time when impression was made upon clay, and then upon the bark of trees, and then upon papyrus, and then upon the hides of wild animals, on and on until we have the miracles of our modern paper manufactory. Examine the type of it, and think of the advance made from the time when Solon's laws were written on oaks, plank oaks, and the poems of Hesiod were written on tables of lead, and the time when the Sinaitic commandments were written on tables of stone, on down to Hoe's perfecting printing press. A book! it took all civilizations, all martyr fires, all battles, all victories, all defeats, all glooms, all brightnesses, all centuries to make one book possible. A book is it is the drawing-room in which kings and queens and philosophers and poets and orators and rhetoricians come forth to meet. If I burned incense to any idol I would build an altar before a book. Thank God for books—good books, healthful books, instructive books, historical books, poetic books, books of men, books of women, Book of God—"of making many books there is no end."

The printing press is the mightiest agency for good or evil. A minister of the Gospel occupies an important position, but not one so responsible as that of the editor and publisher. Take the one fact that from the daily press of New York there go forth four hundred and fifty thousand copies a day, and that three of the weeklies have an aggregate circulation of one million two hundred thousand, and then cipher, if you can, how far up, and how far down, and how far out reach the influences of the American printing press.

I have an idea that it is to be the chief agency for the rescue and evangelization of the world, and that the last great battle will not be fought with guns and swords, but with types and presses; a gospelized printing press triumphing over and trampling under foot and crushing out a

PERNICIOUS LITERATURE.

The greatest blessing that has come to this world since Jesus Christ came is good journalism, and the worst scourge unclean journalism. You must apply the same law to the book and the newspaper. The newspaper is a book swifter and in more portable shape. Under unclean literature, under pernicious books and newspapers, tens of thousands have gone down; the bodies of the victims in the penitentiaries, in the dens of shame, and some of the souls in the asylums for the imbecile and the insane, more of the souls already having gone down in an avalanche of horror and despair. The London plague is nothing to it. That counted its victims by the thousands; this modern pest shovels its millions into the charnel-house of the morally dead. The longest train of cars that ever rolled over the Erie track, or the Hudson, is not long enough, or large enough, to hold the beastliness and the putrefaction which has been gathered up in the bad books and newspapers of America for the last twenty years.

Now, there is no more absorbing question to-day for every man and every patriot than this question: Is there anything we can do to stem this awful torrent of pernicious literature? Are we to make our minds the receptacle for all that bad people choose to write? Are we to stoop down and drink out of the trough which wickedness has filled? Are we to mire in iniquity, or to chase will-o'-the-wisps across swamps of death, when God invites us into the blooming gardens of His love? Is there anything you can do? Yes. Is there anything that I can do to help stem this mighty torrent of pernicious literature? Yes.

The first thing for us all to do is to keep ourselves and our families aloof from iniquitous books and newspapers. Standing as we do, chin deep in fictitious literature, the question is every day asked:

IS IT RIGHT TO READ NOVELS?

Well, I have to say that there are good novels, honest novels, Christian novels, useful novels, novels that make the heart purer and the life better. The world can never pay its debt of obligation to Hawthorne and Landor and Hunt and Mackenzie and scores of others who in times past have written healthful novels. The follies of the world were never better excoriated than in the books of Miss Edgeworth. The memories of the past were never better embalmed than in the writings of Walter Scott. No healthier books have been written than those by Fenimore Cooper, his novels full of the breath of the seaweed and the air of the American forests. Kingsley did a grand work in his books in smiting morbidity and giving us the poetry of strong muscles and good health and fresh air. Thackeray accomplished a good work when he caricatured pretenders to gentility and high blood. The writings of Charles Dickens are an everlasting protest against injustice and a plea for the poor.

These books, read in the right time and read in the right proportion with other books, are healthful and beneficial. But I declare to you to-day that I believe three fourths of the novels of the time are pernicious and baleful to the last extent. The whole land is flooded with the iniquity. Some of these come forth from respectable printing presses. Some of them are actually commended by religious journals. You find them in the desk of the school miss, you find them in the trunk of the young man on his journey, you find them in the steamboat cabin, you find them in the hotel reception room. Everywhere, everywhere, a pernicious literature. You see a light late at night in your child's room. You go in and say, "What are you doing?" "Reading." "What are you reading?" "A book." You take the book and look at it, and you find it is a pernicious book. You say, "Where did you get it?" "Borrowed it." Thousands of people buy pernicious literature and are generous enough to let others also be blasted.

Now, I gather to-day all the novels, good and bad; all the histories, false and true; all the romances, beautiful and hideous; all the epilogues, commentaries, catalogues; family, city, state, national libraries, and I heave them into one great pyramid, and I bring to bear upon them some grand and glorious and infallible Christian principles, so that if you ask me to-day, Is there anything we can do to stem this tide? I say, Yes, very much, every way.

First, we will stand aloof from all books that give

FALSE PICTURES OF HUMAN LIFE.

Life is neither a tragedy nor a farce. Men are not all either knaves or heroes. Women are neither angels nor furies. Judging, however, from much of the literature of this day, we would come to the idea that life is a fitful, fantastic, and extravagant thing, instead of a practical and useful thing. After these people have been reading late at night romances which glorify iniquity and present knavery in most attractive form, how poorly prepared are they for the work of life. That man who is an indiscriminate novel reader is unfit for the duties of the store, the shop, the factory. He will be looking for his heroine in the tin shop, in the grocery store, in the banking house, and will not find her.

Those women who are indiscriminate readers of novels are unfit for the duties of wife, mother, sister, daughter—the duties of home life, the duties of a Christian life. There she sits at midnight, hands trembling, looking aghast, bursting into tears at midnight over the woes of some imaginary unfortunate. When the morrow comes she will sit by the hour gazing at nothing and biting her nails into the quick. The carpet that was plain enough before will be plainer now that she has walked through tessellated halls, and the industrious companion will be more unattractive now that she has lounged in the king's park with a polished desperado. Oh, these confirmed readers of novels! they are unfit for the duties of this life, which is a tremendous discipline, and they are unfit for the work of a world where all we gain is achieved by hard, continuous, and exhaustive work.

EVIL AND GOOD MIXED.

We will also help to stem this tide of pernicious literature by standing aloof, we and our families, from books which have some good, but a large admixture of evil. You have read books that had in them the good and the bad. Which stuck? The bad! There are minds like sieves, which let the small particles of gold fall through and keep the large cinders, while there are intellects like loadstones plunged into filings of steel and brass, that will keep the steel and repel the brass. But it is generally just the opposite. You plunge through a hedge of burrs to get one blackberry, and you will get more burrs than blackberries. I do not care how good you are, you cannot afford to read a bad book.

You say, "The influence is insignificant." Ah! the scratch of a pin may produce the lockjaw. You out of curiosity plunge into a bad book, and you have the curiosity of a man who takes a torch into a gunpowder mill to see whether or not it will blow up.

If you want to help stem the tide of pernicious literature, you and your families must stand back from books whch corrupt the imagination. I refer now not to that literature which the villain has under his coat, waiting for the school to come out, then looking up and down the street for the police, and then offering the book to your boy on his way home. I refer not to that; but to a polished literature, which comes forth with a cute plot sounding the tocsin that arouses all the bad passions of our soul.

Years ago there came forth a French authoress under the assumed name of George Sand. She smoked cigars, she wore masculine apparel. She wrote with a style ardent, eloquent, graphic in its pictures, horrible in its suggestions, damnable in its results, and sending forth into the libraries and the homes of the world an influence which has not yet relaxed; and I want to tell you that all the

we have got from Paris in the last five or ten years are only copies of that woman's iniquity. These books are sold by Christian booksellers. Under the nostrils of your cities there is to-day a fetid, reeking, unwashed literature enough to poison all the fountains of virtue and smite your sons and daughters as with the wings of a destroying angel, and it is high time that the ministers of religion and all reformers banded together and marshalled an army of righteousness all armed to the teeth to fight back this moral calamity.

What do you make out of the fact that fifty per cent—more than fifty per cent—of the criminals in the jails and penitentiaries of this country are under twenty-one years of age; many of them under eighteen, many under sixteen, many under fifteen. You go along the corridors of the prisons, and you will find that nine out of ten came there from reading bad books or newspapers. The men will tell you so; the women will tell you so. Is not that a fact worthy the consideration of those whose families are dear to them?

"Oh!" you say, "I am a business man, and can't be looking after the literature of my household; I can't be examining books and newspapers; they will have to look after themselves." Suppose your child was threatened with typhoid fever, would you have time to go for a doctor? would you have time to watch the progress of the disease? would you have time to attend the funeral? In the name of God, I warn some of you that your children are threatened with moral and spiritual typhoid, and if the evil be unarrested there will be the funeral of the body, and the funeral of the mind, and the funeral of the soul—three funerals in one day.

If you want to help stem this tide, keep aloof, you and your families, from all books that are

APOLOGETIC FOR CRIME.

Some of the most fascinating book-binding in our time is thrown around sin. Vice is horrible anyhow. It is born in shame, and it dies howling in the darkness. It whips one through this life with a scourge of scorpions, and after that God's thunders of wrath pursue it over boundless deserts. If you want to paint carnality, do not represent it as looking out from embroidered curtains, or from the window of a royal seraglio. Paint it as writhing in the horrors of a city hospital.

Cursed are the books which make impurity decent and crime honorable and hypocrisy noble. Ye authors who write them, ye publishers who print them, ye booksellers who distribute them shall be cut to pieces, if not by an aroused public sentiment, then by Almighty God, who will sweep you to the lowest pit of perdition, ye murderers of souls. You may escape in this world; in the next the heel of calamity will grind you, and you will be fastened to the rock, and vultures of despair will claw at your soul, and those whom you have destroyed will come and torment you, pouring hotter coals into your suffering, eternally rejoicing at the outcry of your pain and the howling of your damnation. "God shall wound the hairy scalp of him that goeth on in his trespasses."

There she sits at midnight, bending over

THE EVIL ROMANCE.

The tears are started. The color dashes to the cheek, and then it fades. The hands tremble as though a guardian angel were trying to shake the deadly book from her grasp. Then there is a rush of hot tears. The perspiration on her brow is the spray dashed up from the river of death. She laughs with a laugh that dies at its own sound. Soon in a madhouse she will mistake the ringlets for crawling serpents, and thrust her white hand through the bars of the incarceration, and then beat her head and push it as though she would push the scalp from the skull, crying, "My brain, my brain!" Oh, stand off from such infernal literature! Why go sounding among the reefs and among the warning buoys when there is such a vast ocean of good literature, good books, and good newspapers?—an ocean on which you may voyage all sail set.

I must in this connection call to your mind the

of our time. For good pictures I have great admiration. An artist with one flash will do that which an author can accomplish in four hundred pages. Fine paintings are the aristocracy of art. Engravings are the democracy of art. A good picture on one side of a pictorial will sometimes do just as much good as a book of four or five hundred pages. Multiply these pictures. Put them in your household. If there are any sick, put them upon the couch. Put these pictorials on your walls. Gather them in portfolios and albums. God speed the good pictures on their errands of knowledge and mercy. It is a mighty agency for God and the truth, a good picture.

But you know our cities are to-day cursed with evil pictorials. These death-warrants are on every street. A young man purchases perhaps one copy, and he purchases with it his eternal discomfiture. That one bad picture poisons one soul, that soul poisons fifty souls, the fifty despoil a hundred, the hundred a thousand, the thousand a million, and the million other millions until it will take the measuring line of eternity to tell the height, and the depth, and the ghastliness of the great undoing. A young man buys one copy, and he unrolls it amid roaring companions; but long after that paper is gone the evil will be seen in the blasted imaginations of those who looked at it. Every night the Queen of Death holds a banquet, and these evil pictorials are the printed invitations to the guests.

Alas! that the fair brow of American art should be blotched with that plague spot. Oh, young man—and how many young men come here Sabbath mornings and evenings to hear me preach, and I talk to them as a brother talks to a brother—oh, young man, buy none of that moral strychnine, do not pick up a nest of coiled adders for your pocket. Your heart will be more pure than your eye. A man is never better than the pictures he loves to look at. Show me what style of pictures a man buys and I will tell you his character. Out of a thousand times I will not make one failure in judgment. When Satan fails to get a man to read a bad book he sometimes captures him by getting him to look at a bad picture. When Satan goes a-fishing he does not care whether it is a long line or a short line, if he only hauls in his victim.

Oh, if in answer to this stupendous question of the day, a question which so many answer in the negative because they are in despairful mood, "Is there anything to be done to stem this awful tide of pernicious literature?" if I have shown you that there is something for us to do, I shall have done a work that I will not be ashamed of in that day which shall try every man's work of what sort it is. Oh, remember that one column of good reading may save a soul, that one column of bad reading may destroy a soul.

Benjamin Franklin said that the reading of Cotton Mather's "Essay to Do Good" moulded his entire life. The assassin of Lord Russell said he entered crime through an evil romance. John Angell James, than whom England never produced a better man, or the Church of God honors a more consistent Christian, declared in his old days that he had never got over once having for fifteen minutes read a bad book. Ah! the power of a bad book. And then the power of a good book.

Years ago a clergyman passing along through the West stopped at a hotel and saw a woman copying from a book. He found the book was Doddridge's "Rise and Progress." This woman had been pleased with the book which she had borrowed, and was copying a passage that impressed her very much. The clergyman happened to have a copy of Doddridge's "Rise and Progress" in his valise, and gave it to her. Thirty years passed along and that clergyman came to the same hotel and was inquiring about the family that had lived there thirty years before, and was pointed to a house near by. He went there and said to the woman, "Do you remember seeing me before?" She said, "I don't remember ever to have seen you before." "Don't you remember thirty years ago a man giving you a copy of Doddridge's 'Rise and Progress'?" "Oh, yes, I remember that; that saved my soul, that book. I loaned it to my neighbors, and they read it, and they all came into the kingdom, and we had a great revival. Do you see the spire of a church out yonder? That church was built as a consequence of that book." Oh, the power of a good book! Oh, the power of a bad book!

I had one book in my library of which I have never thought with any comfort. It was an infidel book, which I bought for the purpose of finding out the arguments against Christianity. A gentleman in my library one day said, "Can I borrow that book?" I said, "Certainly." That book came back with some passages marked as having especially impressed him, and when I heard that he had gone down in a shipwreck off Cape Hatteras I asked myself the question, "I wonder if anything he saw in that book which he borrowed from me could have affected his eternal destiny?"

Oh, go home to-day and

and after you have got through your libraries, examine the stand where the pictorials and newspapers are, and if you find anything there that cannot stand the test of the judgment day, do not give it to others—that would despoil them; do not sell it—that would be getting the price of blood; but kindle a fire on your kitchen hearth or in your back yard, and put the poison in and keep stirring the blaze until everything has gone to ashes from preface to appendix.

And crowd your minds with good books, and there will be no room for the bad. When Thomas Chalmers was riding beside a stage-driver and the horses were going beautifully, the stage-driver drew his long lash and struck the ear of the leader. It seemed to Thomas Chalmers a great cruelty, and he said, "Why did you strike that horse; he is going splendidly." "Ah!" said the stage-driver, "do you see that frightful object along the road? I never in the world would have got that horse along there if I hadn't given him something else to think of!" Thomas Chalmers went home and wrote his immortal sermon, "The Expulsive Power of a New Affection."

And while you have looked after yourselves and looked after your families, I want you to join this great army enlisted against pernicious literature. We are going to triumph. I feel to the tips of my fingers and in the depths of my soul the assurance that righteousness is going to triumph over all iniquity. If God be with us, who, who can be against us? Lady Hester Stanhope was the daughter of the third Earl Stanhope, and when her relatives were all dead she went to the far East and took possession of a deserted convent. Then she threw up fortresses amid the mountains of Lebanon, and invited to her castle all the poor and the wretched and the forsaken and the forgotten. Her house, her castle was a rest for all the weary.

She was a devoted Christian woman and expected that the Lord Jesus Christ would come again in person and reign in this world, and she was so entranced with the thought that Christ would come again that it was too much for her brain. She had in her magnificent stables two horses, which she kept all the time groomed and bridled and saddled and caparisoned, so that when the Lord should come He might take one horse and she the other, and they could speed away to Jerusalem, the city of the Great King. Of course it was a fanaticism and a delusion, but there was great beauty in the dream even.

Oh, my friends, we need no earthly palfreys groomed and bridled and saddled and caparisoned for our Lord when He comes to put down iniquity. The horse is already in the Heavenly equerry, and the imperial rider is about to mount. "And I saw, and behold a white horse: and He that sat on him had a bow, and a crown was given unto Him: and He went forth conquering and to conquer. Horsemen of Heaven, mount! Cavalrymen of God, ride on! Charge, charge! until they shall be hurled back, the black horse of famine, the red horse of carnage, the pale horse of death. Jesus forever!

WHY THE SECOND ADVENT MUST PRECEDE THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. John T. Duffield, D.D.,

Professor of Mathematics in Princeton College.*

The Question at Issue—Agreement as to Future Events—Divergence as to their Order—The Second Advent Must Precede the Millennium—1. The Opposite Doctrine not Prominent in the New Testament—Not in the Gospels—Nor the Acts—2. The Positive Teaching—Injunctions Inappropriate for the Millennium—3. The Advent Represented as Imminent—4. The Priority of the Millennium Inconsistent with Christ's Injunctions—5. With Specific Teaching—6. The Expectation of the Apostolic Church—7. And of the Early Church—8. The Common Doctrine a Novel One.

THE Scriptures unquestionably teach that the Lord Jesus, once on this earth in an estate of humiliation, shall return again "in His glory," and "the glory of the Father, with His holy angels." The Scriptures also contain many predictions yet unfulfilled, of an era of universal righteousness and peace on earth, when there shall be "given to the Son of Man dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people and nations and languages should serve Him."

The question at issue between Pre-Millenarians and their brethren is as to the order in which these two predicted events shall occur. Will the universal reign of righteousness and peace on earth—from Rev. 20 : 3, commonly called "the Millennium"—precede the Advent; or is this Messianic Kingdom of prophecy to be manifested at, and not before, "the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour, Jesus Christ?"

While there are some predicted events, yet future, in regard to which a difference of opinion as to the order of their occurrence is a matter of little or no practical moment, the question as to the order of occurrence of the two events just mentioned is one of the highest importance, affecting as it does the meaning and practical influence of much of the Saviour's instruction.

THE ORDER OF OCCURRENCE of the two events mentioned effects, further, the meaning and practical influence of a doctrine urged by the inspired apostles more frequently and prominently than any other, as an incentive to holy living and fidelity in Christ's service.

In presenting a summary of the argument in defence of Pre-Millenarianism, permit me to do it in the form of a reply to the question—Will the predicted Millennial era of universal righteousness and peace on earth precede the Advent?

In reply to the question proposed, we remark:

1. If the Millennial era is to occur during the present Dispensation, we should expect to find the Doctrine prominent in the New Testament.

Had the Saviour intended the Church to expect the Millennium during the present Dispensation, is it credible that He would have omitted—as He has omitted—any intimation of it, in His extended discourse on Eschatology, uttered for the very purpose of instructing the disciples as to the state of the Church, and of the world, during the entire period of the present Dispensation? He does predict "wars and rumors of wars, famines and pestilences and earthquakes;" He does forewarn the disciples of the opposition of the world to themselves and their message. He foretells corruption in the Church, that "iniquity shall abound," that "the love of many shall wax cold," that only they who "shall endure unto the end shall be saved," adding: "and this Gospel of the Kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come," but not one word respecting the Millennium. Had he intended the Church to believe what is now the prevailing belief on this subject, is not this omission wholly inexplicable?

Is it credible that the Apostles held the doctrine which now prevails in the Church, and yet in all their preaching and their writings should make no allusion to it? If this doctrine be, as many allege, of paramount importance, as an incentive to missionary effort now, was it less so in apostolic days, when the Church was just entering on the fulfilment of her great commission, and the work of missions was the one work above all others to which her energies were to be specially directed? As the Apostles spoke and wrote under the influence of the promised Spirit, of whom the Saviour said: "He shall teach you all things and bring to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you," is not their silence conclusive, not only that they were not taught the doctrine directly by the Spirit, but, also, that they did not understand it to be taught by the Parable of the grain of mustard seed, or the Parable of the leaven or the terms of their Commission, or by any other utterance of the blessed Saviour?

2. This negative argument, which of itself would seem to be decisive as to the point at issue, is confirmed by the distinct and abundant positive teaching of the New Testament, respecting the present Dispensation.

Until we come to the closing chapters of the Apocalypse, the Church is uniformly represented as the Church militant—not the Church triumphant. The antagonism of the Church and the world, the elect and the great mass of mankind, is asserted or assumed on every page. The Gospel was, indeed, to be preached among all nations—not with the assurance or intimation that the world would thereby be converted, but "for a witness unto all nations" (Matt. 24 : 14).

To illustrate and enforce this very truth,

THREE NOTABLE PARABLES

were uttered by the Saviour, and to emphasize their importance and prevent the possibility of misapprehension as to their meaning, their interpretation was given to the disciples and recorded in minute detail for the instruction of the Church throughout the New Testament dispensation. Only a portion of the seed of Gospel truth falls "on good ground"—the rest on "the wayside," "on stony places," and "among thorns." The visible Church is as "a net cast into the sea," it may inclose "a great multitude of fishes," but not all; and of those that are gathered in there are "bad," as well as "good." There are tares among the wheat—"the children of the wicked one" among "the children of the Kingdom"—both are "to grow together until the harvest," and "the harvest is the end of the world." "We see not yet all things put under Christ." It is "the world to come" that is to be in subjection to Him. Now, the Christian life is a warfare, and the world and Satan, as well as the flesh, are enemies. We are exhorted to "clothe ourselves in the armor of God, that we may be able to withstand the wiles of the devil." Is there any intimation in God's Word that at any period of the present dispensation this and similar representations with which the New Testament abounds are to become obsolete? And yet, will not this be so, if for a thousand years before the Advent, Satan is to be "bound and cast into the bottomless pit, that he go not forth to deceive the nations?"

In the second Epistle to the Thessalonians, 2d chapter, Paul foretells what would occur before the Advent, and he mentions, not the Millennium, but an apostasy. "That day shall not come except there be a falling away first, and the man of sin be revealed;" and as if to exclude the idea of the Millennium intervening, he adds: "Whom the Lord shall destroy with the brightness of His coming."

These references to the positive teaching of the New Testament respecting the present dispensation might be extended indefinitely. But it is needless. If the question at issue is to be determined by the authority of God's word, do not the passages above referred to furnish a demonstration of the Pre-Millenarian faith, which cannot be successfully gainsaid or resisted?

3. While the New Testament makes no allusion to a universal reign of righteousness before the Advent, the Advent itself is repeatedly, prominently referred to, and as the great object of the Christian's desire and expectation.

As Christ's "appearing and His Kingdom" are in the New Testament conjoined, He has made the desire for His "appearing" part of the first petition of our daily prayer. That His followers might have it ever in view, He reminds them of it in every administration of that Holy Sacrament in which we "do show the Lord's death until He comes." "Paul in all his Epistles speaketh of these things" (II Peter 3 : 16). Peter speaks of it again and again in his first Epistle, and then makes it the one theme of a second Epistle. James and John, and even Jude in his brief Epistle, holds it prominently forth. The Apocalypse opens with the announcement, "Behold He Cometh;" and closes with the declaration of Christ Himself, "Surely I come quickly," and the responsive prayer of the beloved disciple, the last utterance of the breath of inspiration, "Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

It should be observed that the point of these inspired exhortations, and of other similar passages that might be quoted, is not the mere fact or certainty of the Advent, but its possible nearness, that for aught that was revealed, it might occur in their day.

Now, is this the language of men who believed that a millennium was to intervene before the Advent? Had such been their faith, could they have uttered such exhortations? Pre-millenarians express their distinctive faith in the very language of the inspired Apostles. Could they do so if the inspired Apostles were not pre-millenarians?

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Stolen Barrel of Apples.—At a Recent meeting the Rev. Mr. Riddell related: "I saw at the Lord's Table to-day a man who told me that he never realized he was a lost, ruined sinner till one day he stole a barrel of apples, and was in the act of carrying it away on his shoulder, when his conscience cried out upon him, and made him restore the apples to their true owner. The devil had taken a step too far with this man; the heinous nature of the sin opened his eyes, and made him cry to God for pardon. God was merciful, and for His dear Son's sake gave him peace, and lifted him from the position of a thief to be a child of the Almighty."

A Woman's Reply to an Evangelist.—Mr. Lowe related: "An evangelist in an inquiry meeting asked a woman, 'Are you resting in Jesus?' Very indignantly she replied, 'It is nothing to you whether I am or not; besides, I would not speak about such a subject to any one but God!' In about a fortnight the evangelist was in another inquiry meeting, and saw this same person speaking very earnestly to another woman. Drawing near to them, he heard her telling the stranger about her own conversion to Christ, and pressing the woman to follow Jesus at once. Much gratified, the evangelist, thinking to test her, said, 'Madam, madam, keep your mouth shut on that subject!' 'Keep my mouth shut!' she replied with enthusiasm, 'I cannot do it, sir; I must speak about Jesus.'"

Three Visits to a Vinery.—The Rev. Mr. Ross said: "A gentleman entered a vinery one day while the gardener was pruning a magnificent vine. It seemed to be bleeding at every cut, and the visitor was grieved at what he thought the cruel recklessness of the gardener. He said, 'Ah, gardener, that is a magnificent vine!' 'Yes, sir, it is a fine vine.' 'Then why are you so recklessly cruel with it?' 'Come back later on and you will see,' was the man's reply. The gentleman returned some months later, and saw fine branches and well-formed leaves. Turning to the gardener, he said, 'I thought when I saw you pruning that vine that you had ruined it; but look at that thick trunk, those spreading branches, and beautiful leaves. You have obtained your desire.' 'No, sir,' he answered, 'I have not; its chief glory is yet to come.' 'What is its chief glory?' inquired the visitor. 'Come back in September, and I will show you.' The gentleman returned in September, and beheld great clusters of luscious fruit hanging from the branches, and sheltered by the leaves. Pointing to the grapes, the gardener said, 'These are the chief glory of the vine; I have now obtained my desire.' And is not Christ's desire the same for all the branches in Himself, the true vine?" (John 15.)

The Covenanter and Congregationalist.—Mr. Dewar said: "I lived, when a young man, on the west coast of Scotland. In the village where I lived there was an old patriarch who was one of the actual covenanters. When with him I avoided any mention of the Solemn League and Covenant. At a little distance lived an equally aged patriarch, who was a Congregationalist; when in his company I avoided speaking about church government, as it was a dangerous topic with him. I cannot tell you how much good I got from both these men when we spoke about our Lord and Master. I often longed that they could see each other as I saw them, and enjoy mutual fellowship together with the Lord Jesus; but as it was, they almost hated each other, owing to their difference of opinion upon the secondary question of church government. I doubt not but that they see each other in a right light now; but, alas! how much they lost. I learned a lesson from them which I never forgot."

Wolves and Dogs at War.—The Rev. Mr. Salmond said: "Away back as far as the days of the Reformation, the most successful means used by the Evil One to hinder the work of God have been dissensions among those who should be united in a compact phalanx against the common enemy. Melanchthon was much grieved by this spirit of anger and envy among the workers of his time, and for the purpose of uniting them together told the following parable. Once upon a time the wolves and dogs were at war. The wolves, alarmed by the increasing strength of their foes, sent a spy among the dogs, who on his return reported, 'There are not many mastiffs among them, but there are a great many snarling curs. What encouraged me most was that they seemed to hate each other, and be desirous to fly at each other's throats.' The lesson Melanchthon desired to be drawn from this was, 'It is lamentable that the enemy should have power to conquer and ruin men's souls through the internal dissensions among Christians themselves.'"

A Spaniard's Imprisonment for Christ.—The Rev. Mr. Martini, from Spain, says: "I have had the privilege of suffering a little—a very little—for the dear Lord, but in a sense it was my own fault, for I broke the law of my country. In Spain it was against the law for a Protestant to preach to a congregation of more than twenty persons, and that law I broke by addressing an audience of more than two hundred and fifty persons in the open air. I was holding a meeting of twelve persons in a small room, when certain persons entered and told me that there was a large number of people who wished me to preach to them in the open air. I thought, 'This is a call from God! Shall I obey God or man?' I obeyed God, and broke the law of man; the consequence was that I was sent to prison for forty-six days. I was well treated by every one. The mayor and all the notables came to see me, and I gave them tracts and Gospels, besides preaching inside the prison to more than fifty persons at a time, although the law forbade me to preach to more than twenty persons at a time outside the prison."

A Revival among Fisherfolk.—The Rev. Mr. Inglis tells how a remarkable awakening took place lately in a fishing village near Montrose. There was great concern among the older people about the rising generation, as there had been no conversions for some time. This made them wrestle in prayer with God on their behalf. A girl in the minister's class was impressed with the verse, "There is therefore now no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the spirit" (Romans 8 : 1). The girl was seized with a fatal illness; during its continuance she could only speak about "no condemnation" to her companions. Nothing else interested her, and she died very happy in the Lord. The minister told this incident in the school, and it was the means of commencing a great religious movement among the young people of the village. The result was that one hundred and twenty young people gave their hearts to Christ, and were admitted to the fellowship of the church. Every one of them was converted in this revival. God's ways are not our ways, but they are always right ways.

THE MOHAMMEDAN ANTICHRIST'S 1260 YEARS.

By the late Rev. W. Girdlestone.

The Starting-Point of the 1260 Years Begins in A.D. 630 — The Little Horn of Daniel 8—Who are the "Transgressors"?—Mohammed Pushed his Dominion so as to Include the "Pleasant Land" of Judea—His Koran and Proud Assumptions—Taking Away "the Daily Sacrifice."

THE period of 1260 years is to be dated from the establishment of Mohammedan imposture, which took place in the year A.D 630, when Mohammed seized possession of the city of Mecca, which thenceforth became the sacred capital of Mohammedanism, and synchronizes, therefore, with the taking away of the daily sacrifice (Rev. 11 : 2, 3.)

Mohammed did not establish his religion or his power till he was master of Mecca; from that time the Mussulman armies poured into Syria, and out of Syria they came down upon Jerusalem.

The little horn of Dan. 8 is described as being a tyrannical king, not inheriting power of his own, but gaining it by the help of others; he is to succeed by the exercise of his understanding and craft; he is to practise and prosper, and to destroy wonderfully, particularly, the mighty and holy people; and by peace shall he destroy many, and, above all, he shall stand up against the Prince of princes; he is to arise within the precincts of one of Alexander the Great's four kingdoms, and at a time when the TRANSGRESSORS SHALL BE COME TO THE FULL.

The transgressors are those who departed from the Christian faith, once delivered to the saints, and at the time of Mohammed's appearance, no age, no church, not even Rome herself in the darkest ages, ever witnessed such a medley Christianity, composed of heathenism, Judaism, and Gnosticism, with its variety of schisms and heresies, branching and sprouting out of that pestiferous sect, as then disgraced the Greek Church. Had not Mohammed found the soil thus ready prepared to hand, thus richly manured with the rottenness of corruption, and watered already by the poisonous flood from the dragon's mouth, he would not have dared to plant his deadly upas tree, and from under its branches circumscribe with his bloody scimetar an empire which astonished, and for ages has amazed, the world.

We see in this "horn" religious tyranny and overbearing character; but he begins and proceeds in his career by dark sentences and craft, by mysterious revelations and persuasion; he destroys not only by the sword, but by seduction, not only the mighty but the holy people, not only in war but in peace, and he sets himself up against the Prince of princes, our Lord Jesus Christ. He arises at a time when the transgressors are come to the full, and stretches his dominion over the south, and the east, and

THE PLEASANT LAND.

I think that no description of the impostor Mohammed can be given more applicable to him than this. He retired to his cave, and there hatched his pretended mysterious revelation; he came forth, and persuaded a few. By their help his tenets spread; by their assistance he was raised to power, and established that power by the possession of Mecca in the year 630; from thence he pushed his dominion, with the sword in one hand and the Koran in the other, four hundred leagues toward the south, and toward the east, which included the pleasant land of Judea.

His Koran is a medley of dark sentences; he prospered no less by his craft than by his sword, for he formed his religion to suit the different tastes, the different manners, the vicious and corrupt inclinations of the people he labored to convert as well as to subdue. To gain the Jew he reverenced Moses. To entice the Christian he acknowledged the authority of Jesus Christ; and to reconcile all, he gave a sanction to their worst passions, and INDULGED THEIR FIERCEST APPETITES.

He appeared also at a time when all seemed ripe for such an apostasy, when the transgressors were come to the full; when Judaism was degraded, Christianity corrupted, and heathenish customs, rites, and manners seemed to preponderate over all. But whatever reverence he might pay to Moses or Christ, however he might acknowledge the divinity of their missions, he set up his own as superior to theirs, and exalted himself above the Prince of princes. He

in the following sense:

The Romans when they conquered the Jewish nation, warred not against the religion of the Jews; they regarded not their superstitions (as they called them) or their ceremonies, these were everywhere tolerated; but their object was to break the political power of this contumacious people, to bend them to their yoke, and to quell their turbulent dispositions; and this they conceived was the more easily to be done by destroying their city and temple, and driving them out of their country.

Not so the Mohammedan conquerors; they laid their axe at the root of religion, they conquered only that they might convert; they gave their vanquished foe his country, but subverted his religion.

It was against the pure mode of worship of the Lord Jesus Christ, which was typified by the Jewish craft, were levelled; and, as I conceive it, this was sacrifice, that the Mohammedan arms and the Mohammedan daily sacrifice, or the atoning sacrifice, the true worship, which was taken away and annihilated, as it were, by the Arabian prophet and his followers. Thus we see that the daily sacrifice was taken away by Mohammed in the year A.D. 630. Add to this 1260 years the era of the prosperity of the Mohammedan little horn, and we reach the year 1890.

[NOTE BY REV. M. BAXTER.—The foregoing extract from the prophetic exposition published sixty-four years ago, in 1820, by Mr. Girdlestone, a clergyman of the Church of England, is valuable, as foreshowing that the 1260 years of Mohammedan temporal power would terminate about A.D. 1890, which is the terminating epoch of other dates. The sixty-four years which have elapsed since Mr. Girdlestone's exposition have signally verified his views, for the Turko-Mohammedan Empire is greatly shrunk in size and weakened since 1820.

In the year-day fulfilment the little horn of Dan. 8 is the Mohammedan Antichrist for 1260 years, and the little horn of Dan. 7 is the Papal Antichrist also for 1260 years. But in the future literal-day fulfilment the last personal Infidel Antichrist (who will be a Napoleon) will be not only the little horn of Dan. 8, but also the little horn of Dan. 7 for 1260 literal days, as the terms of his persecuting temporal power; as such he will combine in himself the peculiar distinctive features both of Mohammed and the Pope. They have been, in fact, precursory types of him. A Napoleon will soon arise as sovereign of a little State in the East, and run a career very like, but much greater, than that of Mohammed.]

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Black Wednesday will now Take its Place in our national history by the side of the Black Friday of 1869. Wednesday, May 14th, was a day of financial disasters. None who passed through Wall Street and the neighborhood on that day will ever forget the excitement there. Anxiety, distress, agony, despair might be seen written on the faces of the hurrying throng, and on the steps of the broken financial institutions there were scenes of sorrow that melted the heart with pity. Happily the disasters are not so bad as was feared at first, but many a home has been ruined, and the provision on which many widows and orphans depended, has been swept away. The condition of the country is much more stable now than it was in 1857, 1869, and 1873, when former panics occurred, so that it is hoped the crisis has now passed, though it may be some time before public confidence is completely restored. It will be a beneficial result of this trouble if it leads bank presidents to engage less extensively in outside speculations and prompts directors to exercise a closer supervision over the business they are supposed to direct.

Indications that a Storm was Gathering were apparent on Monday, May 12th. The two gigantic failures mentioned last week had clearly unsettled public confidence. The word "swindle" was freely applied to the Grant & Ward catastrophe, and people who had lost money there declared that their money had been obtained under false pretences. On the following day it was announced that there had been a heavy defalcation at the Second National Bank, and that the president had made away with over two million dollars. That tended to increase the panicky feeling, and though the president's father and the other directors of the bank promptly made good the defalcation, a run commenced on that bank. On Wednesday morning the Stock Exchange was crowded with anxious men. Within an hour after the opening three enormous failures were announced, and before the day closed, the list had increased to nine. Gloom and apprehension weighed on the public mind, and none could tell what institution might be the next to fail. Even the strongest were in peril, for unthinking people increased the danger by rushing to the bank where their savings were deposited, to draw them out. Bankers who pay interest on deposits cannot afford to keep them idle in their vaults, and they know by experience the proportion that should be kept on hand to meet ordinary demands, but this sudden demand might find perfectly sound banks unprepared to meet it. The knowledge of this fact led to serious apprehensions, which increased as failure after failure was announced.

A Check to the Panic was Effected later in the day by the action of the bankers, who held a meeting and agreed to stand by each other as they did in 1873. The sound institutions held securities which under ordinary circumstances could have been readily turned into money in a sufficient quantity to meet all demands, but the value, even of the best, had shrunk in the panic to a degree that would have rendered a forced sale ruinous. It was therefore decided that any banker, who was a member of the Clearing-House Association, might send his securities to the Clearing-House and receive in exchange a certificate which any other member would receive as cash. This expedient relieved the pressure and prevented speculators reaping a rich harvest at the expense of honest institutions. The Secretary of the Treasury also came to the rescue, and, by authorizing a call for bonds, released some of the money in the treasury.

The two Most Startling Suspensions in the panic were those of the Metropolitan National Bank and Messrs. Fisk & Hatch. The Metropolitan Bank had for its president the eminent philanthropist Mr. George I. Seney, whose public gifts aggregate more than a million dollars. One of the most recent was his gift of land and money to the Methodist Episcopal Church to erect a hospital in Brooklyn. Mr. Seney was undoubtedly very wealthy, but it is stated that recently his enterprises have not been so successful as formerly, and in several cases he has lost heavily. He was consequently crippled in his private resources, and as he owned three fourths of the shares of the Metropolitan Bank, that institution suffered. The failure of Nelson Robinson & Co., stock brokers, which firm was composed of Mr. Seney's sons and sons-in-law, and of other brokers, precipitated the trouble and rendered a suspension unavoidable. The bank, however, was found to be solvent, and taking advantage of the facilities offered by the Clearing-House it resumed business on Thursday. Mr. Seney resigned the presidency, and turned his private property over to the bank. General sympathy is expressed for him. Messrs. Fisk & Hatch also received much kindly sympathy from their friends on the Exchange. Both partners are very highly respected, and Mr. Hatch was re-elected president of the Exchange only the day before the collapse of the firm. He was very prominent in religious circles, took a deep interest in home mission work, and frequently preached for Jerry McAuley and at other missions. Mr. Fisk also is a man of simple, unaffected piety. Sincere regret for the misfortunes of the firm is expressed in all quarters. No statement was issued last week of their affairs, so that it is not yet known how serious the disaster may be. Unhappily the collapse of the firm carried under the Newark Savings Bank, which will cause much distress in that city.

The House of Representatives is in Considerable arrear with its business, but is nevertheless talking of an early adjournment. The way in which it expects to get through was indicated last week when three important appropriation bills were cursorily examined and passed. They were those for the Army, the District of Columbia, and Consular and Diplomatic Service. It may be hoped that Congress will, before it adjourns, deal with legislation urgently needed by the country. So much time has already been wasted that but little opportunity remains for the consideration of several important measures which ought not to be further postponed. Prominent among them are the Shipping, Bankruptcy, and Electoral College bills.

The Congressional Committee of the Republican party is in a difficulty which appears likely to be a source of embarrassment to them. It has been discovered that a section of the civil service law recently passed, provides "that no Senator or Representative or Territorial Delegate of Congress, or any officer or employé of either house, and no executive, judicial, military or naval officer of the United States, and no clerk or employé of any department of the government of the United States, shall, directly or indirectly, solicit or receive, or in any manner be concerned in soliciting and receiving, any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any officer, clerk, or employé of the United States, or from any person receiving compensation from any moneys derived from the treasury of the United States." This law applies to the use of money "for any political purpose whatever," and includes conventions, torchlight processions, the printing of posters or the hiring of brass bands, not only after the nomination of candidates or delegates, but before the holding of conventions. The penalty for breaking this law is a fine of five thousand dollars and imprisonment in the Penitentiary for five years. The section appears to have escaped notice during its consideration by Congress, but it places not a few prominent men in an awkward dilemma just now.

Charles O'Conor, the Distinguished Lawyer died at his residence in Nantucket, Mass., on Monday, May 12th, from the effects of a severe cold contracted about three weeks ago. His mind was clear to the last. In 1875 he suffered a prolonged and serious illness, and was several times reported dead, but his remarkable constitution saved him. He was born in this city January 21st, 1804, his parents being Irish. He had an elementary education, and studied law being admitted to the bar in 1824. As early as 1829 he achieved prominence in the courts, and from that time forward he was employed in some of the most celebrated cases, notably the Jack slave case in 1835, the Lispenard will case in 1843, the Forrest divorce case in 1851, the Lemmon slave case in 1856, and the litigation connected with the Jumel estate. In 1873 he was prominent in the prosecution of the Tweed ring cases in New York City. He served in the constitutional conventions of 1846 and 1864. In 1872 he was nominated for the Presidency by the Independent Democracy and labor reformers. He declined both nominations, but received about 20,000 votes. Mr. O'Conor's reputation as an honest lawyer was more highly prized by him than his reputation as a brilliant and learned lawyer.

The Project of the Vassar Brothers' Hospital at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., approaches realization. When the will of the late Matthew Vassar was admitted to probate, the fact was made known that he had left a large sum of money for the erection and endowment of a hospital in Poughkeepsie, to be called Vassar Brothers' Hospital, on condition that his surviving brother, John Guy Vassar, should contribute an equal sum, and that he, also, made the hospital the residuary legatee of his estate. Since that time Mr. John Guy Vassar has not only fulfilled the conditions named, but has taken an active interest in the matter. The exact amount placed at the disposal of the hospital is not stated, and probably is not yet certainly known. It will, however, be sufficient to erect very handsome and extensive buildings, and so endow them that their usefulness in the future is assured beyond a doubt. During the last season the trustees purchased land, the plans and specifications are now completed, and builders have been invited to examine them and present proposals for the work of construction. The building is to be of brick trimmed with terra-cotta.

Four New Bishops were Elected by the Methodist Episcopal Conference on Thursday last. The Rev. W. X. Ninde, D.D., of the Detroit Conference, and the Rev. J. M. Walden, D.D., of Cincinnati, were elected on the second ballot. On the third ballot the Rev. Willard F. Mallalieu, D.D., was elected; the fourth ballot was without result, but on the fifth ballot the Rev. C. H. Fowler, D.D., was elected. A resolution was adopted "that the Conference reaffirms the doctrine of our fathers of the Church, that the bishopric is not an order but an office; in orders a bishop is merely a presbyter or elder."

Colored Missionary Bishops in the Protestant Episcopal Church have been, it appears, consecrated prior to those elected on April 24th. Mr. W. W. Montgomery writes us in correction of an error in our issue of May 8th, that one or two colored bishops have been consecrated by the English Church and are now laboring in the mission field, and that in 1874 Dr. Holley, a colored bishop, was consecrated in Grace Church, New York.

Nine Hundred Chinamen were Present at the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, on May 12th, at the anniversary of the Chinese Sunday-School Union. The Tabernacle was red with flags. Chinamen wearing the commonest garbs of their country and Chinamen decked out in the latest New York fashions met the eye in all directions. They sat among the audience, which numbered about twenty-five hundred, and a select hundred occupied the platform and constituted the choir. The Chinese Consul, Au Yang Ming, entered late in the evening amid tumultuous applause. His little boy, twelve years old, rejoicing in the name of Nam Ouyang, accompanied him. All the Chinese took part in the proceedings with eager attention, and seemed to enjoy them immensely, singing the hymns in loud but not inharmonious voices, and joining in the prayers with apparent devotion. An address in English was made by Chu M. Seung. He spoke good English, and there was not the least difficulty in understanding every word. Mr. James F. Garvin read a report showing the history of the Chinese schools since their foundation sixteen years ago. "Ye-soo tsün nang che ming Kung he," or "All hail the power of Jesus' name," was then sung, and a Chinese prayer was offered by Yu Sing.

The Fourth International S. S. Convention of the United States and Canada is to be held at Louisville, Ky., June 11th–13th. A careful programme has been prepared and a large number of the foremost Sabbath-school workers of the country will be present. Any inquiries as to entertainment should be addressed J. E. Hardy, Louisville. A reduction of railroad fares has been granted by some lines on condition that delegates present a certificate of their appointment.

A Misplaced Buoy Caused the Wreck of a steamer worth $125,000, the loss of a valuable cargo, and peril to many lives on May 8th. The steamer City of Portland left Boston on May 7th on her voyage to St. Johns, N. B., with seventy passengers on board and considerable freight. The night was clear, and as the steamer passed the Owl's Head just before daybreak the captain saw a striped buoy indicating the presence of a sunken rock. The course was altered in accordance with the position of the buoy, but in a few minutes the steamer struck a ledge, slid on amidships, and stuck fast, the buoy being fifty feet away on the port side. The pumps were started at once, distress colors set, and the boats cleared. The officers and crew retained their presence of mind, and despatched a boat for help. In a short time a steamer arrived, and took off the terrified passengers, but the steamer and cargo are a total loss. The captain of the ship is an expert and careful man, and was in no way blameable. The buoy, which was put there to be a means of safety, was by its displacement the cause of disaster. It had drifted. The same words are often used about preachers who have discontinued preaching the Gospel, and, instead, preach strange doctrines. They have drifted, as the buoy did, and there is reason to fear that their change of position may cause the wreck of the souls of those who flock to hear them. Their responsibility is appalling (Ezekiel 33 : 8).

A Thirty-Cent Inheritance has Fallen to the lot of seven relatives of a deceased lady who formerly resided at South Toledo, Ohio. The lady had never married; her father and mother died before she did, and she had neither brother nor sister. As she left no will, there was a dispute about the heirship to her property, which consisted of a house and lot worth $360. A lawsuit was brought by the rival claimants, which was decided on May 15th. The property was sold, $121 was deducted for expenses of sale, and the balance divided according to nearness of relationship. Seven of the twenty-eight claimants received thirty cents each as their share. They doubtless regard it as a contemptible inheritance, but that is the unavoidable consequence of there being so many to participate in so small a property. Those whom God has declared to be joint-heirs with Christ, numerous though they are, cannot be thus disappointed, for they will inherit with Him who is "Heir of all things" (Heb. 1 : 2).

A Monkey has Involved a County in New York in a heavy expense. The bark Marguerite, laden with oil, came into New York harbor a short time ago. There was a monkey on board who upset a lamp, setting the vessel on fire. She was beached, while burning, near West New Brighton, Staten Island. The Pilot Commissioners, finding the wreck interfered with navigation, ordered Richmond County to remove it. The owners thereupon sent their own men to strip the wreck, but the county wreckmasters had them arrested. The county has now received a bill of sixty-five hundred dollars from its own contractors for removing the wreck; the owners have sued for two thousand dollars, the sum at which they value the hull; and the arrested wreckers have begun suits for false imprisonment. Altogether the mischievous animal has put the county to an expense which cannot fall short of ten thousand dollars. The monkey perished in the flames. The wretched creature only acted according to its nature, and it paid the penalty with its life, but the consequences of its misdoing fall on others. Evolutionists might find an argument for their doctrines in the conduct of many men whose character has much of the monkey nature. They scatter slanders and falsehoods, and when shown the consequences of their wickedness, say, "I was only in fun" (Prov. 26 : 18–22).

A Scrap of Paper Occasioned Some Excitement in Lewiston, Me., recently. One of the banks in the city is connected with police headquarters by a burglar-alarm. On the night of May 7th, soon after sunset, the police were startled by the ringing of the bell, which continued its warning the full time. The police hurried to the bank, and a crowd quickly collected. There was, however, no burglary in progress, but an examination of the premises showed the cause of the alarm. After the bank is closed every night a clock-work attachment is set to work, which makes the electric connection, and the doors and shutters of the bank, when closed, touch electric buttons, completing the circuit. The opening of a door or shutter breaks the circuit and sets the bell ringing in the police station. On the night in question a small piece of paper was accidentally shut in the door-jamb, interposing between the button and the door. When the clock-work made the connection, the paper broke the circuit as completely as the opening of the door would have done. It seemed but a paltry interposition, but it sufficed to disturb arrangements so delicate. Small matters often exert an influence altogether disproportionate to their ordinary importance. It is so in spiritual affairs, as the Christian often finds to his sorrow, when some sin, the world considers venial, separates him from the light of God's countenance (Isa. 59 : 2).

ESTHER'S EXALTATION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Then Mordecai commanded to answer Esther, Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews. For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place: but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed: and who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"—ESTHER 4 : 13, 14.

The Two Great Nations of the Earth—Nations and Churches Composed of Individuals—Personal Responsibility—Four Words to Individuals—I. Hearken—The Separation of Interests—The Way to Disaster—Fellowship Essential—The Interests not Secured by Separation—God can Dispense with Workers—The Disgrace of Losing Opportunities—II. Consider—An Advanced Position—Why God has Given Promotion—The Evil of the Time—Special Circumstances—Special Equipment for Special Work—III. Aspire—Success Possible—No One Knows to the Contrary—IV. Confide—Confidence Assures Safety—Victory Certain.

THE appeal of Mordecai in his pressing time of distress was to one single person, namely, to Esther. I believe that I shall do better this morning by making my sermon an address to individuals than by speaking of nations or churches. I assuredly believe that England has been raised up as a nation and brought to her present unique position that she may be the means of spreading the Gospel throughout all the nations of the earth. I judge that God has blessed of the Anglo-Saxon race—England and the United States—and given them pre-eminence in commerce and in liberty on purpose that in such a time as this they may spread abroad the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Woe to these nations if they fail to fulfil their solemn obligations! If, being raised up for a purpose, they refuse to perform it, they shall melt away. We are intrusted with great opportunities; if we do not rightly use them the New Zealander of Macaulay may yet survey the ruins of this empire-city. "Thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed," said Mordecai to Esther, and he says the same to us. Oh, that England may know the day of her visitation.

We might properly say of any Christian church that it has its own appointed place in the purposes of divine mercy. If the candle is lighted, even though it be set upon a golden candlestick, it is not lighted for itself, but that it may give light to all that are in the house. If any church fail to bless others, and so proves unfaithful to her solemn trust, the Lord will take away the candlestick out of its place, and leave the unfaithful to mourn in darkness. The Church in Rome was once a church of high commanding influence for good; you know what it has become. Some other churches are on the way, I fear, to the same dreadful end. God grant that none of the churches with which we are connected as Christian people may ever either apostatize from the faith, or grow lax and worldly, or become indifferent to the glory of God and the salvation of men. I might thus speak to each church and say, "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?"

My brethren, it is a wonderfully easy thing to denounce the faults of a government or of a nation, to complain of this being done, and of that being left undone; and this amusement may only serve to divert our conscience from its more profitable duties at home. The same is true with regard to a church. Men are too apt to condemn in the mass what they tolerate in themselves as individuals. But why are we so ready to accuse the churches? Why are we so censorious as to what the churches do, and what the churches are? Who make up the churches? Why, we each one by our influence help to make the churches good, or bad, or indifferent, as the case may be. Therefore, I will not waste time in generalities, but I will come to personalities. I will follow Mordecai's tack, and speak alone to Esther; that is to say, to each one who may happen to be here to whom God has intrusted opportunity, talent, and position, I would urge them to remember that there is a something for each believer to do, a work which he cannot delegate to another, a task which it is his privilege to be permitted to undertake, which it will be to his solemn disgrace and detriment if he do not execute, but which will be to his eternal glory under God if he be found faithful in it. I shall lay out my sermon in four parcels, arranging it under four words.

I. The first word is hearken! Hearken to my word, as Mordecai desired Esther to hearken to him. Hearken while God the Lord speaks to your heart, and calls you to your high vocation.

Hearken, first, to a question. Brother,

WILL YOU SEPARATE

your interests from those of your people and your God? I do not think that Mordecai was afraid that Esther would do so; but still it is sometimes as well to prevent an evil before we perceive it; and he did so by saying, "Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house." It was possible that being a queen it might enter into her mind that she would be safe even if all the rest of the Jews were put to death. It would be a painful thing that her countrymen should be destroyed, but still the stroke might not touch her in the seclusion of the palace, where she had "not yet showed her kindred nor her people." She would still remain the favored wife of the great king; and she might, therefore, selfishly look to herself, and leave those who were in peril to look to themselves or to their God, while she coldly hoped that the Lord would somehow or other give them deliverance.

Does that temptation come across the path of any one of us? It may: You may say, "I shall be saved though the city should perish in its iniquity. Though the people are steeped in poverty and ignorance, I shall enjoy plenty and live in light. I know the Lord myself, and that is my main concern; if the heathen perish I am not one of them, and I am thankful that it will not interfere with my destiny." Will you argue in this selfish manner? Do you wish to be joined with Jesus so as to be rescued from hell? I tell you, sirs, there is no receiving Christ unless you receive His doctrine and rule. You must receive this grace also, namely, that you give yourself to Him to make His interests your interests, His life your life, His kingdom your kingdom, His glory your glory.

Hearken to a second question. If you could separate your interests from those of the cause of God, would you thereby secure them? You are a church-member; you think also that you are a living member of the body of Christ, and you are tempted to look to yourself and to leave others to their shifts. Hearken—"Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews." Is it so, that because you are yourself a member of a flourishing church, and because you enjoy all sorts of Christian privileges, you therefore harden your heart concerning dying churches and desponding saints? Do you imagine that the body can be sick, and yet you as a member of it will not suffer? I tell you, if the Church of God goes aside it will be to your injury; if the truth of God be not preached if Christian life be not vigorous you will be weakened. When a baneful atmosphere is over other Christians you will breathe it. Sinners cannot be left in their spiritual death without creating a foulness in the air which is to the peril of us all.

If this great city is left to seethe and rot in its infidelity and misery and filthiness, fancy not that you Christian people will escape. You dwell with these outcasts, and you are already feeling their influence, and will feel it still more if they do not feel yours. How far and how deep that participation will go I will not venture to prophesy, for I am no prophet, neither the son of a prophet; but there are elements now fermenting which threaten, first, the existence of the commonwealth, and next, the liberties of Christian worship. Take you good heed, my brethren; things cannot long remain as they are. This great flood of wretchedness must be assuaged, or it will sweep us all away. This may be a selfish argument; but as we are battling with selfishness, we may fitly take Goliath's sword with which to cut off his head. You Christian people suffer if the Church suffers; you suffer even if the world suffers.

Next, remember, for your humiliation, that

GOD CAN DO WITHOUT YOU.

Enlargement and deliverance will arise to His people from another place if it come not by us. If the Lord were tied up to any one man, or any one church, or any one nation, it were treasonable for that person, church, or nation to be negligent; but as the Lord waiteth not for man, neither tarrieth for the sons of men, it becomes them to mind what they are at. He can do without us. When He looked and there was no man, His own arm brought salvation; and as it was of old so will it be again. Mark you that. He will effect His purpose; He will fetch home His banished; He will gather together His scattered sheep; He will cause the earth to be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea; and if we do not gather in the wanderers, or spread the knowledge of His grace, the work will be done by more faithful men.

Here follows a still more sobering reflection. Recollect that as God can do without us, it may be He will do without us. It might come to pass that God would say, "I will no more bless the world by this England; she has become selfishly mercantile; she cares more for commerce than for righteousness; she is drunken and infidel; I will give her up. Her merchants care nothing for the poor, whose labor is ill-requited; let her pass away as all oppressors must, and let the nations say: "Alas, alas, that great city, that mighty city! For in one hour so great riches is come to nought." He may say to any church, "Repent; or else I will come unto thee quickly, and will fight against thee with the sword of my mouth." "Ichabod" has been written aforetime, and may be again, on places where once there shone upon the forefront the inscription—"Holiness unto the Lord." So also any man may be set aside, even as the Lord put away Saul, and said to him, "Thou hast rejected the Word of the Lord, and the Lord hath rejected thee from being king over Israel." Hearken, I pray you, to this warning from the Lord. Hear, O heaven, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord will judge His people, and to whom much is given of him shall much be required.

Hearken to yet one thing more. How will you bear

if ever it come upon you, of having suffered your golden opportunities to be wasted? What if Israel had been destroyed for lack of Esther's intercession? Her name would have been a by-word among other nations as a base and traitorous woman. If the people had been spared by some other means, and she had refused her mission, as long as there lived a Jew they would have kept no feast of Purim, but have cursed her memory. When I think of the neglects of our own ancestors, I am anxious that we by them. There are at this moment straths in the Highlands which are thoroughly Romish. Why? They were not carefully evangelized at the time of the Reformation. If the workers of that period had done their work thoroughly there would have been no Romish valleys in Presbyterian Scotland. Ireland still cowers under the shadow of the Pope; there was a hopeful time when better things were promised, but this was allowed to pass by; and what can be done to rescue Ireland now? Times do not tarry, and tides do not wait; and if we do not avail ourselves of them while they are with us, our descendants may lament our neglects.

I fear that the best among us can recollect with regret times which we have suffered to pass over us unimproved We can never call them back again. You did not train your children; they are men and women now, and will not listen to you. O parents, why did you not speak to them when they would have listened? But what if a whole life should glide away in living for yourselves, in living for your own comfort and enriching? Let every Esther resolve that she will never bring this ban upon her name; let every man, woman, and even child among us, knowing the Lord, feel that the vows of the Lord are upon us, and that by imperative necessity we must serve according to our capacity the cause of God and truth.

II. I change a little, and the call is now

"CONSIDER."

Consider to what some of you have been advanced. You have been raised to salvation. What manner of persons ought we to be? You have been raised to that honor, walk worthy of it. If I had said that you had been elevated to be queens, like Esther, it would have been a poor elevation compared with that which you have actually received. Some of you who are the favorites of heaven have leaned your head on Christ's bosom, and have been permitted to sit where angels would wish to be; you are near and dear to Jesus, and espoused to Him in love.

In addition to all this, the Lord has raised some of you out of poverty and brought you to comparative wealth, perhaps to positive wealth; and He has given you positions which once you never dreamed of. To this He adds domestic comfort, and health, and prosperity in all its forms. The Lord has also given you talent. I fear we have all of us more ability than we use—but some have more talent than they themselves are aware of, and this perhaps they display in business, but never in the cause of God.

Thus you are brought to the kingdom; but why is it so? I want you to consider why the Lord has brought you where you are. Do you think that He has done it for your own sake? Does He intend all this merely that you may practise self-indulgence? Can this be the design of God? Do not think so. Whatever you have is yours not to hoard for yourself, or to spend upon yourself, but that you may use it as a good steward of God. Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom which God has given thee for such a time as this, when there is need of thee and all that thou hast?

Consider, next, at what a time it is that you have been thus advanced. You have been instructed in the faith in a time when unbelief is rampant. What for? You have wealth when many are starving. Why is this? Do you think you are the proprietor of what you have amassed; or do you admit that you are a steward? If you are a steward, use not the goods intrusted to you for your own ends, but for your Master; for if you do not,

YOU ARE A THIEF.

Whenever a steward considers that the estate is his own property, and not his master's, he is a thief, and before long his master will deal with him and say, "Give an account of thy stewardship; for thou mayest be no longer steward."

Consider also, I pray you, under what very special circumstances you have come where you are. To you as an individual I distinctly speak, and to no one else. It was a very strange thing that Esther, who was the foster child of Mordecai, a humble Jew, should rise from lowly rank to be the queen of Persia. Out of all the women gathered from every province how singular that she should be chosen to be queen! Special Providence selected the Jewish maiden for the throne. The like is true of each one of us now occupying a post of usefulness. Many a man of business here to-day obtaining a satisfactory livelihood has a dozen times been within an inch of bankruptcy, and yet he has obtained help, and passed the rock in safety. Some of you have been wellnigh ruined several times; and yet you still have bread to eat and raiment to put on. It is a miracle in your eyes that you have not come to beggary. Let your special deliverances and memorable mercies be as the tongue of persuasion, constraining you to grateful service.

Then I beg you to consider once more, with what singular personal adaptations you are endowed for the work to which God has called you. I believe you are endowed with special capacity for a certain work, so that no one is so fitted for it as yourself; you are a key to a lock which no other key will fit so well. God has prepared you for the work for which you are appointed. You, my brother, are equipped for such work as the Lord has appointed you; will you not

AT ONCE GET TO YOUR POST?

You say, "If I could preach, I would do it gladly." You would not preach worthily unless you are even now prepared to do other service for which you are fitted. You would be a disgrace to the pulpit if you are useless in the home circle. If God intrusts you with a single talent, and you do not use it, neither would you use ten talents; for he that is unfaithful in that which is least, would be unfaithful in that which is greatest.

Let each one of you feel that he has come to his own little kingdom for such a time as this. You and your work fit each other; God has joined you together, let no man put you asunder. Ask for more power from the Holy Spirit, and if there happens to be a tool which the Lord intends for you which hangs a little higher than your present reach, get the ladder of earnest endeavor and you will soon attain to it. Consider how you can improve yourself: give yourself to reading; study Scripture more, and use all helps toward increased knowledge and efficiency. If a further qualification be within your reach, be eager for it, and even the reaching after it may be as great a blessing to you as the talent itself.

III. Thirdly,

ASPIRE.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Rise to the utmost possible height. Fulfil your calling to its loftiest degree. Not only do all that you are sure you can do, but aim at something which as yet is high up among the questions. Say to yourself, "Who knoweth?" That is what the ambitious man says when he aspires to be great. When Louis Napoleon was shut up in the fortress of Ham, and everybody ridiculed his foolish attempts upon France, yet he said to himself, "Who knows? I am the nephew of my uncle, and may yet sit upon the imperial throne," and he did so before many years had passed. I have no desire to make any man ambitious after the poor thrones, and honors, and riches of this world; but I would fain make you all ardently ambitious to honor God and bless men. Who knows? Does anybody know what God may do by you? Does anybody know what capacities slumber within your bosom? I suggest the inquiry, and I will help you to an answer.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" Nobody knows to the contrary. I cannot tell but what God may bless you to this entire nation. Nobody will dare to say that He cannot. I cannot tell but what God may bless you, my friend, to that part of London in which you live, even though you may be deeply conscious of its great needs, and of your own insufficiency. Who can tell what the Lord can or will do? Dear mother, who knows but what the Lord Jesus may bless you to all the members of your family, so that by your means all the little ones shall come to Him? Nobody has any right to speak to the contrary. Who knows but what God may bless you, dear teacher, to all your Sunday-school class, so that you may meet them all in heaven? Nobody can declare that it shall not be so, therefore strive after it. The watchword is, "Aspire."

Young man, I trust you have given your heart to the Lord; what are you going to do? You have come into some property unexpectedly; or you are promoted in a house of business—what is the meaning of it? "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" My talented brother, should you not take your share in battling with present evils? I believe that in dark times with which to remove the gloom. Martin Luther is sitting by his father's hearth in the forest when the Pope is selling his wicked indulgences; he will come out soon, and stop the crowing of the cock of the Romish Christ-denying Peter. John Calvin is quietly studying when false doctrine is most rife, and he will be heard of at Geneva. A young man is here this morning—I do not know whereabouts he is, but I pray the Lord to make this to be an ordination sermon to him, starting him on his life-work. I feel as if I were Samuel at Bethlehem, seeking for David, to anoint him with a horn of oil in the name of the Lord.

Further, "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" You do not yourself know. I speak experimentally, using my own self as an instance in the work which God has enabled me to do. If it had been revealed to me that I should have enjoyed the opportunities which have fallen to my lot, I could never have believed it. If the Lord could use me, He can also use you. Only stand in a waiting posture, saying, "Here am I, send me!" and you shall see things which you dare not expect. Who knoweth, brother or sister, whether thou art put in thy family to save thy family? Who knoweth whether thou art made to live in a back street to bless that street? Who knoweth whether thou art set down in a forlorn district to upraise that district? Who knoweth whether thou art put into that nation to save that nation? Ay, put into the world in Christ's name to save the world? Aspire to great things for God.

IV. Our fourth word is

CONFIDE.

"Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" If thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this, be confident that thou art safe. If God has brought Esther to the throne that she may go in unto the king and save her people—go in, good Esther! Fear not the risk. Fast and pray your three days before you go, but be not dismayed. If the womanhood in you trembles in the prospect of a possible death, let confidence in God override your fears.

Each chosen servant of God is like the word which called him: as the word of the Lord does not return unto Him void, but prospers in the thing whereto He hath sent it, even so shall it be with every servant of the Most High. A holy confidence in the divine purpose instead of making men grow stolid and idle may prove to be one of the mightiest impulses to the heroic life. Cromwell's Ironsides to a man believed in the everlasting purpose, therefore they were invincible, for no fear ever breathed upon them. Though the hosts of the tyrant may be innumerable, yet with

THE WAR CRY,

"The Lord of hosts is with us," we will ride forth conquering and to conquer. Settle it in your mind that the Lord has called you to the work, and then advance without question or fear. Put your hand to the plough, and pause not. Do the work with your might. Do not stand asking how; do it as you can. Do not stand asking when; do it directly. Do not say, "But I am weak;"—the Lord is strong.

There was a man who strove in the House of Commons for what he thought would be a great boon to seamen, but he could not prevail. At last he broke through all the rules of the house and acted like a fanatic, and when everybody saw that the man was so in earnest that he was ready to faint and die, they said, "We must do something;" and it was done. An enthusiasm which overpowers yourself is likely to overpower others. Do not fail from want of fervor. Never mind if men think you crazy. When you are overwhelmed yourself the flood of zeal will bear all opposition before it. When you become so fanatically insane as to be absorbed by a passion for the glory of God, the salvation of men, the spread of truth, and the reclaiming of the fallen masses, there shall be about you the truest sanity and the mightiest force. May you feel such a passion concerning missions to-day. May you feel that the Gospel must be preached to all nations. May you feel that impulse at this moment while we worship God by giving our contributions to His cause.

W. S. CAINE, ESQ.,
The "Peter Cooper" of England.

THE workingmen of England are indebted to the eminent philanthropist whose portrait appears on the next page for assistance of the kind which the late Peter Cooper rendered his fellow-countrymen. Mr. Caine devotes his energies and his wealth to the service of his poorer brethren, and he believes that both are best expended in helping them to help themselves. He is ever ready to give money to individuals in distress, but his favorite method of helpfulness is to educate the young and aid the weak in their efforts to resist temptations to vice.

William Sproston Caine inherits a philanthropic disposition from his father, Nathaniel Caine, who was for many years a judge in Liverpool. It was under Judge Caine's auspices and largely at his expense that the famous series of lectures was delivered in Liverpool by Rev. Hugh Stowell Brown, which have been read so extensively in this country. They were lectures with humorous titles specially adapted to induce workingmen to become total abstainers, frugal men, but especially Christians. The success which attended their delivery and which has followed their publication is incalculable.

Judge Caine subsequently embarked in the business of iron manufacture, and his first care after purchasing the business was to buy the nearest grog-shop and turn it into a workingmen's institute and reading-rooms for the benefit of his employés. His wife was also an indefatigable philanthropic worker, who heartily aided him in his efforts. From such parents Mr. Caine derives some of the energy and helpful spirit which characterize him.

Early in life Mr. Caine became a total abstainer. Mrs. Wightman, the author of "Haste to the Rescue," secured his name to her pledge-book—which she still carefully preserves—at the close of one of her lectures. The date is November 17th, 1862. Mr. Caine is now President of the Baptist Total Abstinence Association. As a Christian man he desires to see his denomination freed from any connection with the drink traffic, and with the customs which have too long fostered that traffic. During his presidency, results which were scarcely expected, have been attained within the denomination, the foundations of which were wisely laid by the first president; but to Mr. Caine and his leadership belongs the honor of bringing them to the present most successful stage.

In this work, as, indeed, in all the good works with which Mr. Caine is associated, he is most ably seconded by his beloved wife, who is a daughter of his pastor, the Rev. H. S. Brown. Her winning, womanly incisiveness brooks no difficulty. Under this beautiful influence, all who work with her feel themselves moved forward in the path of the common goal, yet at the same time no one is sensible of anything but what the late Thomas Carlyle so aptly designated "Soft invincibility."

Mr. Caine's first attempts to enter Parliament were two unsuccessful contests for the honor of representing his native borough, in 1873–74. Subsequently he offered himself to Scarborough, and was elected, in 1880, upon the same platform for which Liverpool rejected him—Religion and Temperance reform. Scarborough enjoys a splendid school of art, replete with high-class models and efficient teachers to conduct the classes.

This is the sole gift of Mr. Caine, and the number of students which might be seen gathered in the various rooms in the evening fully testify to its usefulness. In short, Mr. Caine is a devoted follower of the Saviour and an untiring servant of his fellow-men.

A PEDDLER'S VOW.

A ROMANTIC story is related by English journals. A man has been for fourteen years permitted to stand on London Bridge and sell small articles from a basket to the thousands of people who cross that crowded thoroughfare daily.

The police and city officials pitied him as a deaf mute, and so accorded him a privilege denied to others. He was remarkably intelligent and his manners were refined. He recently fell ill, and was cared for in the infirmary of the poorhouse. When he was dying the peddler beckoned to his cot one of the hospital attendants, and terrified the man by speaking to him.

When the attendant recovered from his astonishment, the beggar confessed that his deafness and dumbness had been feigned. He said he was a Swiss gentleman of fortune, and belonged to one of the best families in the republic. When a young man he was betrothed to a beautiful and accomplished girl. He was possessed of a most violent temper, and in a lover's quarrel over a trifle one day he so wounded the girl by the bitterness of his invective that she fell ill. The reproaches of his friends for his cruel conduct stung him so that he left home. He then resolved to punish himself. He vowed to become a voluntary exile for twenty years; to earn his own living; leave his fortune untouched; keep his relatives and friends ignorant of his whereabouts, and go bareheaded and barefooted in all weathers during the entire time; and to listen to no one and speak to no human being during the ten last years of his exile. If he lived to complete his vow he meant to return home and use his fortune and the remainder of his days in making his betrothed happy, providing she were alive and unmarried. He had rigidly kept his vow; "but," he cried before he expired, "my time is not quite up, and I must die. I have been punished as I deserved." Investigation, so far as it has gone, has proven that the peddler's story is entirely true, and his family in Switzerland have been informed of his death.

If the man's story is true he has been guilty of folly as well as wickedness. His self-inflicted penance could not atone for his misconduct, and did no good to himself nor others, but, as in spiritual matters, the hardest thing for the wrongdoer to do is to humble himself and ask pardon (II Kings 5 : 13).

THE LATE BISHOP OF RIPON.

(See portrait.)

ON Wednesday, April 16th, died the Right Rev. Robert Bickersteth, D.D., Bishop of Ripon, and the senior Protestant Episcopal Bishop in Great Britain. He was appointed to the bishopric by Lord Palmerston in 1856. The veteran statesman had at that time a number of such appointments to make, and, happily for the church, he applied for advice to the Earl of Shaftesbury, who directed him to several clergymen, who all justified the wisdom of the choice by their subsequent conduct. They were evangelical men, and their influence was exerted to check the rising tide of Romanism and Unitarianism which were both operating disastrously in the Protestant Episcopal Church in Great Britain.

Dr. Bickersteth was the son of a clergyman. He was born August 24th, 1816, at his father's rectory, Sapcote, Lincolnshire. He chose medicine as his profession, but before taking his diploma he changed his mind, and concluded to enter the church. He was ordained in 1841, and held curacies successively at Sapcote, Reading, and Clapham. He was afterward made rector of St. Giles, London.

After his appointment to the Episcopal bench he continued preaching with all the ardor he had displayed in his curacies. He frequently delivered three extempore sermons in a day, and continued to the last an earnest and eloquent preacher of evangelical doctrines.

MRS. SARAH FURNAS WELLS, M.D.

(See portrait.)

THE parents of this distinguished lady-physician, lecturer, and traveller were Joseph and Frances Furnas. They were members of the Society of Friends, and resided near Troy, Miami County, Ohio. From childhood she was remarkable for mental power and energy. She had a Christian education, and while quite young took part in Sunday-school work. An earnest desire to be useful in the world prompted her to seek an entrance to the medical profession. With this object in view she commenced a course of study at Earlham College, Richmond, Ind. After two years, however, she was compelled by failure of health to leave the college and return home. On her recovery she went to Oberlin College, Ohio, where she graduated in 1865.

The special course of study for her profession commenced at the Woman's Medical College at Philadelphia, and was concluded at the New York Medical College for Women, from which college she received her diploma of Doctor of Medicine in 1869. Two years later she studied under Professor Baum at Vienna, and "walked" the great hospital of the Austrian capital. There she shared the same instruction as the other physicians, and received at the close of the sessions certificates from Dr. Rokitansky, Moerhoffer, and others. On her return to the college in New York she was regularly appointed Professor of Obstetrics and physician in the woman's hospital, where she labored with untiring earnestness and devotion. Her duties were, however, again interrupted; she was suddenly brought down by a very serious illness, cerebro spinal meningitis.

In the spring of 1873, believing that her health would be benefited by travelling, and with a view to further study and research, she entered upon a tour around the world, on which she was accompanied by her husband, himself a great traveller, speaker, and writer. She went first to Paris, where she followed the clinical instruction given in the medical department of the university. Thence she travelled to Moscow and St. Petersburg, where she remained six months, studying in the Russian hospitals. The following year she was invited to lecture in various capitals on the diseases of women and kindred topics. In the course of that year—1874—she lectured at Paris, Berlin, Dresden, at the German College for Ladies, at Nice, Venice, Florence, and Rome. At Venice she attended the grand fêtes given in honor of the visit of King Victor Emmanuel and the Emperor of Austria.

From Venice, in 1875, she sailed for Egypt. She visited Alexandria, Cairo, Memphis, Heliopolis, and the Pyramids, and ascended and entered Cheops, the Great Pyramid. From Cairo she went to Ismailia, and from there to Palestine, where she spent three months in exploring the hallowed scenes of Bible history. Thence she went to India, where, as in Pales-

...ine, she devoted her special attention to the efforts now being made by lady missionaries to render assistance to the women in the Zenanas, who now and in the past often die of diseases which physicians could cure, were they allowed to see them. Many lady missionaries now have a knowledge of medicine, and as they are permitted to enter the Zenanas, they have been the means of saving many lives. Mrs. Wells gladly gave them the benefit of her advice, and was able to advance them in their studies.

In 1877 she visited Australia, and lectured in Melbourne and Sydney. The spring of 1878 found her at Lima, Peru, from which place she sent home a series of valuable letters to the press, containing original observations on public and social life in that country.

She returned to America in 1880, and spent some time in assisting Mrs. Dr. M. P. Sawtelle to found in San Francisco the Women's Medical College of the Pacific Coast. Thence she travelled across the country to New York, lecturing in the principal cities on her way. A Southern lecturing tour followed, extending as far as Jacksonville, Fla. She returned to New York by steamer, and almost immediately set out on another European tour through Scandinavia and Russia.

In the course of her travels—probably the most extensive ever performed by any American lady—she has contributed a large number of letters to the newspaper press, and has been able to obtain and impart much useful information about the lands through which she passed.

John Fletcher's Avowal.

JOHN FLETCHER'S REFORMATION.

(See Illustration.)

ONE broiling summer day an aged man was toiling laboriously at a hedgerow on his employer's farm. At intervals he would raise himself to an erect posture, wipe the drops of perspiration from his forehead, and sigh heavily. At such times it could be seen that John Fletcher was a sturdy man, who, in spite of his years, could do a day's hard work with no little endurance. He was wiry and well proportioned, and though his hand shook a good deal more than it ought to have done at his time of life, it had not lost its strength nor its cunning. The rests were short, and John returned to his work with dogged perseverance.

Two young men strolled along while John worked, and they wished him "good day," and, having apparently nothing better to do, stopped for a chat.

"They say you were at the temperance meeting last night, John," said one of them.

"Yes I wur," said John, cutting away and not looking up.

"That's a change for you, John. What did they do without you at the saloon? You don't often miss a night there."

"It's a free country," John said; "I guess I can go where I like without asking leave. I ain't contracted to amuse Reilly's customers for him."

"You do it, though, generally, contract or no contract. I guess Reilly won't like it, if he knows you went to hear those fellows who are trying to shut his place up. He don't believe in prohibition—Reilly don't."

"Can't help what Reilly likes or don't like," John said firmly; "I went to the meeting and didn't ask him, and what's more, I'm a-going again."

"You seem to have liked it, John. I shouldn't have thought it would have suited you. There aren't many men can put away more rum than you can."

"You needn't tell me that; I s'pose I know. A man as has been drinking fifty years steady, knows how much he can put away. P'raps I've got tired on it. Who knows?"

"Well, it hasn't hurt you. You are as strong now as many a younger man, and I suppose you are pretty near eighty."

"Oh, it hasn't hurt me, hasn't it? Suited me pretty well, you think? Well, young man, do you think I ought to be working like this on a hot summer day? Do you think a man at my age ought to be doing work of this kind at all? Rum has done that for me. And you say it hasn't hurt me. I might have been owner of the land now instead of working on it for the boss, if it had not been for rum. You think I'm near eighty? Well, I'm only seventy; rum has put ten years on me. Oh yes, don't you make any mistake, rum has hurt me. I wish I'd found it out before, but I've done with it now."

"What, you don't mean to say you've signed the pledge?"

"I have; I'm a full-fledged teetotaler, and I don't care who knows it."

Two ladies had been approaching while this conversation had been going on, and as John in his excitement spoke loudly, they heard his words.

"Aunt," said the younger one, "did you hear what old John said? Rest a minute on this wheelbarrow. I'm going to speak to him; this is better than ever I hoped for." The young lady came up behind the old man, and laying her hand on his shoulder she said, "Did I hear you say you had signed the pledge, John?"

"I don't know, Miss Grace, but whether you did or not I have signed. Queer start for an old man, isn't it?"

"I call it a very good start, John. It is the best news I have heard for many a day. May God help you to keep it."

"If He don't miss I never shall keep it; but I think He will. I didn't think I could have got through this work this afternoon without a glass, but it seems as if the prayers they made over me last night was having some effect. I wish my poor wife had lived. She would ha' been glad, for she cried many a time over my drunken ways."

"I feel sure she knows, John. She is in heaven surely, and what would make her glad here will make her glad there. Only be brave and resist temptation, and trust in God for strength, and you will be safe."

John took his young friend's advice, and though many warned him of the danger at his time of life of giving up the liquor, he was firm in his resolution, and kept it. He believes that instead of shortening his remaining years it added to them, and anyhow he has a hope beyond the grave, which he would not have had if he had died a drunkard.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

The Guest Departs.

MR. MORLEY heard Mr. Grant descending the staircase noisily. He approached the door and gave three sharp distinct raps upon it, which was answered by Hester opening it as quietly as usual. He looked in with a frank, hearty smile, and spoke in one of those voices, full of life and spirits, which sound so cheerfully in chambers of gloom and sickness.

"Come, Mr. Morley," he said, "I am a medical man, and I will give you a prescription gratis. You ought to take a walk of two hours every day in this lovely country."

"And who will attend to my business?" asked John Morley, with a second gleam upon his face.

"Your business is to be well," persisted Grant; "and how can you be well, sitting here all day long, brooding and moody, till you are capable of committing any crime in the calendar? You must take a good two hours' walk every day, or you may end by being guilty of murder, Mr. Morley."

He spoke lightly; but he looked hard at the moody man he was addressing, and John Morley's face perceptibly deepened in gloom. His fingers tightened over the ruler he had been using, and his eyes glistened darkly under his bushy eyebrows.

"More men are guilty of murder than you think of," he answered; "but it is not a daily walk that will save a soul from crime."

"It would go far to save yours," said Grant, eagerly; "only put yourself into my hands, and try it. Instead of sitting here in this dull room, wearing your heart and your brains out in brooding over heaven knows what, go out into the sunshine and bracing air of the fields; you'd be as far from murder as a child is."

"You are a boy yet," replied John Morley, "and scarcely know what you talk about. You do not know what it is for God's sun to give you neither heat nor light, and for the cool winds to make the fever of your heart the hotter. But I run no risk of being guilty of murder—not I. Why me more than any other man? or why murder more than any other crime?"

He gazed darkly and suspiciously at Grant, whose open face had exchanged its frank smile for an air of disquietude, and who returned his gaze apparently with words upon his tongue which he longed to speak, but the moment for which was not yet come.

"Mr. Morley," he said, in an altered tone, "you told me, ten days ago, that you did not know the man whom I found nearly murdered at your door."

"No," he answered; "he is a stranger to me. He must be a stranger in the town; for if he belonged to Little Aston, he would have been missed. Has he told you who he is?"

"You see why I think of murder," said Grant; "it is no wonder that my mind runs upon it. At your own door a murder was well-nigh accomplished, and the victim was only saved by a mere accident—the barest chance. It is a strange story. Has the man an enemy? Who struck that blow? Where did the assassin escape to? Where is he now? Is there any meaning in the spot where he was almost murdered? I ask myself these questions over and over again, and I suspect every man I meet."

Grant spoke vehemently, but with a suppressed earnestness, more impressive than passionate. Hester felt a sickening dread and faintness creep over her, yet she scarcely knew what dim suspicions were taking hold of her mind. She listened breathlessly for her father's reply.

"They are grave questions," he said, calmly; "but your patient alone can answer them. It is a case for police investigation, and it should have been put into their hands at once. I suppose any other man but me would have done it. Do you not know the stranger's name yet?"

"Yes," answered Grant, still scanning John Morley's face with close scrutiny; "but I hold it as a trust which I am not to betray. He has resolved also to conceal the savage attack made upon him, out of consideration for his supposed enemy. The whole thing is to be kept a secret, even from his own family. No one will know it except ourselves, and with us it will be safe."

"It will be safe with me," said John Morley; "but this is a stranger story than before. An attempt at assassination in a quiet, remote town like this, and the victim of it is anxious to hush it up! Who is this man, and where does he come from? What does he suppose is the motive for the crime? This mystery, mark you, is being acted within my own walls. I must see the stranger and question him; it is only fitting that I should know more about it."

John Morley's face was lit up with a new expression of sinister interest and resolution. He rose from his chair, straightened his bowed shoulders, and lifted up his drooping head. Hester trembled, but she did not dare to speak; she did not know yet what she dreaded or suspected.

The twilight had already begun to gather in this house, surrounded by so many higher walls. John Morley turned the key in his shop-door, that no one might enter while he was absent; and as he returned to his sitting-room behind it, he said, in a lighter tone, "I will follow your advice; I am about to leave my business to take care of itself for awhile."

Hester had only time to fly up-stairs to the little room where she had left Robert Waldron, and to lower the blind over the window to add to the duskiness of the evening. With a hurried and importunate voice she addressed herself to him:

"My father is coming," she said; "oh! be so careful what you say. He has suffered so much, and from you. If it is possible, hide from him who you are."

He entered the room as she finished speaking, closely followed by Grant. The light was very dim, and such as there was it fell full upon the face and figure of John Morley, so eloquent of ruin and loss and utter wreck, that Robert, who had longed to see for himself the change that others reported as wrought in him, felt his eyes fastened and held by a spell which he could not conquer.

He was on his part in the shade, and the years which had passed over him had been those which transform a youth of three-and-twenty into a man in the prime of life. There was little danger that John Morley would recognize in this bearded stranger, still wearing a bandage about his head, the gay, handsome, thoughtless boy, whom the world was inclined to blame but little for his follies and faults. But Grant and Robert Waldron were not alarmed by the fear of discovery. There was not a doubt in their minds that it was this man's hand, thin and white as a scholar's, but nerved with long-cherished hatred, which had scarcely missed of murder.

"Mr. Grant tells me," said John Morley, lowering his voice to a very quiet key, "that you are now out of danger, and will soon be able to be moved. Have you communicated with your friends?"

"Not yet," answered Robert, in tremulous and indistinct tones.

"They will be anxious about you," he resumed, "and I am afraid you will find the accommodation of my house very limited. Such as it is, you are very welcome to it; but the situation is confined, and not good for an invalid. Still, you or Mr. Grant have only to make your wants known to my daughter Hester, and we will do all in our power to make your sojourn here comfortable. I beg that you will not leave until you feel quite equal to the effort."

The words were hospitable and polite, and his manner did not belie them. There was something of an antique and laborious courtesy about him—the ceremoniousness of an old school, but it commanded respect; and Robert Waldron bowed and murmured a few words of thanks.

"But," said John Morley, distinctly, "you would do me a favor, one that you will not refuse me, I am sure, by letting us know the name of the stranger who is within our doors."

Hester held her breath to listen. It was a moment of intense anxiety to her. In all her life, immured and isolated as it had been, she had never heard a lie spoken; and now she trembled between the desire of having the truth concealed at all hazards, and the dread of having a falsehood uttered at her instigation. She had been very near the sin herself only a few minutes before; and a sharp pang shot through her as she waited for Robert Waldron's untruth. Her conscience kept the sensitiveness of a conscience which knew nothing of the evil world outside her father's house.

"My name is Roberts," he said, unhesitatingly; "I am unknown here, and my family is in London."

"And may I ask further what you mean to do about this affair?" asked John Morley.

"Nothing," he answered.

"Nothing!" echoed John Morley, "excuse me, but I find your decision singular. Would it be possible to furnish us with any explanation?"

"Certainly," said Robert; "I believe I know the man; I could lay my hand upon him at an time. I know what has driven him to crime, and I must pass it over. He is safe from me, and would to God I could feel that he is now avenged! I shall keep out of his way for the future."

He looked up significantly and imploringly into John Morley's gray, worn face, which underwent no change while he spoke. He stood opposite to him in the dim light, his white head bowed toward him, and Robert Waldron could no longer keep back the tears and sobs which overmastered him.

"You are still very weak," said John Morley, soothingly, "and if I have wearied you by my questions I pray you to forgive me. When you are more able to bear it, I will speak to you again on this subject. In the mean time make my house your home, until your friends come to you, or you can go safely to them. Both you and Mr. Grant are welcome here. I leave you to his care now."

The interview had been a short one, but it was quite long enough for Robert Waldron. He had seen face to face the man who had forbidden him to set his foot in any place where he could by any chance encounter him. There had been nothing in his words or in his manner to betray that he knew him; but Robert could not doubt it. To his mind it seemed as if there was now a tacit and covert reconciliation between them. It might be one never to be displayed openly to the world; but there was a fairer balance of injury between them which might well satisfy John Morley's resentment. He felt no apprehension of further vengeance, though he might remain in his dwelling. If John Morley had lifted up his hand against his life, it had been in a moment of ungovernable passion, which had come upon him unawares. The man was too stricken, too impassive in his profound melancholy, to exert himself to active hate. He could not lash his heavy spirit into schemes of revenge. Robert Waldron felt that he could rest where he was in perfect safety.

Besides, the agitation of the day had thrown him back in his recovery, and he did not leave his room again for some time. While Hester was feverishly anxious to get him removed before there was a chance of her father seeing him again, he gave himself up to the fretful languor of a tedious convalescence, which was only soothed by her occasional visits to him. He preferred her quiet little study to the great empty apartments of Aston Court and the attendance of the old housekeeper. He was in no hurry to leave a place possessing the peculiar charm for him, perilous yet pleasant, which an outlaw might feel in being under the roof of the authority who has proclaimed his outlawry.

At the end of a few days, however, Grant announced to him that the time was come when he ought to leave John Morley's house. Robert had confided his whole story to him; and Hester had impressed upon him the necessity of so effecting the removal that no suspicion should be awakened in the town. Little Aston had been very curious both with respect to the doctor and his patient; but Grant and Roberts were names altogether unknown there, and John Morley either could not or would not reveal anything more about the strangers. Late at night therefore, a night when John Morley was attending a service at the chapel, a hack which Grant had hired from a town some miles distant drove up to the door; and Robert Waldron, well wrapped up, and leaning feebly upon Grant's arm, descended to the large old kitchen, which formed the entrance-hall of the house.

"Hester," he said, "say good-by to me, kindly."

She put her hand in his for a moment, but would not let it linger in his clasp.

"Hetty," he said, sorrowfully, "you have not forgiven me yet."

"Oh, I do forgive you," she said, in a tone of anxiety; "but I want you to get away. I have had no peace since I knew who you were. Do not think me unkind. I am very, very sorry for you, and I hope that some time you will be very happy again. It is no use for both you and my father to be miserable all your lives long. Good-by."

"And am I never to see you again, Hester?" he asked, gazing with a quiet thrill of admiration at the rare refined beauty of her thoughtful face.

"It will be best not," she answered; "no, you cannot see me. You must keep your promise now, and never come near my father again. I know what you think, and what Mr. Grant thinks about him; and perhaps it is true. But you must never come near us again. What would have become of me and of him, if you had been found dead?"

Her hands were clasped for an instant, and a fine shadow of terror crossed her face. Robert Waldron loitered still, regarding her fixedly, as though knowing it was for the last time. An old clock which stood in a dark corner of the apartment struck eight, and Hester started with alarm.

"Oh, make haste!" she cried, "go quickly, for my father will be at home in five minutes. Good-by, good-by."

She put her hand again into his, and hurried him to the door; but he had scarcely settled himself in the corner of the cab before John Morley came up. Grant was on the point of jumping in, and closing the door; but now he stood with one foot upon the step, and turned round to speak to him.

"My patient is very much exhausted, sir," he said, "and I should be glad if you would dispense with any farewell. We shall not go far to-night, and I will write to you from where we stop. We will not loiter any longer than we can help in the night air; so good-by, Mr. Morley."

"Have you all you need for the journey?" he inquired.

"All—everything," answered Grant, hurriedly; "good-by."

"Good-by to you both," said John Morley, raising his hat from his white head. Robert leaned forward to have a last glance at him and Hester, as she stood in the lighted doorway; and then he fell back with a groan.

CHRISTIAN LIBERTY.

S. S. Lesson for June 1, Gal. 4 : 1–16. Golden Text, Gal. 5 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Slavery the Result of Satan's Work—The Partial Deliverance — Personal Effort Futile — Christ's Complete Deliverance—Disappointed Believers—The Way to Liberty—Bondage to Spiritual Leaders—The Bondage of Fashion—Of Public Opinion—To Slave-Drivers—Jesus, the Deliverer.

"STAND fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and be not entangled again with the yoke of bondage" (Gal. 5 : 1). The work of Satan has been to bind men and bring them under law, the work of Christ is to deliver and set them free. No sooner did Satan succeed in bringing about the fall of Adam and Eve, than they found themselves slaves; they were under

"THE LAW OF SIN AND DEATH"

(Rom. 8 : 2). A power greater than their own bound them, and whether they would or no, sin entered into their thoughts, words, and deeds. Every man is born into the world under the same slavery to the law or power of sin. When the Spirit of God reveals the holiness of His law, then it is we feel the galling bondage of the law of sin and death; then "to will is present with me; but how to perform that which is good I find not. For the good that I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do" (Rom. 7 : 18, 19). Thousands both of converted and unconverted people know what this struggle is, according as their consciences are more or less enlightened.

Many who have been able to rejoice in sin forgiven yet know that the law of sin and death has power over them, and that besetting sins of worldliness, self-indulgence, evil temper, pride, unkind words, harsh judgment of others, etc., still have power over them sorely against their will. They strive, and struggle, and pray, and hope, but are again and again overcome.

IS THERE DELIVERANCE?

Yes, thank God, by the bringing in of a stronger law or power. "The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus hath made me free from the law of sin and death. For . . . God sending His Son in the likeness of sinful flesh, and for sin, condemned sin in the flesh: that the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit" (Rom. 8 : 2–4). So long as we attempt to fulfil the righteousness of the law in our own power, taking the management of the matter into our own hands, the consequence will only be failure. One of two things will happen: either we shall call sin by some other name, and maintain that we are guiltless, and so bring down the holy law of God to our own fleshly level; or we shall see God's holiness, know we cannot live up to it, and give up in despair. The law cannot attain to God's righteousness in that it is "weak through the flesh." It is divine work to fulfil the righteousness of God's holy law, and only One who is divine can do it. It is not written "That we might fulfil the righteousness of the law," but "That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us." By whom? By Jesus Himself dwelling within us, when we have let Him come in, and have laid the government upon His shoulder, to work henceforth only under the command of the Holy Ghost.

Under the law, God's children are in the position of servants; "The heir, as long as he is a child [an infant, Gr.] differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all." "But when the fulness of the time was come, God sent His Son, made of a woman, made under the law, to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons [i.e., the privileges of grown-up sons]. And because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of His Son into your hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ."

This reads gloriously, the Lord show us how far it is our experience. There are numbers of believers the tone of whose prayers, the pith of whose words, and the expression of whose faces speak disappointment. "I ought to love God more, but I can't; I ought to love souls, but I don't know how; I ought to be more in earnest, I pray to be so, but I don't find any change." Is this liberty or bondage? the spirit of the servant or of the Son?

"I OUGHT, BUT I CAN'T"

is not the liberty wherewith Christ makes free. "Where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty" (II Cor. 3 : 17); but this bondage, brother, is your own spirit, not the Spirit of the Lord. If you come to the end of yourself, and give yourself up as hopeless, and claim the Holy Ghost to come and take the full possession and direction of your being, external and internal, of your circumstances, reputation, family, friends as well as of your religious experience—you will find that a very different state of things will come to pass. It may seem to you beforehand that it is far too much to give up your personal liberty in this way, that it is to make yourself a mere machine, and you fear lest you should subside into indifference. But you forget that the surrender is not into the hands of one equal with yourself; you surrender to your rightful Owner, to Him who alone fits you, and who alone can take the command. The hand is not free, but in the most terrible bondage, when its movements are not directed by the head, as in the case of shaking palsy or St. Vitus dance. Under the direction of the head all the members have the fullest freedom of action. And thus surrendered to Jesus, and governed by the Holy Ghost, we are free indeed.

There is a kind of bondage into which Satan succeeds in bringing many who already know the power of the cleansing blood and liberty from the power of known sin—

BONDAGE TO SPIRITUAL LEADERS.

When God's truth shines out in some way new to them, instead of going to the Lord directly with it and claiming the light of the Holy Ghost upon it, they will ask the opinion of one whose life and doctrine most commends itself to them. It may be on this point God has not been dealing with them, and instead of obtaining more light, the little light which they had is put out. God will not have us walk in the light of other Christians, but each one alone and independently with Him. Enoch and Noah were contemporaries for one hundred and thirty-three years, but it is not said that Noah walked with Enoch, but "Enoch walked with God," and "Noah walked with God" (Gen. 5 : 22; 6 : 9). Some are in bondage to the feelings of others. God leads one of His children to take a step of faith, another of His children living in the same house has not had the same experience of God, and is sure to oppose that step in all conscientiousness. To persuade him of the justice of it is hopeless, it is a path he has not trodden, and many, rather than grieve a friend, and risk giving him pain, will fail to follow the Lord alone. "Ye are bought with a price, be ye not servants of men" (I Cor. 7 : 23). Paul could speak of himself as being "free from all men," and yet as the Holy Ghost's instrument, he made himself "servant unto all" (I Cor. 9 : 19); but oh how different was his service to this bondage of which we have spoken.

Worldlings are in abject bondage to what people think, and to

of them. Their choice of a husband or wife is regulated far more according to what is expected of them, than what will really make them happy. They can't spend their money as they like; it is expected of them that it should be spent in furniture, equipage, dinner-parties, servants, etc., and the deep joy of helping the needy and the miserable is utterly unknown to them, because it isn't expected of them! Of course they must give, but only as it is expected, to just the societies to which every one in their station is expected to give. But they have no freedom to give to him that needeth, nor yet to give as the Lord shall call. Their time is not their own, they spend it as is expected of them; they may not have much choice in their dress, it must be just what is expected of them, whether it is comfortable or not! And there are some believers who are under this bondage.

But there are others under another kind of bondage. A certain class of God's children seem to have served an apprenticeship in Egypt under Pharaoh, and to have learned well how to oppress their brethren. They invite them to come and preach. When they arrive they will find some three or four services a day announced, and people are coming for spiritual conversation in between; others are invited to meet them at dinner, tea, and supper; and, in fact, not a moment is to be allowed for taking counsel with God; every moment is to be utilized for the work. Many dear children of God fall into this snare, get overdriven in soul and body, and have not the independence in God to say, "I will first ask the Lord, and then I will do what He bids me, and trust the remainder to Him." Some Christians are in bondage to circumstances. In their own minds they have planned such and such work for the Lord, in the way which seems to them best; something occurs to upset all their plans, circumstances appear to be against them, and they are fretted and troubled.

From all this bondage

JESUS SETS US FREE.

Let it be once understood that Jesus is to have His way in all things, then everything which He permits must work together for good, and the upset of our plans was to teach us to make no more, but to let Him make them. If it is agreed that we serve the Lord Christ instead of serving men, then whether we satisfy the expectation of some Christian brother or sister is of very little matter. When between God and us all is light, and we know that we are pleasing Him, we may well trust Christian brethren, circumstances, plans, to Him, and walk at liberty from all other. One bound, however, is set to this liberty. It is liberty not in the flesh but in the Spirit; if it does not lead to disinterested serving one another, it is not the true thing. "Brethren, ye have been called unto liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another" (Gal. 5 : 13).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Motion to Censure The Gladstone Administration for neglecting to rescue General "Chinese" Gordon was defeated in the British House of Commons on May 13th by a majority of twenty-eight in a full house. The victory is regarded as a defeat, Mr. Gladstone's majority having dwindled down from forty-nine to twenty-eight in a few weeks. There is unquestionably a strong feeling of indignation against the Cabinet for their abandonment of the brave soldier, which was not dispelled by Mr. Gladstone's eloquent speech. There was considerable disappointment manifested over the Premier's defence, which though a splendid oration lacked direct assurances and explicit statement. Many of his own party voted against him, and much amusement was caused by one Liberal making the blunt declaration that he had vo' d before that black was white, but he would n ,t do so again. The remark expressed the real feeling of the Liberals, the Radicals excepted. Many Liberals notified to the whips that they would not vote against the Tory motion unless some express assurance were given that the Government were responsible for the safety not only of General Gordon, but of the Khartoum garrison. That responsibility the Marquis of Hartington accordingly admitted. His speech, being explicit, clear and frank, removed to some extent the unfortunate impression produced by Mr. Gladstone.

A Treaty of Peace between France and China has been signed. One of the clauses stipulates that China shall immediately withdraw her troops from Tonquin. China engages to respect the present and any future treaties that may be made between France and Annam. In view of the conciliatory attitude taken by China and the patriotic wisdom of Li Hung Chang, France abandons all claim to indemnity for losses sustained during the troubles between the two nations. China consents to freedom of trade between Annam, France, and China, for the establishment of which a treaty of commerce will shortly be concluded. The back-down of China is attributed to internal troubles, to the insecurity of the Chinese dynasty, and to the influence of Germany in obtaining from France an abandonment of the claim for indemnity.

The Burning of Another European Theatre is announced. On May 16th the great Stadt Theatre, of Vienna, Austria, was totally consumed. Many persons were injured, but no lives were lost. The performance was to have begun at seven o'clock, but the flames were discovered two hours earlier in the auditorium. The whole city was filled with a burning smell, and a thick, black smoke darkened the heavens. At seven the roof fell in with a crash, and the flames, with a loud roar, ascended from the auditorium. The conflagration first broke out in the upper gallery. The iron curtain separating the stage from the auditorium fell in, and the flames immediately attacked the stage, and it, together with the theatrical properties, was destroyed. The firemen succeeded in extinguishing the flames at ten o'clock, but not before the entire building had been ruined. The fire was caused by the carelessness of painters who were at work in the building.

A Disgraceful Scandal in Connection with the army contracts for the Egyptian campaign has come to light in England. From a brief summary of facts cabled by the Associated Press it appears that the exposures grow more startling day by day, and already exhibit a condition of affairs described as "more shameful than anything ever displayed even in American politics." It has been shown that the hay sent to the army for forage was not only mouldy, but was loaded with stones and bricks to make up for its short weight. Every device conceivable by rascality was employed to bleed the treasury. Cattle intended for food for the troops were landed from the transports and then left untended until hundreds of them strayed over into the enemy's lines, and more had to be ordered from home The troop ships and transports were in many cases overloaded when they left England to such an extent that the stores had to be thrown overboard while proceeding to the front, in order to save the vessels. Officers of the Commissary Department have testified that they received word from time to time of outlying detachments of British troops who were literally starving, but to whom it was impossible to send food, because of the utter inefficiency of the transportation service.

Russia's Annexation of Merv, which was Regarded at the time as a menace to English rule in India, is the subject of an article published in a new Caucasian paper, the organ of Prince Dondonkoff Korsakoff, governor of the Caucasus, who has recently annexed Merv. The article openly declares that the object of the new conquest is to threaten England in India, and Afghanistan is spoken of as destined to play in a war, over India, the same function which was fulfilled by Roumania in the war with Turkey. The Russian officials are annoyed by this imprudent disclosure. The semi-official organs are in pitiable straits to explain it away, and the English Ambassador has applied to the Russian Foreign Office for explanations.

Mr. James Stephens, the ex-Fenian Head-centre, has issued a circular to Irish nationalists in America stating that he has consented to again place himself at their head, because the moment has arrived when a union of all Irishmen is possible. As soon as he receives answers from America the new conference of Irish leaders will meet in Paris. Stephens declares that Ireland shall be an independent republic before he dies. At the conclusion of the forthcoming conference in Paris he will issue a manifesto prohibiting dynamite murders. He considers that those who trusted to the dynamite theory of resistance are now convinced of their error. There are many indications, however, that Stephens is in error. The dynamiters are exceedingly active, and the Irish here are strongly in sympathy with the cowardly and detestable policy.

The Damages Caused by the Recent Earthquake in England are estimated by Dr. Alexander Wallace, a clergyman at Colchester, to amount to half a million dollars. "The damage," he says, "is not confined to poor people's cottages; these have been wrecked by the hundred, tiles shaken off, chimneys thrown down through the roofs, and furniture spoiled—this is the common lot. The larger and better houses of farmers and professional men are more or less damaged, chimney-stacks fell through the roofs, spoiling carpets and furniture, filling the rooms with bricks and soot; side walls cracked, heavy walls twisted and rent, requiring repair done to the foundation. Mansions also, such as Donyland Hall, Wivenhoe Hall, and others, have suffered severe damage, so that the repairs in each case must cost hundreds of pounds. Lastly, churches have been wrecked. Langenhoe and Peldon churches, I fear, from a hasty inspection, are doomed; and others have been much damaged. The damage visible outside is only a small part of the mischief done; the twists and cracks of the substantial walls which require rebuilding from the foundations are the most serious."

New Information Respecting the Mahdi has been sent to the London Daily News by a special correspondent of that journal in the Soudan. He says: "The movement led by Mohammed Ahmed, the Mahdi, is a curious admixture of religious, political, and social fanaticism. It is at once a war against the Turk, the infidel, and that common enemy of disinherited humanity—the man of property. Under the new dispensation there are to be no poor and no rich. Every one is to have a little, and no one too much. The central idea of the movement may be described with sufficient accuracy as an effort to redistribute surplus property. The new formula would then run—all surplus property is robbery; and with this amendment the new champion of Islam might strike hands with the French and German socialists as a man after their own hearts, only somewhat more thorough. The more intelligent part of the population do not put any faith in his divine mission; but among the mass of the people, who are sunk in almost absolute ignorance, Mohammed Ahmed is undoubtedly regarded as a prophet sent by Allah, whom it is sinful to resist. 'Had he declared himself a king,' said an intelligent merchant the other day, 'no one would have followed him; but because he comes as a prophet the people fear to disobey him, lest they should expose themselves to the divine vengeance.'"

Mr. R. T. Booth, the American Temperance advocate, now in Australia, has been prostrated by illness in the midst of his successful campaign. His physician deems the case a serious one, and has ordered a complete cessation of work for some months. He prohibits Mr. Booth speaking in public again before November, at the earliest.

A Disreputable Nobleman in England Threatens to claim a privilege which is likely to raise a constitutional struggle. It appears that Lord St. Leonards, who is the grandson of the famous Lord High Chancellor, has committed a crime of a most disgusting and shameful character. He was brought before a judge who sent him to prison to await his trial, and refused to accept bail. The peers have an ancient privilege permitting them to be tried by the House of Lords and not by a common jury. That privilege the titled scamp states that he will claim unless he is rescued from his "disgraceful position." It was long ago decided that a peer's privileges could be ignored in cases of indictable offences. But several cases have occurred more recently which render this precedent of doubtful force. If he makes the claim and it is conceded, it would certainly result in a popular outcry which might prove irresistible for the abolition of all such remaining antiquated privileges of the Lords.

The Next Conference of the Evangelical Alliance will be held at Copenhagen, the capital of Denmark, on August 25th–30th. It was originally intended to hold the meetings in Stockholm, but difficulties connected with the state of the Lutheran Church in Sweden arose, and it was decided to make the Danish capital the place of assembly. Judging by the fact that about seven thousand persons were at the Basle Conference, it is anticipated that the gathering will be a very large one. Forty delegates are expected from the United States branch.

In a Former Issue, Mr. J. A. Whipple, 9 Hamilton Place, Boston, Mass., offered to lend to any of our subscribers who would send him the postage (6 cents) his precious book, "How to see Jesus with Fulness of Joy and Peace." He tells us that he has received so many letters thanking him for lending so blessed a work that he wishes us to insert the offer once more. He is very anxious that all who have not been able to read it will send at once and get a copy. We trust that many will take advantage of his kind offer. Those who wish to buy the book may do so for seventy-five cents.

OUR readers of German nationality will be interested in the illustrations which appear this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The wedding of the young Prince and Princess, whose portraits we give, together with that of the Emperor William, of Germany, was celebrated on Wednesday, April 30th, at Darmstadt, with all the pomp and luxury which the capitals of the smaller German States are wont to display on such occasions, and which are surpassed in costly splendor only by the semi-barbaric displays of the Russian Court. The number of military and civil officials present at the ceremony, in their rich uniforms, glittering with gold and silver, rendered the assembly one of the most brilliant of recent times.

The marriage did not derive its importance from the position of the bride and bridegroom, but from the near relationship in which they stand to the Imperial family of Germany and the Royal family of England, both of which families were represented at the ceremony—the German Emperor by his eldest son and heir and the English house by the Queen herself, the Prince and Princess of Wales, and their children.

The day was bright and warm, and the streets, which were crowded by the inhabitants and visitors, were gayly decked with flags of all sorts, those of Hesse, Prussia, and England predominating. Punctually at the time fixed for the civil ceremony—four o'clock—Queen Victoria drove to the Residence from the New Palace in a carriage drawn by four horses with two outriders, and surrounded by Hessian Horse Guards. The bridal couple followed in a carriage drawn by two horses.

THE CEREMONY OF THE CIVIL WEDDING.

By German law the civil wedding must precede the ecclesiastical—in fact, only the civil contract is valid in the eye of the law. This holds good all over Germany, and for all persons, from the Emperor himself to the lowest subject. In princely, especially in reigning families, this ceremony is performed, not as in ordinary cases by the Registrar of Marriages, but by the so-called "House Minister" of the family in question—in the present instance Baron Starck, who combines this office with those of Foreign Secretary of Hesse and Minister of State.

The ceremony was performed at a quarter to five in the Assembly Rooms, whither, when it was announced that the Imperial, Royal, and other illustrious guests were assembled, her Royal Highness the Princess Charles, preceded by the Master of the Ceremonies and the Chamberlains on duty, led the bride, her granddaughter, who, with her chief Lady-in-Waiting and the ladies of her suite, had already reached the rooms of his Royal Highness the Grand Duke. The civil ceremony was strictly private, only the highest personages receiving invitations. The scene is described as solemn and impressive, Baron Starck addressing to the bridal pair a few simple words, which are said to have deeply affected all present. His Royal Highness the Grand Duke then gave the order for the Church ceremony.

AN IMPOSING PROCESSION

of the bride's immediate relations and the chief officials first moved slowly through the White Hall, which was filled to overflowing with persons of high rank, who wished to congratulate the happy pair, and up the stairs into the inner court, where the church is situated. These took their places to the right and to the left of the altar, the ladies and gentlemen of their suite standing behind them. (As shown in frontispiece picture.) Then followed the bride and bridegroom, and a procession of royal personages, including: Her Majesty Queen Victoria; the Hereditary Grand Duke; the Princess Alice of Hesse; and the Princesses Louise, Victoria, and Maud of Wales; the Crown Prince of Germany and the Princess of Wales; the Prince of Wales and the Crown Princess of Germany; Prince William of Prussia and the Princess Beatrice; Prince Albert Victor of Wales and her Royal Highness the Langravine of Hesse; his Highness the Prince of Bulgaria and her Grand Ducal Highness the Princess Elizabeth; his Royal Highness Prince Frederick William of Hesse and Princess Irene; Prince William of Hesse, Prince Henri of Battenberg, and Prince Francis Joseph of Battenberg. The bride, led by his Royal Highness the Grand Duke and his Grand Ducal Highness Prince Alexander, came nearly last, with his Serene Highness the Bridegroom, led by her Royal Highness the Princess Charles and her Serene Highness the Princess of Battenberg.

THE BRIDE WORE A RICH DRESS of Irish poplin covered with point lace, a present from Queen Victoria, who also gave her one or two Indian shawls, the royal stock of which it appears is not yet exhausted. Her veil, which bore the arms of England and Hesse, was that worn by the Princess Alice, the lamented mother of the bride, at her wedding in 1862. The Queen herself was dressed in black, and wore a diadem and other jewelry. All the other princesses wore diamonds, those of the Princess of Wales and the Crown Princess of Germany attracting much attention by their splendor. All the Princes wore full uniform, the Crown Prince and the Prince of Wales as Field Marshals, and Prince William as a Hussar of the Prussian Guard. The bridegroom wore a British naval uniform.

THE SCENE INSIDE THE CHURCH.

Inside the consecrated building, which, although very small, was richly decorated, and presented a very effective appearance, there assembled about half-past four the members of the high nobility and the Diplomatic Body, together with a large number of distinguished persons who had received special invitations, arranged on the upper platform to the right and left of the pulpit. On the procession entering its members took their places to the right and left of the altar, the bride being led by her father to the left side of the kneeling-board before the altar, and the bridegroom taking his place to the right of it.

They were received by Court chaplains Drs. Bender and Greim. An interesting coincidence in connection with the ceremony was that Dr. Bender, the Court chaplain, who officiated, was the clergyman who baptized the bride in her infancy. Dr. Bender first addressed the bridal pair, reading to them the Gospel "Whom God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." Then followed another hymn, after which he performed the marriage ceremony, and amid the thunder of artillery

THE WEDDING RINGS WERE EXCHANGED.

The choir then sang, "The blessing of the Lord be on you; We bless you in the name of the Lord;" and the whole service, which was very short, lasting only thirty minutes, concluded by the singing of the benediction—"The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the love of God, and the fellowship of the Holy Ghost be with you all; Amen."

The Queen, who was deeply moved, then embraced the bride, and warmly pressed the hand of the bridegroom, who, in return, reverently raised her hand to his lips. The Grand Duke, Prince Alexander of Hesse, Princess Battenberg, mother of the bridegroom, and Princess Charles also personally congratulated the bride, the other friends and guests as they filed past the newly-married couple bowing. The procession then left the chapel in reverse order to that in which it had entered.

THE WEDDING DINNER

was very quiet, owing to the Court mourning occasioned by the recent death of the Duke of Albany, no speeches being delivered, and only one toast drunk, that to the health of the newly married couple. The Queen was not present but dined alone at the New Palace, and whither at nine o'clock the bride and bridegroom went to take leave of her, and then drove off to Jugenheim, there to spend the honeymoon.

THE CITY OF DARMSTADT,

though very small, is a centre of interest to the Royal family and the people of England, for in it there lived, during the early part of her married life, the tender-hearted daughter of the Queen, H.R.H. Princess Alice, whose memory is cherished as that of a gentlewoman whose sweet example and loving charities and wide-reaching sympathies must have tended to soften the asperities of life to so many in a different social scale, besides offering immeasurable comfort in her own Royal home. It is the capital of the Grand Duchy of Hesse-Darmstadt, and is situated in a sandy plain on the Darmbach, and consists of an old and a new town, the fine public square in the latter, the Louisen Platz, having on one side the Grand Ducal Palace and on another the Palace occupied, for some years, by Prince Louis of Hesse and Princess Alice.

The personal history of

is brief and uneventful. The bridegroom, Prince Louis, is the eldest son of Prince Alexander of Hesse, uncle of the Grand Duke of Hesse-Darmstadt. He was born at Battenberg on May 24th, 1854, and is now in the thirtieth year of his age. He, like so many of the German petty princelets, emigrated to England, where Prince Albert's influence was at that time potent, and was generally exercised to obtain the fat salaries of the court and places in the army and navy for his German friends, much to the disappointment and vexation of English aristocrats. The young Prince Louis was no exception to the rule. He was soon accommodated with an office and a good salary. He still holds the appointment of lieutenant in the Royal British Navy, and is nominally in command on board the royal yacht, Victoria and Albert, the real duty being performed by an English officer who does the work, while the German draws the pay. He also bears the rank of captain in the Grand Ducal Hessian Artillery. His brother, Prince Alexander, is the present Prince of Bulgaria.

THE PRINCESS VICTORIA is the eldest daughter of the Grand Duke Ludwig IV. of Hesse-Darmstadt, and of the late Princess Alice of Great Britain, and is consequently a granddaughter of Queen Victoria. She was born at Windsor, on April 5th, 1863, and has therefore just completed the twenty-first year of her age. She is said to possess some graces both of mind and manners, and is characterized by the charm of an universal and winning amiability. As her husband is in the British Navy, and as there are better chances for Germans in England under Queen Victoria for getting on in life, the couple will reside in that country, where she is sure, for her mother's sake as well as for her own, to receive a cordial welcome.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY, whose portrait is given on our frontispiece, with those of Prince Louis and the Princess Victoria, is one of the most familiar and puissant personages of modern European history. Until the unification of all the petty states of Fatherland in 1871, he was known as King William of Prussia. He is the son of Frederick William III. and of Princess Louise, of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and was born on March 22d, 1797, being, therefore, at the present time, eighty-seven years of age

He was brother to the late King of Prussia, and was educated as a soldier, taking part, while quite a youth, in the campaigns of 1813 and 1815 against France. In 1840 he was appointed Governor of Pomerania, which post he held till when he took refuge in England. When the mind of his brother gave way, in 1858, the Prince was created Regent of Prussia, and he immediately adopted a liberal and popular policy. His brother, Frederick William IV., dying without children, on January 2d, 1861, he succeeded, under the title of William I., to the crown, which he placed upon his own head at Konigsberg, on October 18th, on which occasion he emphatically asserted the stupid doctrine of the "right divine of kings."

THE REVOLUTION OF 1848 BROKE OUT,

In June, 1866, war was declared against Austria, and after a short campaign, in which William I. and the royal princes took part, Austria was compelled to make a humiliating peace. The powerful effects of the needle gun created quite a panic in the Austrian army, and her generals found it would be useless to prolong the struggle. In 1867 the King of Prussia became the head of the North German Confederation, comprising twenty-two States, representing a population of twenty-nine millions.

THE TERRIBLE FRANCO-GERMAN WAR OF 1870–71 followed, the ultimate result of which was the complete realization of Prince Bismarck's idea of a united Germany, and on January 18th, 1871, King William of Prussia was proclaimed German Emperor, within the Hall of Mirrors, in the Palace of the French Kings at Versailles, in the presence of the German princes, under the standards of the army before Paris, and surrounded by representatives of the regiments.

TWO ATTEMPTS AT ASSASSINATION.

On May 11th, 1871, an attempt was made to assassinate the Emperor in Berlin. The crime was committed by a young Socialist tinker, named Emil Hoedel, of Leipsic. He fired two shots from a revolver, but neither of them hit the Emperor, who stood up in his carriage, and asked whether they were aimed at him. A second attempt upon his life was made on June 2d, 1878. His Majesty was driving in the magnificent leafy avenue called Unter den Linden to the Zoological Gardens, when two shots were fired at him from the window of a house, and he was wounded in several places, but not seriously. The would-be assassin was a Dr. Nobiling, who afterward died of wounds he had inflicted upon himself.

William I. married on June 11th, 1829, the Princess Augusta, daughter of Charles Frederick, Grand Duke of Weimar. Their eldest child and only son, Frederick William, the Crown Prince of Germany, married the Queen's eldest daughter, the Princess Royal, on January 25th, 1858. The Emperor's golden wedding was celebrated at Berlin on June 11th, 1879.

Imperial and Royal personages, their relations and concerns naturally appear to the citizens of a great republic to occupy an inordinately large place in the thoughts of European society; but it must be remembered that old associations, such as those of courts and rulers, and of the days when kings were really the leaders of the people, are slow to die. There are many indications that they are dying, for in the most enlightened European nation the monarch has been stripped of all but the semblance of power, and in others his power has been curtailed. The social position accorded them is still imposing, but as people grow more intelligent and thoughtful they are less than ever inclined to intrust legislative or executive power to one family, to descend from father to son, taking the risk whether that son may be a wise man or a fool. The real difficulty, and thinking men of all ages have been puzzled by it, is, how to get the wisest and best of the nation to rule it. We know well enough that even our own system of election, probably the best and most successful the world has ever seen, does not always secure that end. History tells us how every other system has failed. The world will yet see in the rule of the Prince of Peace the problem gloriously solved. When He comes, whose "right it is to reign," who is wisdom and righteousness incarnate, He will rule until all enemies are put under His feet, and even those who now contend most earnestly for the rule of the chosen of the people will be satisfied, for "To Him every knee will bow . . . and every tongue confess that Jesus is Lord" (Phil. 2 : 11). So the ascription will be universal "To the only wise God our Saviour, be glory and majesty, dominion and power, both now and ever. Amen" (Jude 25).

GENERAL "CHINESE" GORDON AND THE BRICKLAYER.

THE brave hero who is now in peril of his life in Khartoum is, as our readers are aware, an earnest Christian worker. In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of January 31st was published a portrait of the distinguished soldier and a sketch of his life, in the course of which some instances of his Christian love and kindness were given. Since that was published other instances have come to light, from among which we select the following:

General Gordon, when enjoying a brief holiday from military duty, was once watching a young bricklayer at his work, when he perceived there was something on his mind which was making him unhappy. In his own pleasant way he soon entered into conversation with the young man, and almost before the latter knew it he was pouring out his tale of sorrow into the sympathetic heart of Colonel Gordon.

"Mother has left us, and gone away from home; and everything there is so miserable that it is not like home at all."

"What do you do with your evenings?"

"I cannot do anything with them, sir. There is no light, no warm place in which to sit, no quiet in which to read; so I stand about the streets when I have finished work."

"Come and spend your evenings at the Fort House. You will find books and papers there, and pen and ink, and other lads too."

"Thank you, colonel, I shall be very glad to do that."

So the young bricklayer became a nightly visitor, and had many a talk with the colonel. Very happy evenings they were, both to him who did good and to him who received it; for no one could be in the company of Gordon without being morally and spiritually elevated.

One evening the young bricklayer was at Fort House as usual, when he was suddenly taken ill, and hemorrhage of the lungs set in. The colonel at once sent for the doctor. He found the young man very ill, and likely to continue so for some time. What was to be done? He could not be sent in his present state to his own miserable home—that was not to be thought of. But the doctor and the colonel consulting together decided that he might be removed in a cab to the house of Mrs. S—, where he would receive all necessary attention.

The colonel delivered him into Mrs. S—'s charge, giving the Good Samaritan's injunction and assurance, "Take care of him; and whatsoever thou spendest more, when I come again I will repay thee."

At last the doctor advised that he should be removed to the local infirmary, for he was in a rapid consumption.

"Shall I see you there, colonel?" he asked, with wistful eyes.

"Certainly; I have a good many friends there, and I am often calling to see them."

"I know that I am going to die."

"But you are not afraid, for now you know who says, 'I am the Resurrection and the Life.' He will be as near to you in the infirmary as here, and as near to you in death as in life."

"Oh, yes, I know Him now!" And so he did; for, as the narrator said, "the colonel had led him to Christ by his life and teaching."

So the young bricklayer, who would do no more work, was taken to the infirmary, and was able to show to the patients there what Christianity could do for a dying man. "Read the Bible to me," he would say to the nurse; "there is nothing like it."

"But you are tired."

"Yes, very tired. I long to go to Jesus."

"Is there any one you would like to see before you die?" asked his good friend, the colonel, when he saw the end was near.

"Yes, I should like to see my mother." So the mother was telegraphed for, and arrived in time to see what the Saviour of the world is able to do for those who trust in Him. And then the young bricklayer went away, as he was longing to do, to be with Jesus, and to thank Him for sending him a friend and teacher in Colonel Gordon.

Another incident in the colonel's life at Gravesend was the following: A boy in the employ of a tradesman robbed him. The culprit was discovered, and the master angrily declared that he would send him to prison. The mother of the boy was almost heartbroken, but she had heard of Colonel Gordon, and knew that, like his Master, he never turned away from the sad and troubled ones who sought his help. So, with all a mother's earnestness, she went at once to the colonel, and, trying to check her tears, she told him the story.

"I cannot understand it, sir; he has always been an honest boy, and I do believe that this is the first and last time. If he could only have another chance! But if he is sent to prison I am afraid it will end in his ruin."

"I am afraid it will. I will do what I can for him. What would you like me to do?"

"Oh, sir, if you would intercede with his master, and persuade him not to send my boy to jail. I will be grateful to you all my life."

So the colonel went and saw the tradesman who had been robbed. He was very angry. He thought the boy deserved to be punished, and that it would do him good, and serve him right, and be a warning to him and to others, if he had a few months in prison. But Gordon pleaded very earnestly for him, and every one respected the colonel, and was glad to do as he wished.

"What will become of the boy? I cannot keep him here now."

"Oh, no, of course you cannot. But if you will promise not to prosecute him I will take charge of him, and perhaps we can make a man out of the rascal yet. At least, I should like to try, if you will let me."

"Very well, colonel. I will not punish him, and I hope he may repay your kindness."

"Thank you very much."

The colonel spoke very gravely to the boy, telling him how he had barely escaped going to prison, and pointing out to him how he had broken the laws of God as well as man. "But you shall have a chance," he said. "Your master has kindly forgiven you, and if you ask God He will forgive you also. And I will help you, if you behave well in the future and try to do your best. Will you?"

"Yes, sir, indeed I will," said the boy, through his tears.

"How would you like to go to sea?" asked the colonel.

"I should like it very much indeed, sir."

"Very well. Now you must go to school for a year. I will pay for you, and you must attend to your lessons and try to learn as much as you possibly can in the time. Will you?"

"Yes, sir, I will try to be a good boy in everything."

"You must come up and see me sometimes at the Fort House, and you must spend your evenings at the Boys' Home, and I shall see you there. By these means I shall know whether you are keeping your promise. If at the end of twelve months I find that you have really been a good boy, then I will get you a berth in a good ship, and you shall go to sea."

The boy thanked the colonel, and so did his mother; and, in fact, they continue to do so, though, perhaps, he does not know it, to this day. My informant says: "The lad is now a man, and goes to sea, while his mother resides in Gravesend still. He has a good character, and both the mother and the sailor bless the name of Gordon, who saved the lad from prison and the mother from disgrace."

WALL STREET DEFALCATION.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, May 25, 1884.

"As the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool."—JEREMIAH 17: 11.

A Sorry Predicament—Too many Fortunes Under One Pair of Wings—A Mighty Street—Its Historical Associations—What Caused Black Wednesday—Extravagance the Primal Cause—God Loves Beauty and Adornment—A Line to be Drawn—Sailing too near Shore—John Randolph's Discovery—Pernicious Extravagance—Two Million Dollars for Theatres—Rum and Cigars—In Dress—A Domestic Tragedy—The Cause of Pauperism—Funeral Extravagance—An Unpaid Undertaker's Bill—A Dying Actress.

ALLUSION is here made to a well-known fact in natural history. If a partridge or a quail or a robin brood the eggs of another species, the young will not stay with the one that happened to brood them, but at the first opportunity will assort with their own species. Those of us who have been brought up in the country have seen the dismay of the farmyard hen, having brooded aquatic fowls, when after a while they tumble into their natural element, the water. So my text suggests that a man may gather under his wings the property of others, but it will, after awhile escape; it will leave the man in and make him feel very silly.

There are those who spread out their wings until they get four, five, ten, fifteen fortunes under them, and the financial incubation seems to be going on very prosperously, when suddenly they chip the shell, and some take to the water, and some take to the air and leave the nest empty. "As the partridge sitteth on eggs, and hatcheth them not; so he that getteth riches and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool." Not so with the fortunes of the Van Rensselaers and the Peabodys, gotten in industry and supervised in righteousness, and by the law of the eternal God going down from generation to generation.

Across the island of New York in 1685 a wall of earth and stone was built—a wall cannon-mounted to keep back the savages. Along this wall ran a street, and as the street kept the line of the wall it was appropriately called Wall Street. Short, narrow, unarchitectural, and yet unique in its history, and, excepting Lombard Street, London, the

MIGHTIEST STREET IN THE WORLD.

There the United States government was born. There Washington held his levees. There Mrs. Adams and Mrs. Arnold and Mrs. Caldwell and Mrs. Knox and other brilliant women of the Revolution displayed their charms. There preached Witherspoon, Jonathan Edwards, and George Whitefield. There Dr. John Mason chided Alexander Hamilton for writing the Constitution without any God in it. There negroes were sold in the slave-mart. There criminals were harnessed to wheelbarrows and compelled to draw burdens. There they were lashed through the street behind carts to which they were fastened.

That street has seen the coronation and the burial of ten thousand fortunes. The abode of just the opposites—unswerving integrity and tip-top scoundrelism, Heaven-descended charity and bloodless Shylockism. The history of Wall Street would be the history of the commerce of America. I would like to put the ploughshare in at the curbstone in front of Trinity Church and drive clear through to Wall Street Ferry, and so it shall go if the horses are strong enough to draw the plough.

We are all stunned with the recent defalcations in Wall Street, and there is no more absorbing question in America to-day, than this:

WHAT CAUSED "BLACK WEDNESDAY?"

What caused "Black Friday?" What has caused all the black days of financial disaster with which Wall Street has been connected for the last forty years? Some say it is the credit system. Something back of that. Some say it is the spirit it of gambling ever and anon becoming epidemic. Something back of that. Some say it is the sudden shrinkage in the value of securities, which even the most honest and intelligent men could not have foreseen. Something back of that. I will give you the primal cause of all these disturbances. It is the

of modern society which impels a man to spend more money than he can honestly make, and he goes into Wall Street in order to get the means for inordinate display; and sometimes the man is to blame, and sometimes his wife, and oftener both. Five thousand dollars income, ten thousand dollars, twenty thousand dollars income are not enough for a man to keep up the style of living he proposes, and therefore he steers his bark toward the maelstrom. Other men have suddenly snatched up fifty or a hundred thousand dollars—why not he? The present income of the man not being large enough, he must move earth and hell to catch up with his neighbors. Others have country seat—so must he. Others have extravagant caterer—so must he. Others have palatial residence—so must he.

Extravagance is the cause of all the defalcations of the last forty years, and if you will go through the history of all the great panics and the great financial disturbances, no sooner have you found the story than right back of it you find the story of how many horses the man had, how many carriages the man had, how many residences in the country the man had, how many banquets the man gave—always, and not one exception for the last forty years, either directly or indirectly extravagance the cause.

Now, for the elegances and the refinements and the decorations of life I cast my vote. While I am considering this subject a basket of flowers is handed in—flowers paradisaical in their beauty. White calla with a green background of begonia. A cluster of heliotropes nestling in some geraniums. Sepal and perianth bearing on them the marks of God's finger. When I see that basket of flowers they persuade me that God loves beauty and adornment and decoration. God might have made the earth so as to supply the gross demands of sense, but left it without adornment or attraction. Instead of the variegated colors of the seasons, the earth might have worn an unchanging dull brown. The tree might have put forth its fruit without the prophecy of leaf or blossom. Niagara might have come down in gradual descent without thunder-winged spray.

Look out of your window any morning after there has been a dew, and see whether God loves jewels. Put a crystal of snow under a microscope, and see what God thinks of architecture. God commanded the priest of olden time to have his robe adorned with a wreath of gold, and the hem of his garment to be embroidered in pomegranates. The earth sleeps, and God blankets it with the brilliants of the night sky. The world wakes, and God washes it from the burnished laver of the sunrise. So I have not much patience with a man who talks as though decoration and adornment and the elegances of life are a sin when they are divinely recommended. But there is between adornment and decorations that we can afford and those we cannot afford, and when a man crosses that line he becomes culpable. I cannot tell you what is extravagant for you. You cannot tell me what is extravagant for me. What is right for a queen may be squandering for a duchess. What may be economical for you, a man with larger income, will be wicked waste for me, with smaller income. There is no iron rule on this subject. Every man before God and on his knees must judge what is extravagance, and when a man goes into expenditures beyond his means he is extravagant. When a man buys anything he cannot pay for, he is extravagant.

There are families in all our cities who can hardly pay their rent, and who owe all the merchants in the neighborhood, and yet have an apparel unfit for their circumstances, and are all the time sailing so near shore that business misfortune or an attack of sickness prepares them for pauperism. You know very well there are thousands of families in our great cities who stay in neighborhoods until they have exhausted all their capacity to get trusted. They stay in the neighborhoods until the druggists will let them have no more medicines, and the butchers will give them no more meat, and the bakers will give them no more bread, and the grocerymen will give them no more sugar. Then they find the region unhealthy, and they hire a carman, whom they never pay, to take them to some new quarters, where the merchants, the druggists, the butchers, the bakers, and the grocerymen come and give them the best rounds of beef and the best sugars and the best merchandise of all sorts, until they find out that the only compensation they are going to get is the acquaintance of the patrons. There are at least five thousand such thieves as that in Brooklyn. You see I call them by the right name, for if a man buys anything he does not mean to pay for he is a thief.

Of course, sometimes men are flung of misfortunes and they cannot pay. I know men who are just as honest in having failed as other men are honest in succeeding. I suppose there is hardly a man who has gone through life but there have been some times when he has been so flung of misfortune he could not meet his obligations. But all that I put aside. There are a multitude of people who buy that which they never intend to pay for, for which there is no reasonable expectation they will ever be able to pay. Now, why not save the merchant as much as you can? Why not go some day to his store, and when nobody is looking, just shoulder the ham or the spare-rib, and in modest silence steal away? That would be less criminal, because in the other way you take not only the man's goods, but you take the time of the merchant and the time of his accountant, and you take the time of the messenger who brought you the goods. Now, if you must steal, steal in a way to do as little damage to the trader as possible.

John Randolph arose in the American Senate when a question of national finance was being discussed, and stretching himself to his full height, in a shrill voice he cried out: "Mr. Chairman, I have discovered which turns everything into gold: Pay as you go!" Society has got to be reconstructed on this subject, or these times of defalcation will never end. You have no right to ride in a carriage for which you are hopelessly in debt to the wheelwright who furnished the landau, and to the horse-dealer who provided the blooded span, and to the harness-maker who caparisoned the gay steeds, and to the liveryman who has provided the stabling, and to the driver who with rosetted hat sits on the coach-box.

Oh, I am so glad it is not the absolute necessities of life which send people out into dishonesties and fling them into misfortunes. It is almost always the superfluities. God has promised us a house, but not a palace; raiment, but not chinchilla; food, but not canvasback duck. I am yet to see one of these great panics, or one of these Wall Street defalcations, which is not connected in some way with extravagance.

Extravagance accounts for the disturbance of national finances. Aggregations are made up of units, and when one half of the people of this country owe the other half, how can we expect financial prosperity? Every four years we get a great spasm of virtue, and when a President is to be elected we say, "Now, down with the old administration, and let us have another Secretary of the Treasury, and let us have a new deal of things, and then we will get over all our perturbation." I do not care who is President, or who is Secretary of the Treasury, or how much breadstuffs goes out of the country, or how much gold is imported, until we learn to pay our debts, and it becomes a general theory in this country that men must buy no more than they can pay for—until that time comes there will be no permanent prosperity. Look at the

take the one fact that New York every year pays two million dollars for theatrical amusements. While once in a while a Henry Irving or an Edwin Booth or a Joseph Jefferson thrills a great audience with tragedy, you know as well as I do that the vast majority of the theatres of New York are as debased as debased they can be, as unclean as unclean they can be, and as damnable as damnable they can be. Two million dollars—the vast majority of those dollars going up in a wrong direction.

Ninety-five millions paid in this country for cigars and tobacco a year. One thousand five hundred million dollars paid for strong drink in one year in this country. With such extravagance, pernicious extravagance, can there be any permanent prosperity? Business men, cool-headed business men, is such a thing a possibility? One thousand five hundred million dollars for rum. These extravagances also account, as I have already hinted, for the positive crimes, the forgeries, the of the banks. The store on Broadway and the office on Wall Street swamped by the residence on Madison Square. The father's, the husband's craft capsized by carrying too much domestic sail. That is what springs the leak in the merchant's money till. That is what cracks the pistols of the suicides. That is what tears down Marine Bank. That is what stops insurance companies. That is what halts this nation again and again in its triumphal march of prosperity. In the presence of this audience to-day, and the American people so far as I can get their attention, I want to arraign this monster curse of extravagance, and I want you to pelt it with your scorn and hurl at it your anathema.

Look at the one fact that it is a matter of solid statistics, that in this country, in the cities of New York and Brooklyn—I will narrow it down—in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, it is estimated that there are now over five thousand women whose apparel costs them over two thousand dollars a year each. Things have got to such a pass that when we cry over our sins in church, we wipe the tears away with a hundred-and-fifty-dollar pocket-handkerchief! I show you in five acts:

Act the first.—A home, plain and beautiful. Enter newly married pair. Enter contentment. Enter as much happiness as ever gets in one home.

Act the second.—Enter discontent. Enter desire for larger expenditure. Enter envy. Enter jealousy.

Act the third.—Enter the queenly dressmakers. Enter the French milliners. Enter all costly plate and all great extravagances.

Act the fourth.—Tip-top of society. Princes and princesses of New York and Brooklyn floating in and out. Everything on a large and magnificent scale. Enter contempt for other people.

Act the fifth and last.—Enter the assignee. Enter the sheriff. Enter the creditors. Enter humiliation. Enter the wrath of God. Enter the contempt of society. Enter death and hell. Now, drop the silk curtain. The farce is ended and the lights are out.

I called it a tragedy. That is a misnomer. It is a farce.

Extravagance accounts for much of the

PAUPERISM.

Who are these people whom you have to help? Many of them are the children of parents who had plenty, lived in luxury, had more than they needed, spent all they had, spent more too, then died and left their families in poverty. Some of those who call on you now for aid had an ancestry that supped on Burgundy and woodcock. I could name a score of men who have every luxury. They smoke the best cigars, and they drink the finest wines, and they have the grandest surroundings, and when they die their families will go on the cold charity of the world. Now, the death of such a man is a grand larceny. He swindles the world as he goes into his coffin, and he deserves to have his bones sold to the medical museum for anatomical specimens, the proceeds to furnish bread for his children.

I know it cuts close. I did not know but some of you in high dudgeon would get up and go out. You stand it well! Some of you make a great swash in life, and after a while you will die, and ministers will be sent for to come and stand by your coffin and lie about your excellences; but they will not come. If you send for me, I will tell you what my text will be: "He that provideth not for his own, and especially for those of his own household, is worse than an infidel." And yet we find Christian men, men of large means, who sometimes talk eloquently about the Christian Church and about civilization, expending everything on themselves and nothing on the cause of God, and they crack the back of their Palais Royal glove in trying to hide the one cent they put in the Lord's treasury. What an apportionment! Twenty thousand dollars for ourselves, and one cent for God. Ah! my friends, this extravagance accounts for a great deal of what the cause of God suffers.

GRAND FUNERALS.

And the desecration goes on, even to the funeral day. You know very well that there are men who die solvent, but the expenses are so great before they get under ground they are insolvent. There are families that go into penury in wicked response to the demands of this day. They put in casket and tombstone that which they ought to put in bread. They wanted bread, you give them a tombstone.

One would think that the last two obligations people would be particular about would be to the physician and the undertaker. Because they are the two last obligations, those two professions are almost always cheated. They send for the doctor in great haste, and he must come day and night. They send for the undertaker amid the great solemnities, and often these two men are the very last to be met with compensation. Merchants sell goods, and the goods are not paid for; they take back the goods, I am told. But there is no relief in this case. The man spent all he had in luxuries and extravagance while he lived, and then he goes out of the world and has left nothing for his family, nothing for the obsequies, and as he goes out of the world he steals the doctor's pills and the undertaker's slippers. I was reading in a New York paper the other day an account of the obsequies in a family of very moderate estate, and the aggregate was three thousand dollars. A man in New York, of moderate estate, dies. He has lived in extreme luxury. He departs this life. The family, desirous of keeping up the magnificence, orders the following things. They were produced, and never paid for to this day:

Casket, covered with Lyons velvet, silver mouldings	$850
Heavy plated handles	60
Solid silver plate, engraved in Roman letters	75
Ten linen scarfs	150
Floral decorations	225
Music and quartette choir at the house	40
Twenty carriages, walking to the cemetery	140
Then fifteen other important expenditures amounting to	336
Making an aggregate of	$1876

And all that to get one poor mortal to his last home! and never paid for. Swindled his family. Swindled the world. He is swindling it now. It is one of the great curses of this day, the extravagance, the wicked extravagance of the country.

And then look how the cause of God is impoverished. Men give so much sometimes for their indulgences they have nothing for the cause of God and religion. Twenty-two million dollars expended in this country a year for religious purposes; but what are the twenty-two millions expended for religion compared with the ninety-five millions expended on cigars and tobacco, and then one thousand five hundred millions of dollars spent for rum, accursed rum? So a man who had a fortune of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars, or what amounted to that, in London, spent it all in indulgences chiefly in gluttonies, and sent hither and yon for all the delicacies, and often had a meal that would cost one or two hundred dollars for himself. Then he was reduced to one guinea, with which he bought a rare bird, had it cooked in best style, ate it, took two hours for digestion, walked out on Westminster Bridge and jumped into the Thames. On a large scale what men are doing on a small scale.

Oh, my friends, let us take our stand against the extravagances of society. Do not pay for things which are frivolous when you may lack the necessities. Do not put one month's wages or salary into a trinket, just one trinket.

KEEP YOUR CREDIT GOOD

by seldom asking for any. Pay! Do not starve a whole year to afford one Belshazzar's carnival. Do not buy a coat of many colors, and then in six months be out at the elbows. Flourish not, as some people I have known, who took apartments at a fashionable hotel and had elegant drawing-rooms attached, and then vanished in the night, not even leaving their compliments for the landlord. I tell you, my friends, in the day of God's judgment, we will not only have to give an account for the way we made our money, but for the way we spent it. We have got to leave all the things that surround us now.

Alas! if any of you in the dying hour feel like who asked that the casket of jewels be brought to her, and then turned them over with her pale hand and said, "Alas! that I have to leave you so soon!" Better in that hour have one treasure of heaven than the bridal trousseau of a Marie Antoinette, or to have been seated with Caligula at a banquet which cost its thousands of dollars, or to have been carried to our last resting place with senators and princes as pall-bearers. They that consecrate their wealth, their time, their all to God shall be held in everlasting remembrance, while I have the authority of this Book for announcing that the name of the wicked shall rot.

The American Bible Society Held its Sixty-eighth annual meeting on May 8th. An arm-chair was standing in front of the platform, to which Mr. Charles Tracey called attention. It is the chair in which the presiding officer sat just sixty-eight years before, May 8th, 1816, when the American Bible Society was organized. It is in excellent preservation. It was for a long time in the possession of John Pintard, Esq., but passed into another family, and was bought by Timothy Hedges, Esq., for $100, and by him presented to the Society. From the report presented, it appears that the receipts of the year for general purposes were $640,719.06. Of this amount $353,774.68 were received for books and on purchase account; $156,372.80 from legacies; $57,170.05 in donations from auxiliary societies, churches, and individuals; $31,624.34 from rentals, and the balance from interest and other sources. Besides which, $3750 have been added to the trust fund, the interest of which alone is applicable for general purposes. The disbursements for manufacturing and for all other general purposes were $762,106.16.

WOMAN'S WORK IN CHINA.

I SHALL never forget my first sight of T'ai-yuen, after a thirty-three days' journey from the coast. The day after my arrival I was asked to give a lesson to the children in singing. I made up my mind that learn the language I would; so I got from Miss Horne the words for "stand up," "sit down," "sing loudly," "sing softly," and with these four sentences I went to work, and the children learned the tune that morning. After four months' residence I felt it was time for me to begin evening prayers with the children. The first night I broke down in the middle, but the next night the Lord helped me, and I did not break down. After the first twelve months I was able to be understood in all the villages.

The Christian life of some of the children very much cheered me. One little girl, called "Little Loving Heart," was an affectionate soul. When the people called to see me, she was the first one to ask them, "Are you a Christian?" though she was only eleven at the time. I was very pleased with an incident that occurred last summer. The gatekeeper was sweeping the courtyard, and she was sitting on the stone steps. "Elder brother," she said, "you are very old now; you are over seventy." The old man said, "Yes, I am getting on now." "You will die soon." He did not care to answer that, and he gave two or three silent sweeps with the broom. "You know you will die soon," she repeated, "because a lifetime is seventy years, and you are past that, and where will your soul go?" Then she told him, in a child's own words, about the bright kingdom above; she spoke of the pearly gates and the streets of gold, and then she added, as the crowning joy of all, "The Lord Jesus Himself will be there!" Then she told him of hell, which the Chinese can picture in the darkest colors; and she put it to him, "Which are you going to? You know you can go to heaven, because Jesus died on Calvary; but will you go?" I felt I could go down on my knees and thank God for that dear little soul. She reads the Bible very clearly, and we look forward to her going among her own people by and by. She was one of the girls picked up in the terrible famine.

One afternoon I was at needlework with the children, and two in particular drew my attention. One was making a bedquilt and another a small sleeve. The little quiltmaker, who was a Christian of eight years old, saw her companion was in trouble; the sleeve had been unpicked several times, and not without tears the last time, for the child was lazy, and did not get on well with her work. The Christian child was a better needlewoman; and she left her work, and putting her arm round the other's neck whispered something to her. Then she asked me, "Might they both leave the room?" I said, "Yes," and they went out to their bedroom in the same courtyard. The bedrooms generally have paper windows, which let in the light and make the rooms private, but do not keep in sound, so I could hear distinctly this girl of eight pleading with the Lord in this way: "Our Father in Heaven, help little Lan-tsz to do her work well; help her not to have to unpick it, for Jesus' sake, Amen;" and then she turned to the other girl, and said, "You must pray, too," and the other one prayed, but so timdily that I could not hear the words. Then they came back into the school and took up their tasks, and soon both were finished. Neither of them told me; neither of them knew I heard, but I was glad that these children did believe in the power of prayer.

You may be interested in the case of an old lady who had been led to love the Lord by Miss Crickmay. We wondered she did not ask to be baptized, but she seemed to have some difficulty about it. We are careful not to press any one to be baptized, but we had no doubt that this woman was converted, and one day I went and sat down by her side and said, "Now, Han Tasao (that is, elder sister), what is the difficulty? You do love the Lord Jesus?" "Yes, I do love Him." "You do not doubt that He has taken away your sins?" "No." I said, "Where is the doubt?" Then the old woman said—tears coming down her cheeks—"You know Jesus said to His disciples: 'Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel.' I am a poor old woman, nearly seventy, and nearly blind; I cannot go into all the world and preach the Gospel. I am willing to tell my husband and son and his wife when he marries; I am willing to tell my neighbors, and I could, perhaps, go to one or two villages; but I cannot go into all the world. Tell me if the Lord will accept this of a poor old woman of my age?" I felt as if I could take the old woman in my arms, and I said, "That is all the Lord Jesus wants; He wants each of us to do our best." Then she looked at me, with her eyes full of earnestness, and said, "Tell me, can I be a disciple, and be baptized without going into foreign countries?" I told her she could, and she replied, "Then I am ready to be baptized whenever you like."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

"Nobody to Speak To."—Mr. Riddell Said at a recent meeting: "I shall never forget the look of fear which I once saw upon the face of an elder of the church, as he lay on his deathbed. I urged him to pray to God for light, so that he might grasp the promises of God, and thus be able, even at that late hour, to do what he should have done in his early youth, namely, to trust in Christ; but the mournful reply was, 'Oh, sir, when I come to pray, there's nobody there to speak to.'"

A Policeman Becomes a Missionary.—The Rev. Mr. Andrew related: "A young man on his way to the theatre heard our evangelistic choir singing in the open air. Accepting the invitation given by the leader, he entered the church, and was converted to Christ that night. Soon after he became a night policeman, but did not feel that it was his vocation, so he came to my house one day and told me: 'My heart is burning to become a missionary in Africa, to preach the Gospel of Christ to the poor heathen; what shall I do to attain my object?' I took him to Mr. Moir, of the African Lakes Company, who gave him a three years' engagement, and he is at present preaching the Gospel to the heathen. To-day I got a little box from him, containing an artistically made gold ring, a lion's claw, and other curiosities, sent as a memento."

Trying to Get in at the Wrong Door.—The Rev. Mr. Riddell narrated the following: "When I began my ministry in Dundee, I had the privilege of meeting many of those who were blessed under the preaching of the sainted Murray M'Cheyne. I was told of one case of conversion which is rather peculiar. The person was much troubled, his mind was filled with gloomy darkness, and he had no peace nor rest. One day as M'Cheyne was preaching to Christians, not to those outside of Christ's fold, the man got peace. After the service he went round to the vestry to see the minister, who did not need to inquire if the visitor had got peace, it shone in his face; so he simply asked, 'How did you get it?' He answered: 'All the time I've been trying to enter in at the saints' door, but while you were speaking I saw my mistake, and entered in at the sinners' door.' It is the only way; you need not come to God as a saint, or a pretty good sort of a person, but simply as a sinner, wanting and needing salvation. If you do so in Christ's name, you will get it."

A Dead Twig on a Living Tree.—Mr. Ralston related: "A young lad was playing in a garden, and noticed a tree which was bearing fruit and leaves luxuriantly on all the branches except one little twig, which was hanging dry and withered. This twig riveted his attention; all the other branches passed unheeded, so much was he taken up with the useless twig. Searching for and finding the gardener, the lad asked, 'What makes that twig so dry and barren?' The man answered, 'Climb up the tree, and you will soon find out.' The lad did so, and saw that some person had tied a piece of string round the twig close to the trunk of the tree, thus stopping the flow of sap and killing the little branch. The lad is now a minister of the Gospel in Edinburgh, but he has never forgotten the lesson he learned from that dead twig; it was, that when he felt his soul getting hard and dry there was some sin gradually tightening round his heart, stopping the flow of the Holy Spirit into his soul, and thus he was in danger of becoming dead while attached to a living trunk. To avoid this fate, he fled to Christ, the fountain of life, and He it is who looses all the bonds of sin from us, so that His own life may flow into us."

Among Red Rags in a Paper Mill.—At a Mizpah meeting in Glasgow recently, Mr. Rae said: "A young man got an important situation in a paper mill. His master took him over the works, and showed him all the chemical and mechanical processes by which the different colors were extracted from rags. Pointing to some Turkey-red cotton, he said, 'These red rags can only be made into red blotting-paper, because nothing can take out the color.' With the proud boastfulness of an ignorant youth, the young man replied, 'I will soon discover a process to do it.' 'Well, if you do,' said the gentleman, 'I will give you one hundred pounds.' He tried and tried again, but failed as thousands have done before. Every shred of the cloth was destroyed, but the color remained. God in His unspeakable condescension to our need and helplessness as sinners stained and dyed with sin, uses the strongest words to prove that He will make us clean. He says, 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool'" (Isa. 1 : 18).

A Thirsty Evangelist's Search.—Mr. Anderson said: "A well-known evangelist was crossing a dry, bare moor, on which he was exposed to the burning rays of the noonday sun. When he started in the morning on his journey he was quite fresh and buoyant, but now he was ready to sink with fatigue and thirst. In his distress he looked for water; there was none to be seen; but at a little distance off he saw a house toward which he made as speedily as possible. When he reached it he saw that the door was open, but there was no person about to whom he could apply for water, so he boldly entered the open door and approached the table to seek means to allay his thirst. He took up vessel after vessel, but they were all unclean. Turning away, much disappointed, he looked about to see if there was a clean vessel in the house, but there was not one. As he finished his fruitless search, the woman of the house entered, and in a trice had a vessel clean and filled to the brim with sparkling water. God seeks clean vessels for His work, and there is only one way by which we can be clean for His purposes, and that way is to empty ourselves of self, and allow Jesus to take full possession of our souls and bodies."

A Minister's Peril among Cowboys.—Major Colquhoun relates: "Among the Western States of America, Texas is the great cattle State. Some years ago the men who owned the cattle, and those in their employment who rode about looking after the beasts, were ignorant, lawless, godless men, and mostly outcasts and fugitives from the law-abiding districts. The owner of one large ranch had grown so rich that he required twenty men to attend his cattle, but he was as ignorant and careless as the meanest man on his farm. He had a little daughter whom he loved tenderly. She was his pride and joy. Rich as he was, he could not save her from illness and the grasp of death. She died. His wife pitifully implored him to get Christian burial for the child. The cattle-owner therefore rode fifty miles to the nearest minister, and brought him to the ranch. At the minister's request he gathered in his twenty men to hold a service, which was opened by prayer. When the minister knelt in prayer, the man was horror-struck; for, knowing the nature of his men, he feared they could not resist the chance of shooting a man on his knees with eyes closed in the attitude of pleading for mercy. In an instant he pulled out his revolver and levelled it toward the men, who knew his meaning, and kept their hands motionless, knowing that if they moved their master would shoot them dead on the spot. The man of God was not aware of his danger, but being in the paths of duty, the Lord whom he served protected him, as He will protect and guard all who are fulfilling His commands. 'Fear not, for I am with you' (Isa. 41 : 10), is the promise He gives to His servants. 'If God be for us, who can be against us?'"

WHY THE SECOND ADVENT MUST PRECEDE THE MILLENNIUM.

By Rev. John T. Duffield, D.D.,
Professor of Mathematics in Princeton College.

4. THE doctrine of a millennium before the Advent is inconsistent with the Saviour's solemn in the Gospel record, and illustrated and enforced again and again by parable, "Watch, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh" (Matt. 24 : 42 ; 25 : 13 ; Mark 13 : 33, 35 ; Luke 21 : 36). "And what I say unto you I say unto all, watch" (Mark 13 : 37).

INJUNCTION, FIVE TIMES REPEATED

Now, the point to which we would direct attention is, that the duty here enjoined is not simply that of believing that the Lord will certainly come again at some time in the distant future—it is that of watching for His coming as an event ever imminent. Watching for the occurrence of an expected event, and believing that an event will occur after a long interval of time, are two entirely different states of mind. Now, can we believe that when the Lord enjoined the former, He intended to enjoin the latter? Further, the reason annexed to the injunction determines its meaning beyond the possibility of excusable misapprehension. We are to do what is here commanded because we "Know not the hour when the Son of Man cometh." The duty has respect, not to the certainty of the event, but to the uncertainty as to the time of its occurrence.

So also would the accompanying parables be wholly irrelevant, if the Coming of the Lord is not to be regarded as an event ever imminent. "If the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched." We are to be expecting the Lord's Coming as the virgins the coming of the bridegroom, as servants the return of their master, not knowing whether he would come at "even, or at midnight, or at cock-crowing, or in the morning." The offence of "the evil servant" was not that he denied or doubted the certainty of the Master's return—that he acknowledges in the very language attributed to him. His offence was "saying in his heart"—what many of the Lord's servants nowadays say with their lips, and even insist on as an article of faith—"My lord delayeth his coming."

5. The doctrine is also inconsistent with the repeated and explicit teaching of the New Testament, that the manifestation of the Messianic Kingdom and the Second Advent are to be

SYNCHRONOUS EVENTS

(Luke 19 : 12-27). "He spake a parable because they were nigh unto Jerusalem, and because they thought that the Kingdom of God should immediately appear. He said, therefore, A certain nobleman went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return. And when he was returned, having received the kingdom," etc. We are here taught two things—first, that the disciples were not in error in expecting a kingdom to be manifested here on the earth, under the personal reign of the Messiah. Their error was as to the time of the manifestation. The correction of their error as to the time, is an implied acknowledgment that their expectation was correct as to the fact. Secondly, we are expressly taught that the Kingdom which Christ has gone into the heavens to receive of the Father, is to be manifested at, and not before, His return again to this earth.

Luke 21 : 24-31—The Saviour here predicts events that are to immediately precede the Advent—"signs in the sun and moon and in the stars, and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity—and then shall they see the Son of Man coming in a cloud with power and great glory. And He spake a parable, Behold the fig tree and all the trees, when they now shoot forth ye see and know that summer is nigh at hand. So likewise when ye see these things come to pass, know ye that the Kingdom of God is nigh at hand." The coming of the Son of Man, and the Kingdom of God, are here assumed to be synchronous events—with respect to the time of their occurrence, the one is referred to as identical with the other.

6. That we have not misapprehended the New Testament doctrine respecting the Millennium is confirmed—were confirmation necessary—by the fact that understood the Apostles to teach that the Second Coming of the Lord was an event ever imminent.

They accordingly "looked for" the Advent with longing desire and expectation—not (as many misapprehend and misrepresent the doctrine of the Apostolic Church on this subject) with expectation that the Advent would certainly occur in their day, but, that for aught that was revealed, it might occur in their day. The Corinthian Christians are commended by Paul, in that they "came behind in no gift, waiting for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 1 : 5). The conversion of the Thessalonians from heathenism to Christianity is described as "turning from idols to serve the living and the true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven" (1 Thess. 1 : 10). So common was this expectation in the Apostolic Church, that Christians were designated by this characteristic of their piety. "Unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation" (Heb. 9 : 28). "There is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous Judge, shall give me in that day; and not to me only, but unto all them that love His appearing." (II Tim. 4 : 8). See also Rom. 8 : 19-23 ; Phil. 3 : 20 ; 1 Thess. 4 : 15 ; 5 : 10 ; Titus 2 : 13 ; II Peter 3 : 11-13.

Is it credible that a doctrine which uninspired men at the present day have no difficulty in stating in terms that cannot be misunderstood, those holy men, who spake and wrote "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," not only failed to teach intelligibly, but even commended the misapprehension of those who were led into error by their teaching? Or, if we accept the inevitable conclusion that the inspired Apostles did not teach this doctrine, by what authority do any teach it now?

7. The doctrine of the Pre-Millennial Advent continued to be the unquestioned faith of the Church until near

THE CLOSE OF THE THIRD CENTURY

—that is, until the time of Origen. He taught that "the Scriptures are of little use if we understand them as they are written;" and, with reference to his allegorizing—now called spiritualizing—method of interpretation, Milner says: "No man, not altogether unsound and hypocritical, ever injured the Church more than Origen did."

In proof of our main statement above, the following authorities may suffice:

Mosheim says: "The prevailing opinion that Christ was to come and reign a thousand years among men before the final dissolution of the world, had met with no opposition previous to the time of Origen."

Gibbon, who is at least an unprejudiced witness, says: "The ancient and popular doctrine of the Millennium was carefully inculcated by a succession of Fathers from Justin Martyr and Irenæus, who conversed with the immediate disciples of the Apostles, down to Lactantius, who was the preceptor of the son of Constantine. It appears to have been the reigning sentiment of orthodox believers." He adds: "As long as this error (as he calls it) was permitted to subsist in the Church, it was productive of the most salutary effects on the faith and practice of Christians."

Not to needlessly extend this list of authorities, we would only add the testimony of Whitby, the father of the modern anti-millenarian theory. In his "Treatise on Tradition" he candidly acknowledges, "The doctrine of the millennium passed among the best of Christians, for two hundred and fifty years, as a tradition apostolical, and as such is delivered by many fathers of the second and third centuries, who speak of it as a tradition of our Lord and His Apostles, and of all the ancients who lived before them, who tell us the very words in which it was delivered, the Scriptures which were so interpreted, and say that it was held by all Christians that were exactly orthodox."

8. The common doctrine respecting the Millennium is in the history of the Church. It is not to be found in the standards of any of the churches of the Reformation—by several it is impliedly repudiated. The same may be said of the writings of the Reformers. The doctrine was first proposed by Whitby, but little more than one hundred years ago, and avowedly as "a New Hypothesis." As to the views of the Reformers:

Luther, in his commentary on John 10 : 16, says: "Some say that before the latter day the whole world shall become Christians. This is a falsehood forged by Satan, that he might darken sound doctrine. Beware of the delusion."

Again he says: "I believe that all the signs which are to precede the last day have already happened." "Let us not think that the Coming of Christ is far off; let us look up with heads lifted up; let us expect our Redeemer's coming with a longing and cheerful mind."

Without further particular quotation, the following testimony of the martyr Latimer, as to the faith of the Reformers, may suffice: "All those excellent and learned men whom, without doubt, God hath sent into the world in these latter days to give the world warning, do gather out of Scripture that the last day cannot be far off." (Third Sermon on the Lord's Prayer.) Again, he says: "Peradventure it may come in my days, old as I am, or in my children's days."

After carefully investigating the subject, Dr. Henshaw, the late Bishop of Rhode Island, in his treatise on the Second Advent, says: "We may safely challenge its advocates (the advocates of the common doctrine) to produce one distinguished writer in its favor who lived before the commencement of the eighteenth century."

Now, we respectfully submit: Can that be an article of the Christian faith which not only was not believed, but is inconsistent with what was believed by the Apostolic Church, by the Church for the two succeeding centuries, and by the Church of the Reformation? Ought not such consent in favor of the Pre-Millennial Advent to be regarded as decisive?

Brethren, "Ye are not in darkness that that day should overtake you unawares, ye yourselves know perfectly that the day of the Lord shall come," that it shall come "as a thief in the night," "in an hour when men think not," when the world is saying "peace and safety," when even the vigil virgins are slumbering and sleeping, as the flood in the days of Noah, as the lightning from heaven on Sodom, unexpected, unsuspected, "So, shall the coming of the Son of Man be." "Let us, then, who are of the day watch and be sober." With trimmed lamps and loins girded, let us watch and wait with longing desire and expectation for the coming of the Master, for "Blessed is that servant whom the Lord when He cometh shall find watching."

per annum, payable in advance.

Remittances by mail should be by bank cheques, Post-office orders, or Postal notes, whenever possible. If currency is sent it should be in a registered letter. Cheques and money-orders should be made payable to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Making them payable to individuals often causes delay.

New subscriptions may commence at any time. When subscribers do not indicate their wish, they commence with the first number of the month in which the subscription is received.

Renewals.—To prevent the possibility of mistake it is best to cut the address label from the paper, and attach it to the letter containing the renewal. If there is a change of address always state past, as well as present, address.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Recent Financial Disasters, their Developments and effects, continued last week to be the chief topic of public concern. Further disclosures in the Grant & Ward affair astonish the public by the impudence and effrontery of the operators, and by the credulity of their dupes. It appears that some investors were paid enormous sums, which, the firm informed them, were profits on their investments, and were made out of government contracts, though it is now admitted that the firm had no interest in any government contract, and that the so-called profits were in reality the deposits of later investors. It is not surprising to learn that Ward has been arrested on the charge of misappropriating money. He went to prison without making any attempt to obtain bail. He was arrested because of the prominent part he took in the business. He is, however, not the only culprit and must not be made the scapegoat for those who assisted, connived at, and profited by the fraud. Other warrants were also granted, on the application of the United States District Attorney, against Wa d's associate, President Fish of the Marine Bank, and ex-President Eno of the Second National Bank. The charge in both cases was misappropriation of the bank's funds. Public confidence has evidently received a severe shock from these disclosures, and the result is apparent in the readiness of depositors to take alarm. An instance of this disposition was afforded on Saturday last, when a run was made on the West Side Bank in New York. The paying-teller of the bank had absconded with $85,000 belonging to the bank, and when the news of his flight became known, there was a rush of depositors all eager to withdraw their deposits. The officers of the bank declare that the institution is perfectly solvent, but the suddenness and severity of the strain, combined with a disturbance of their Clearing-House arrangements, caused a crisis, and the bank closed its doors. Other bank failures also were repored in distant cities, which were more or less directly the result of disturbed public confidence. These were at Erie, Pa., Charlottesville, Va., Petersburg, Va., Pittsburg, Pa., and Laporte, Ind. The shrinkage in values during the thirty days of financial flurry is computed by an eminent authority at $300,000,000. The trouble is clearly the result of over-speculation, more correctly described as gambling, in which some banks have taken a hand as principals, and others have been indirectly concerned by supplying the speculators with funds. Unhappily many innocent persons have suffered, and they are entitled to our sympathy. The speculators and defaulters who have fallen under the ruin their own acts have caused deserve no commiseration; their fate is simply a fulfilment of the Divine warning: "He that getteth riches and not by right shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at his end shall be a fool" (Jer. 17 : 11).

The House Defeated the Bankruptcy Bill on May 19th by refusing to fix a day for its discussion. This action causes general disappointment. There is urgent need for reform in this matter, as dishonest debtors are the people who derive most benefit from the existing law. It was not claimed that the bill passed by the Senate was all that could be desired, but it was hoped that improvements would have been effected during its passage through the House. It was an opportunity for Democrats and Republicans to unite in giving the country a really useful and valuable law, which, if it had proved efficient, would have won the gratitude of the business community and have made the Forty-eighth Congress a memorable one in our history. The failure even to consider the subject showed a strange disregard of national interests on the part of the House.

The Need of a Government Telegraph System is shown by the report of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to which the proposal to establish a postal telegraph was referred. It appears from the report that the wires and poles and other plant of the Western Union Company could be duplicated at a cost of $24,500,000, but the public is now compelled to pay a rate for telegrams which produces a sum that defrays all expenses, and in addition six per cent on the company's nominal capital of $96,578,000.

When Drunkenness does not Constitute a valid ground for divorce was explained to an unhappy woman in Iowa recently. The Supreme Court judge dealt with her application for divorce, which was made on the ground that her husband was a confirmed drunkard. The evidence showed that she had knowledge of his intemperate habits before she had married him, and he refused the petition. The judge said: "You voluntarily chose a drunkard for a husband, and you should discharge the duties of a drunkard's wife. His failure to keep a pledge of reformation, made before marriage, does not justify you in deserting him. Having knowingly married a drunkard you must make yourself content with the sacred relationship." Her sad fate should be a warning to other ladies who, if they contemplate marriage with a man of such habits, should insist that a complete reformation precede the ceremony.

A Statue of Martin Luther was Unveiled in Washington, D. C., on May 21st, with impressive ceremonies. Justice Miller of the United States Supreme Court presided, and a large number of Senators and Representatives were present. The statue reaches an elevation of more than twenty feet, the pedestal being eleven feet in height. The latter consists of four blocks of dressed granite, the undermost covering an area of one hundred and twenty square feet. The only inscription, "Martin Luther," is in raised letters upon the principal block of the pedestal. The entire body and limbs of the figure are enveloped in the folds of a priestly robe. The left hand holds a closed book, the clinched fingers of the right resting upon it. The raised face, deeply knitted brow, and firmly closed lips, together with the sturdily placed limbs, portray determination and defiance. It is a duplicate of the principal figure of the Luther group at Worms. The Hon. Omar D. Conger, in the course of his oration at the ceremony, thus pointed out the significant feature of the erection in Washington of a statue to the great Reformer: "Four centuries from the date of his birth, three thousand miles from the scenes of his labor, on the borders of a continent then undiscovered, in the capital of a wonderful nation then unborn, we gather from far and near around the monument of Martin Luther, wrought in enduring bronze from the mines of Germany, moulded by the skilful artisans of his own fatherland, and transported over the intervening land and sea to stand amid the other memorials of patriotism and veneration that adorn our capital city."

The National Temperance Society Held its nineteenth anniversary on May 13th, in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York. The report read by Mr. J. N. Stearns, the indefatigable secretary, showed that the society has issued 139 new books, pamphlets, and tracts during the last year, making 1251 different publications now on its catalogue. The receipts for publications have been $52,815.02, making $745,443.58 since the organization of the Society. Receipts from donations, $6,558.05; working capital, $10,269.86; total receipts for the year, $70,982.93; expenses, $70,902.91. Total number of pages printed for the year, 34,274,485; making a total since the organization of the society of 584,811,637. "This," said Mr. Stearns, "has been one of the most prosperous years in the history of the society. More publications issued, more pages circulated, more money received, more people reached and influenced than ever before." The missionary work has been very largely under the management of a special missionary committee. Over $10,000 has been expended upon purely missionary work, which has been mainly among the freedmen in the Southern States.

The Rev. William Taylor, who is Known as the California Evangelist, was elected on May 21st Bishop to Africa, by the Methodist Episcopal Conference. Mr. Taylor's labors in the cause of Christ have been frequently mentioned in these columns. He is now in his sixty-fourth year, and since 1849, when he was sent as a missionary to California, he has preached in every English-speaking country in the world. He stayed in California seven years, after which he commenced his evangelistic tours, which have continued to the present time. In Canada, the West Indies, Great Britain, Australia, South Africa, Palestine, India, Ceylon, and more recently in South America, Mr. Taylor has preached with remarkable tokens of God's blessing. In Australia, which he twice visited, sixteen young men who were converted under his preaching entered the ministry, besides many others who became lay-preachers. During his tours he accepted no remuneration from the American Church, but depended solely on the proceeds of his published works. He succeeded in sending to India over forty missionaries, who are not paid by the Church, but live a life of faith. Mr. Taylor will be followed in his new field by the prayers of Christians of all denominations.

Several Clergymen and Friends of The Christian HERALD who are anxious that the Gospel teaching contained in its pages should be read still more widely, have written us respecting sample copies. For their information, and that of others who may not have noticed previous announcements, we may say that any person who has opportunity for obtaining subscribers and who is willing to assist in introducing the paper to people who have not seen it, may have a package of sample copies sent to his address, postage free, by writing to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, N. Y. Instances are continually coming to light of conversions brought about through God's blessing upon its pages. We are therefore glad to facilitate all who will aid in extending its sphere of usefulness.

The New Baptist Church at Pueblo, Col., of which the Rev. E. W. Oakes is pastor, was formally dedicated on May 18th. The dedicatory services were largely attended, and much enthusiasm was manifested. Dr. Jeffery, of Denver, preached in the morning from Isaiah 53 : 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." There was a children's service in the afternoon, and a third service in the evening, at which Dr. Palmer, of Boulder, preached. The new church is the largest church edifice in Southern Colorado, and one of the finest Baptist churches in the State. The congregation propose building a parsonage which will cost $1200, of which they have already raised $500. Mr. Oakes asks the prayers of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that the blessing already given to his preaching at Pueblo may be continued and increased.

A Remarkable Temperance Contest is Described in a despatch from New Orleans. It took place at Alexandria, in Rapides Parish, on the Red River. May 21st was the day fixed by the police jury for the vote on the question of liquor license or prohibition. The women of the parish, black and white, determined to take a hand in it, and rallied to the polls at seven o'clock in the morning, and remained until the polls closed, cheering and encouraging the willing and laboring with the doubtful voters, and supplying hot coffee and cold lemonade to all who would partake. This was done under the direction of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the members of which did their part in a way to outgeneral the liquor-dealers. Nearly all the women, black and white, wore badges with the words "Education and Prohibition." They would not let a man vote until they showed him what a disgrace it would be to himself and his family for him to vote for license. At the Alexandria poll 330 votes were cast against license and 62 for; Pineville ward gave 89 against, 23 for license; and Cheneyville gave about 200 majority against license. The victory is due entirely to the energy of the ladies of the W. C. T. U.

A Bartender's Changed Life was Described at the Fulton Street prayer-meeting last week. One of the speakers said he had recently witnessed a powerful manifestation of God's power in a city in Kentucky. A man who was once a bartender, and who was converted while in that occupation, gave it up, and he was led into a more fitting position for a Christian man. Some time after he gave that up, feeling that God had called him to labor as an evangelist. Financially he stepped out of a competency into beggary, but he has never wanted. Many trials of faith he has experienced, but trials proved triumphs. On a recent Saturday night at the service he held in Kentucky, three hundred persons, many of them farmers from miles off, stayed till midnight. They would not be dismissed. A hundred or more were on their knees, and the whole neighborhood was astir.

A Self-imposed Penance was Performed by a lady in Williamsburgh, N. Y., during Lent. On the first day of Lent she presented herself at the police station in the evening, and asked permission to sleep there. She was well dressed, modest-looking, and sober, and the police officer in charge wondered at her request. "I told her," he said, "that I didn't think she could stand the place. 'Oh, yes, I can, and could if it were twice as disagreeable,' she replied. The next night she came again and stayed all night, and every night afterward until the end of Lent. When I found," said the policeman, "that she did herd with these drunken and dirty unfortunates who sleep here, I thought she would soon become as bad as the rest, and I watched her to note the change which her associates would bring upon her. But no change showed itself. She preserved her tidy appearance, and continued just as modest and well-behaved as when she first came." Some inquiries were made about her, and it was found that she belonged to a respectable family and had a good home, but that she had determined on sleeping among the wretched drunken offscourings of the streets every night as a self-imposed penance. It was a vain effort if undertaken with the idea that it would merit pardon for sin; but if having first obtained pardon through the merits of Jesus she went among the vicious and depraved to tell them of the Friend of sinners, it was an act of devotion which God might honor with His blessing (Eph. 2 : 8, 9).

A Long Walk for a Fortune was Undertaken by an heir recently. A farmer in a northern county of New York State quarrelled four years ago with his only son, and the boy left home and went West. The old gentleman relented of his hardness to the boy after his departure, and when he died a few weeks ago left his estate, valued at $100,000, to the son. The young man, while in Milwaukee, saw an advertisement asking for information about him, and he decided to start for the East. He had money enough to defray his expenses, but he was robbed in a cheap boarding-house and left penniless. There was nothing for him to do but to make his way back afoot. He arrived in Jersey City a day or two ago, footsore and weary, and has claimed his inheritance. He was abundantly recompensed for his long and weary walk, but his father's death precluded him from having with his inheritance the joy of pardon and reconciliation. The offer in the Gospel to sinners who have wandered far away from God is far better: it includes forgiveness as well as inheritance for all who will repent and return (Titus 3 : 3-7).

A Moving Island is the Subject of a Dispute as to ownership. Some months ago a citizen of St. Louis applied to the Secretary of the Interior for a survey of an island in the Mississippi River, opposite St. Louis, claiming it to be public land. The application was resisted by the city upon the ground of its ownership of Arsenal Island, to which the new formation was alleged to have been a mere accretion. The case showed that Arsenal Island has been gradually shifting downward for many years, and that as its head is washed away by the currents of the river, its foot is enlarged. In 1853 it contained 404 acres, and in 1863 only 119 acres. Since the latter year it has moved southward about 4800 feet, its rate of motion being about eight inches per day. It would seem to the disinterested observer that it was scarcely worth while to dispute about the possession of an island which in a few years may be carried away altogether. But the world has a different opinion, or there would not be so fierce a struggle for the acquisition of property of any kind. That considered the most permanent is upon a world which will one day pass away (II Pet. 3 : 10).

A Retired Captain's Record, as it is Stated in a Southern journal, is very honorable. It is stated that Captain Martin Deming has seen more service as vessel commander than any other mariner in this country, and possibly more than any other in Europe. For sixty-four consecutive years he acted as master of sailing vessels and steamers, and in all that time he never lost either a boat or a man. He never crossed the ocean, yet has passed through many a storm which only an experienced sailor could safely weather. About three years ago his health failed, and he was compelled to give up active work. Since then he has been living in quiet retirement with his wife in Baltimore, Md. He is now very feeble, but when fully aroused speaks with distinctness. He was eighty-seven years of age on the 31st of March. Sailors call him a "lucky" captain, but the captain's record speaks of more than luck. Steadiness, skill, watchfulness and devotion to duty are indicated by such a life. Those who sailed in ships he commanded must have felt safe under his care. It is so with the Captain of our salvation, who has lost no soul that ever trusted in Him (John 18 : 9). And He has crossed the ocean of death and still lives, ready to save all who commit themselves to Him (Heb. 7 : 25).

A HEAVENLY PATTERN FOR OUR EARTHLY LIFE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

Preached at Exeter Hall, London, at the Anniversary of the Baptist Missionary Society.

"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."—MATT. 6 : 10.

The Prayer a Costly One—The Dead not Lost—Foundation Stones in the Sea—A Great Brave Prayer—I. The Comparison not Far-fetched—Both from One Creator—Thy Will be Done in Earth—It was so Once—Will be so at the Last—The New Heaven and New Earth—An Analogy—Not Far off—II. The Comparison Instructive—How God's Will is to be Done—An Elevated Model—Done, not Discussed—Done in Spirit—Constantly—Universally—Instantly—III. The Comparison Based upon Facts—Heaven and Earth Unlike and Alike—The Same Fare—The Same Company—The Same Court Dress—IV. The Comparison Borne Out in Action.

OUR Father's will shall certainly be done, for the Lord "doeth according to His will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth." Let us adoringly consent that it shall be so, desiring no alteration therein. That "will" may cost us dear; yet let it never cross our wills; let our minds be wholly subjugated to the mind of God. That "will" may bring us bereavement, sickness, and loss; but let us learn to say, "It is the Lord; let Him do what seemeth Him good." We should not only yield to the divine will, but acquiesce in it so as to rejoice in the tribulation which it ordains. This is but we set ourselves to reach it.

He that taught us this prayer used it Himself in the most unrestricted sense. When the bloody sweat stood on His face, and all the fear and trembling of a man in anguish were upon Him, He did not dispute the decree of the Father, but bowed His head and cried, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt." When we are called to suffer bereavements personally, or when, as a holy brotherhood, we see our best men taken away, let us know that it is well, and say most sincerely, "The will of the Lord be done."

God knows what will best minister to His gracious designs. To us it seems a sad waste of human life that man after man should go to a malarious region, and perish in the attempt to save the heathen; but infinite wisdom may view the matter very differently. We ask why the Lord does not work a miracle, and cover the heads of His messengers from the death-shaft? No reason is revealed to us, but there is a reason, for the will of the great Father is the sum of wisdom. Reasons are not made known to us, else were there no scope for our faith; and the Lord loves that this noble grace should have ample room and verge enough. He who demands a reason of God is not in a fit state to receive one.

In the case of the honored men whom the Lord has removed from us this year, there is assuredly no loss to the great cause as it is viewed by the eye of God. See the great stones and costly stones laboriously brought from the quarry to the edge of the sea! Can it be possible that these are deliberately thrown into the deep? It swallows them up! Wherefore is so much labor thrown away? These might surely have been built into a temple for the Lord; why should the waves of death engulf them? Yet more are sought for, and still more; will the hungry abyss never cease to devour? Alas, that so much precious material should be lost! It is not lost. No, not a stone of it. Thus the Lord layeth the foundation of His harbor of refuge among the people. "Mercy shall be built up forever." In due time massive walls shall rise out of the deep, and we shall no longer ask the reason for the losses of early days.

Peace be to the memories of the heroic dead!

Men die that the cause may live. "Father, thy will be done." With this prayer upon our lips let us bend low in childlike submission to the will of the great Jehovah, and then gird up our loins anew to dauntless perseverance in our holy service. Though more should be taken away next year, and the next, yet we must pray on, "Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven."

If the prayer of our text had not been dictated by the Lord Jesus Himself, we might think it too bold. Can it ever be that this earth, a mere drop of a bucket, should touch the great sea of life and light above and not be lost in it? Can it remain earth and yet be made like to heaven? Will it not lose its individuality in the process? This earth is subject to vanity, dimmed with ignorance, defiled with sin, furrowed with sorrow; can holiness dwell in it as in heaven? Our Divine Instructor would not teach us to pray for impossibilities; He puts such petitions into our mouths as can be heard and answered. Yet certainly this is a great prayer; it has the hue of the infinite about it. It is a brave prayer, which only a heaven-born faith can utter; yet it is not the offspring of presumption, for presumption never longs for the will of the Lord to be perfectly performed.

I. May the Holy Spirit be with us, while I first lead you to observe that is not far-fetched. That our present obedience to God should be like to that of holy ones above is not a strained and fanatical notion. It is not far-fetched, for earth and heaven were called into being by the same Creator. If, then, heaven and earth were created by the same God, and are sustained by the same power, and governed from the same throne, we believe that the same end will be subserved by each of them, and that both heaven and earth shall tell out the glory of God. They are two bells of the same chime, and this is the music that peals forth from them: "The Lord shall reign forever and ever. Hallelujah!" He that made can remake. The curse which fell upon the ground was not eternal; thorns and thistles pass away. God will bless the earth for Christ's sake, even as once He cursed it for man's sake.

"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." It was so once. Perfect obedience to the heavenly will upon this earth will only be a return to the good old times which ended at the gate of Eden. Those who desire to set up the kingdom of God are not instituting a new order of things; they are restoring, not inventing. Earth will drop into the old groove again. As it was in the beginning so shall it be yet again. History shall, in the divinest sense, repeat itself. The temple of the Lord shall be among men, and the Lord God shall dwell among them. "Truth shall spring out of the earth; and righteousness shall look down from heaven."

"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

IT WILL BE SO AT THE LAST.

I shall not venture far into prophecy. Some brethren are quite at home where I should lose myself. I have scarcely yet been able to get out of the gospels and the epistles; and that deep book of Revelation, with its waters to swim in, I must leave to better instructed minds. "Blessed is he that keepeth the sayings of the prophecy of that book;" to that blessing I would aspire, but I cannot yet make claim to interpret it. This much, however, seems plain—there is to be "a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." This creation, which now "groaneth and travaileth in pain," in sympathy with man, is to be brought forth from its bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

Blessed be the Lord Christ, when He brought His people out of their bondage, He did not redeem their spirits only, but their bodies also; hence their material part is the Lord's as well as their spiritual nature, and hence again this very earth which we inhabit shall be uplifted in connection with us. The creation itself shall be delivered. Materialism, out of which there has been once made a vesture for the Godhead in the person of Christ, shall become a fit temple for the Lord of hosts. The New Jerusalem shall come down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride is prepared for her husband. We are sure of this. Therefore unto this consummation let us strive mightily, praying evermore, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

Meanwhile, remember also that there is an analogy between earth and heaven, so that the one is the type of the other. You could not describe heaven except by borrowing the things of earth to symbolize it; and this shows that there is between them. What is heaven? It is Paradise, or a garden. Walk amid your fragrant flowers and think of heaven's bed of spices. Heaven is a kingdom; thrones, and crowns, and palms are the earthly emblems of the heavenlies. Heaven is a city; and there, again, you fetch your metaphor from the dwelling-places of men. It is a place of "many mansions"—the homes of the glorified. Houses are of earth, yet is God our dwelling-place. Heaven is a wedding feast; and even such is this present dispensation. The tables are spread here as well as there; and it is our privilege to go forth and bring in the hedge-birds and the highwaymen, that the banqueting-hall may be filled. While the saints above eat bread in the marriage supper of the Lamb, we do the like below in another sense.

Between earth and heaven there is but a thin partition. The home country is much nearer than we think. I question if "the land that is very far off" be a true name for heaven. Was it not an extended kingdom on earth which was intended by the prophet rather than the celestial home? Heaven is by no means the far country, for it is the Father's house. Are we not taught to say, "Our Father which art in heaven?" Where the Father is the true spirit of adoption counts itself near. Our Lord would have us mingle heaven with earth naming it twice in this short prayer.

II. Secondly, this comparison is eminently instructive. Does it not teach us that what we do for God is not everything, but how we do it is also to be considered? The Lord Jesus Christ would not only have us do the Father's will, but do it after a certain model. And what it is! Yet is it none too elevated, for we would not wish to render to our heavenly Father service of an inferior kind. If none of us dare say that we are perfect, we are yet resolved that we will never rest until we are. We do not desire that our pattern should be lowered, but that our imitation should be raised.

"Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Mark the words "be done," for they touch a vital point of the text. God's will is done in heaven. How very practical! On earth His will is often forgotten, and His rule ignored. My brethren, I am afraid that Christ's will on earth is very much more discussed than done. Too often we are satisfied with having approved of that will, or with having spoken of it in words of commendation. But we must not stay in thought, resolve, or word; the prayer is practical and business-like, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." An idle man stretched himself on his bed when the sun had risen high in heaven, and as he rolled over, he muttered to himself that he wished this were hard work, for he could do any quantity of it with pleasure. Many might wish that to think and to speak were to do the will of God; for then they would have effected it very thoroughly. Up yonder there is no playing with sacred things; they do His commandments, hearkening unto the voice of His Word. Would God His will were not alone preached and sung below, but actually done as it is in heaven.

In heaven the will of God is done in spirit, for they are spirits there. It is done in truth with undivided heart, and unquestioned desire. On earth, too often, it is done and yet not done; for a dull formality mocks real obedience. Here obedience often shades off into dreary routine. We sing with the lips, but our hearts are silent. We pray as if the mere utterance of words were prayer. We sometimes preach living truth with dead lips. It must no longer be so. Would God we had the fire and fervor of those burning ones who behold the face of God. We pray in that sense, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven."

In heaven they do God's will constantly, without failure. Would God it could be so here! They do God's will universally, without making a selection. Here take this commandment to be obeyed, and lay that commandment by as non-essential. We are, I fear, all tinctured, more or less, with this odious gall. A certain part of obedience is hard, and therefore we try to forget it. It must no longer be so; but whatsoever Jesus saith unto us we must do. We should often make diligent search, and go through our churches to see wherein we differ from the divine pattern. Some goodly Babylonish garment or wedge of gold may be as an accursed thing in the camp, bringing disaster to the Lord's armies. Let us not neglect anything which our God commands lest He withhold His blessing.

His will is done in heaven instantly, and without hesitation. We, I fear, are given to delays. We plead that we must look the thing round about. "Second thoughts are best," we say, whereas the first thoughts of eager love are the prime production of our being. I would that we were obedient at all hazard, for therein lies the truest safety. Let us pray the Lord that we may do His will on earth as it is done in heaven; that is, joyfully, without the slightest weariness. When our hearts are right, it is a glad thing to serve God, though it be only to unloose the latchets of our Master's shoes. Even as they are glad in heaven, with a felicity born of the presence of the Lord, so should we be glad, and find our strength in the joy of the Lord. In heaven the will of the Lord is done right humbly. There perfect purity is set in a frame of lowliness. Too often we fall into self-gratulation, and it defiles our best deeds. Brother, pray the Lord to keep thee low at His feet, for in no other place canst thou be largely used of Him.

The comparison being thus instructive, I pray that we may be the better for our meditation upon it. I do not find it an easy thing even to describe the model; but if we essay to copy it: "this is the work; this is the difficulty." Unless we are girded with the Divine strength we shall never do the will of God as it is done in heaven. Here is a greater labor than those of Hercules, bringing with it victories nobler than those of Alexander. To this the unaided wisdom of Solomon could not attain; the Holy Ghost must transform us, and lead the earthly in us captive to the heavenly.

III. Thirdly, I beg you to notice, dear friends, that this comparison of holy service on earth to that which is in heaven, is BASED UPON FACTS.

The facts will both comfort and stimulate us. Two places are mentioned in the text which seem very dissimilar, and yet the likeness exceeds the unlikeness—earth and heaven.

We have the same fare on earth as the saints in heaven, for "the Lamb in the midst of the throne doth feed them;" He is the Shepherd of His flock below, and daily feeds us upon Himself. His flesh is meat indeed, His blood is drink indeed. Whence come the refreshing draughts of the immortals? The Lamb doth lead them to living fountains of waters; and doth He not even here below say to us, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink?" The same river of the water of life which makes glad the city of our God above, also waters the garden of the Lord below.

Brethren, we are in the same company below as they enjoy above. Up there they are with Christ, and here He is with us, for He hath said—"Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." There is a difference as to the brightness of His presence; but not as to the reality of it. "But heaven is a place of peace," says one; "there they rest from their labors." Beloved, our estate here is not without its peace and rest. "Alas!" cries one, "I find it far otherwise." I know it. But whence come wars and fightings but of our fretfulness and unbelief? "We which have believed do enter into rest." "But we have not their victory," cries one, "for they are more than conquerors." Yes, and "our warfare is accomplished." We have to that fact. Moreover, "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith." In the Lord Jesus Christ the Lord giveth us the victory, and maketh us to triumph in every place.

"Up there," says a brother, "they are all accepted, but here we are in a state of probation." Did you read that in the Bible? for I never did. A believer is in no state of probation; he has passed from death unto life, and shall never come into condemnation. "Ay," saith one, "but heaven is the place of perfect service; for 'His servants shall serve Him.'" But is not this the place, in some respects, of a more extensive service still? Are there not many things which perfect saints above and holy angels cannot do? If we had choice of a sphere in which we could serve God with widest range, we should choose not heaven but earth. There are no slums and overcrowded rooms in heaven to which we can go with help, but there are plenty of them here. There are no jungles and regions of malaria where missionaries may prove their unreserved consecration by preaching the Gospel at the expense of their lives. In some respects this world has a preference beyond the heavenly state as to the extent of doing the will of God. Oh, that we were better men, and then the saints above might almost envy us!

DO NOT BE IMPATIENT to go to heaven. Nay, do not have a wish about it. Set very loose by the things of earth; yet count it a great privilege to have a long life in which to serve the Lord on earth. Our mortal life is but a brief interval between the two eternities, and if we judged unselfishly, and saw the needs of earth, we might almost say, "Give us back the antediluvian periods of human life, that through a chiliad we might serve the Lord in suffering and in reproach, as we cannot do in glory." This life is the vestibule of glory. Array yourselves in the righteousness of Jesus Christ, for this is the court dress of earth and heaven. Manifest at once the spirit of saints, or else you will never abide with them. Now begin the song which your lips shall carol in Paradise, or else you will never be admitted to the heavenly choirs; none can unite in the music but those who have rehearsed it here below.

IV. Lastly, this comparison, which I feel I can so feebly bring out, of doing the will of God on earth as it is done in heaven, ought to be borne out by holy deeds. Here is the urgency of the missionary enterprise. God's will can never be intelligently done where it is not known; therefore, in the first place, it becomes us as followers of Jesus to see to it that the will of the Lord is made known by heralds of peace sent forth from among us. Why has it not been already published in every land? Is it not probably true that the selfishness of Christians is for the slow progress of Christianity? If Christianity is never to spread in the world at a more speedy rate than the present, it will not even keep pace with the growth of the population. If we are going to give to Christ's kingdom no larger a percentage than we have usually given, I suppose it will require about an eternity-and-a-half to convert the world; or, in other words, it will never be done. The progress made is so slow, that it threatens to be like that of the crab, which is always described in the fable as going backward. What do we give, brethren? What do we do? It is not for us to say, "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven; but, Lord, Thou hast many ways and means of accomplishing that will; I pray thee do it, but let me not be asked to help on the work." No, when I utter this prayer, if I am sincere I shall be searching my stores to see to make known the truth. I shall be inquiring whether I cannot personally speak the saving word. You who fail to support missions when it is in your power to do so should never say, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done," but leave out that petition for fear of mocking God.

We want to bless the world; we have a thousand schemes by which to bless it, but if ever God's will is done in earth as it is done in heaven it will be an unmixed and comprehensive blessing. Join the Peace Society by all means, and be forgiving and peaceable yourself; but there is no way of establishing peace on the earth except by God's will being done in it, and that can only be done through the renewing of men's hearts by the Gospel of Jesus Christ. By all manner of means let us endeavor so to control politics, as Christian men, that oppression shall not remain in the earth; but, after all, there will be oppression unless the Gospel is spread. This is for all earth's wounds. They will bleed still until the Christ shall come to bind them up. Oh, let us then, since this is the best thing that can be, show our love to God and man by spreading His saving truth.

The text says, "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven." Suppose any one of you had come from heaven. It is but a supposition; but let it stand for a minute; suppose that a man here has come fresh from heaven. Some would be curious to see what his bodily form would be like. They would expect to be dazzled by the radiance of his countenance. However, we will let that pass. We want to see how he would live. Coming newly from heaven, how would he act? Oh, sirs, if he came here to do the same as all men do on earth, only after a heavenly sort, what a father he would be, what a husband, what a brother, what a friend! I would sit down and let him preach this morning, most assuredly; and when he had done preaching, I would go home with him, and have a chat.

I should be careful to observe what he would do with his substance. I do not think this man coming fresh from heaven would say, "I must have this luxury; I must have this goodly raiment; I must have this grand house." But he would say, "How much can I save for the God of Heaven? How much can I invest in the country I came from?" I am sure he would be pinching and screwing to save money to serve God with; and he himself, as he went about the streets, and mingled with ungodly men and women, would be sure to find out ways of getting at their consciences and hearts; he would be always trying to bring others to the felicity he had enjoyed. Think that over, and live so—so as He did who really did come down from heaven. For after all, the best rule of life is, what would Jesus do if He were here to-day, and the world still lying in the wicked one? If Jesus were in your business, if He had your money, how would He spend it? For that is how you ought to spend it.

Now think, my brother, you will be in heaven very soon. Since last year a great number have gone home: before next year many more will have ascended to glory. Sitting up in those celestial seats, how shall we wish that we had lived below? It will not give any man in heaven even a moment's joy to think that he gratified himself while here. It will give him no reflections suitable to the place to remember how much he amassed, how much he left behind to be quarrelled over after he was gone; he will say to himself, "I wish I had saved more of my capital by me, for what I saved on earth was lost, but what I spent for God was really laid up where thieves do not break through and steal."

O brothers, let us live as we shall wish we had lived when life is over; let us fashion a life which will bear the light eternal. Is it life to live otherwise? Unless we are striving to honor Jesus, and bring home His banished, we are dead while we live. Let us aim at a life which will outlast the fires which shall try every man's work.

If I may have moved any person here to resolve, "I will so live," I have not spoken in vain. I have at least stirred myself with the intense desire to cast off the mere outsides and husks of life, and to ripen the real kernel of my being. Thy will by me be done on earth, as yet, my Lord, I hope to do it in the skies. May I begin here a life worthy to be perpetuated in eternity. God bless you, for Christ's sake.

Mr. C. H. Spurgeon's Pastors' College Held its anniversary recently. It was stated that since 1865 there has been a total increase of the number of the churches under the pastorate of ministers trained in the college of 50,924, while the 382 churches which represent the strength of the association at the present moment show an aggregate membership of 58,724. The receipts during the year have been over $30,000. The expenditure has been more than covered by the receipts. Mr. Spurgeon mentioned that during the existence of the college it had educated and equipped for the work of the ministry 675 students, of whom 500 were still in useful service. The Pastors' College has no endowment, but there is a fund of $25,000 set aside for the purpose of honorably winding it up, after Mr. Spurgeon's death, if such should be deemed necessary.

A Warning in a Dream was Heeded in time to prevent a catastrophe, as related by the News of Danbury, Conn. It states that one night a gentleman of that city dreamed of a friend recently dead, whose funeral he was to attend the next day. He dreamed that he and this friend were standing together on a floor which gave way with them. In the struggle to save himself he was awakened. The dream made a strong impression upon him, and after eating an early breakfast he hurried to the house of his dead friend, and without disturbing the family found his way into the cellar. He felt that the dream might possibly be a warning, and he was moved to examine the supports to the floor. He found that a very large beam which supported the floor-timbers of the parlor and a partition wall was cracked. The crack appeared to be a fresh one, and a closer examination with a lamp showed that it was, and that it was so large that one's hand could be placed in it. He immediately got two heavy posts, and in a short time made the timber perfectly safe. A few hours later the building was filled with friends. Had it not been for the dream it is not likely the broken timber would have been discovered in time to prevent a catastrophe. It was well for the family that regard for their safety prompted this gentleman to heed the warning of his dream. The mere possibility that they were living in insecurity sufficed to impel him to investigate. Ought not such concern for the eternal safety of his friends to move every Christian to affectionate and earnest effort to save them from everlasting disaster (Phil. 2 : 4)?

A Distressing Farewell.

Robert Annan's Reminder.

A SHIP ON FIRE.

(See Illustration.)

ON May 10th, 1882, the steamer Rio Grande sailed from Galveston, Texas, for New York. The steamer was almost new, and although she had some bad weather the sea was smooth, and everything indicated that she would reach New York by May 18th. The cargo consisted of 1000 bales of cotton and about the same number of bales of wool. There were also on board over ninety saloon and steerage passengers, among whom were some twenty women and about the same number of children. About 5 o'clock on May 16th smoke was discovered issuing from the hold forward of the engine and boiler-room. It was at once concluded that the cotton was on fire.

The hose was immediately stretched and run into the fore-hold, and several streams of water were poured into the compartment to quench the fire. The captain also had every crevice and crack stopped with bedding, so that no draught could get to the fire. The officers and crew worked with a will, and a few of the male passengers assisted, while the others gently broke the news to the ladies on board.

It was a grand sight—that of the coolness and presence of mind with which the men behaved in their dire peril. While some fought the fire, another party worked to get the boats ready for launching in case it should become necessary to abandon the ship. As night closed in, it became evident that the fire had made progress, for the volume of smoke increased, and the heat of the deck became almost unbearable. It was decided to put the women and children in the boats.

Almost at that moment a sail was sighted, and immediately the Stars and Stripes, union downward, were run up to halfmast as a signal of distress. The vessel proved to be an Italian bark, the Peppino, from Philadelphia, for Genoa, and her captain consented to take the passengers and return with them to Delaware Breakwater. The offer was accepted, though the bark was heavily laden and was not in a fit state to take on board so many passengers. If a storm should arise their danger on the bark would be as great or greater than on the Rio Grande.

When the proposal was communicated to the passengers, the ladies begged that they might remain. Ultimately, however, they were prevailed upon to go. Five male passengers volunteered to remain on the Rio Grande and assist the crew; all the others prepared to leave.

It was at the steam-ship's side that the struggle came. The ladies shrank from going down the ladder into the boats that were to carry them to the Italian bark, and there were many trying scenes. One, especially, is never likely to be forgotten by any who witnessed it. It was that of a boy, a mere child, the son of one of the officers. As he came to the side he threw his arms around his father's neck and turned a look of terror on the tossing waves. It was over in a minute, for the father was a resolute man, and though he knew that neither he nor the boy he loved so dearly might live the night through, he was not unmanned by the parting. Those who stood by saw a look of anguish pass across his face as he gently lifted the boy over the side and saw him passed into the boat. Then he turned away, and set resolutely to his duties. That night was a night of horror for those on the Rio Grande. The cotton was burning rapidly, and it seemed that the vessel must soon be consumed; but every man felt relieved that the other passengers were removed, and all prayed that the bark might make the land in safety. As morning broke the Capes of Delaware were in sight, and soon a tug came off to the assistance of the imperilled men. The vessel was tugged within the breakwater and her outboard valves opened. The crew and the five passengers were carried ashore as the vessel slowly sank, until only her upper deck was visible. The bark also arrived safely.

How many a father has undergone a pang, of which that of the officer, whose parting is depicted in the illustration, is a type. Children smitten by disease have put their arms around the neck of the broken-hearted parent, and vainly begged that they might stay with them; and strong men have wept from the consciousness that no earthly power could avert the parting. Since the world began, some of its saddest scenes have been at such death-beds. Children who have been shielded from every trial that love could ward off have been called away across death's dark river, which they must pass alone. It is then that the sweet consolations of the Gospel give the only relief that can cheer the breaking heart. The certainty of a future meeting in the land where partings are unknown is the Christian's support in that bitter moment.

Happy that parent and happy that child who, in such circumstances, can say, "I know in whom I have believed and that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him." It is in such a case no frail bark that the waves may engulf which has the lives of our loved ones in charge, but He will keep them who has never lost any whom the Father has given to Him, and reunion is certain.

ROBERT ANNAN'S STREET SERMON.

(See Illustration.)

THIRTY years ago a young man was drinking and rioting in New York and other cities of the Union. He was a young Scottish mason, who having fallen into dissipated habits in his own country, did as so many young men in Europe similarly situated do—he sailed for America. We may observe parenthetically that it is no mean evidence of the stability of our government, the efficacy of free institutions, and the vital power of our religious life that this tide of vice and immorality has not swamped the country and overturned law and order. Europe dare not make the United States a penal settlement, but she does the next thing to it when she sends here men who have graduated in vice and are on the highway to the penitentiary.

Robert Annan was not only on the highway to that institution, but he had been inside it. His own government had given him board and lodging there for three months, and when he was released he thought America was the land to suit him, so he came. He was shipwrecked on the way out, and had a narrow escape of his life; but the experience did not solemnize him, for the first thing he did on his arrival was to get drunk. He drifted from city to city, working a little when he could obtain money in no other way, until he crossed the border into Canada, and his own government had him on its hands again. Annan seemed to like the government, for he entered into closer relations with it by enlisting in a British regiment stationed in Canada. Shortly afterward the regiment was ordered home, and Robert Annan crossed the Atlantic again.

Arrived at home he deserted, was caught and punished, and eventually prevailed on his parents to purchase his discharge. He went to his father's house in Dundee, and there led an idle, dissolute life. But now comes the strange change which the history of Gospel work has recorded a thousand times. Robert Annan, the drunken loafer, ex-soldier, ex-convict, felt the power of the Holy Spirit, and was a new man. The master masons found him a steady, industrious workman, remarkable for his energy and perseverance. As before he would occasionally leave his employment for a week at a time, and it was always when he had paid by a little sum of money. But not, as before, that he might spend it in debauchery, but that he might go on a preaching excursion to some neglected locality, from which he would return cheered and encouraged to renew his labors in the stone-yard. Every evening after he had finished his work he was laboring somewhere for Christ, and his simple story of what the Lord had done for him was blessed wherever he told it.

George Whitefield's Message on the Window-Pane.

Robert Annan had his own methods of work, and though they brought ridicule upon him frequently, the Lord's blessing upon them satisfied him they were right, and that was sufficient for him. One of his methods was a curious one. There were times when he must be at work for bread, when he must be absent from home and from scenes of spiritual labor. But he could leave a silent appeal to his perishing fellow-men, and he took care to do so. With a piece of chalk in his pocket he sallied from his home, and as he had opportunity he wrote his appeal. On the last day of his life, and when his dead body was brought home, those who carried it, saw written on the pavement in front of his house, by the hand now still in death, the word "Eternity," on which the passers-by had looked as they went their way, and had been reminded in the midst of their life of the life beyond.

It was on July 31st, 1867, that Robert Annan died. His death was like the latter years of his life—a sacrifice for others. As he passed the river on his way to labor he saw a boy slip and fall in Robert Annan plunged in after him, and succeeded in holding him up until a boat put off to his rescue and took him on board. But the rescuer sank, exhausted with his effort, and before those in the boat could drag him in, the current had carried him away, and when it threw him on the shore further down he was dead. He knew then in all its fulness the meaning of the word he had written on the pavement that morning.

THE INSCRIPTION ON THE WINDOW-PANE.

(See Illustration.)

AN incident in the life of the great revival preacher, George Whitefield, is thus quaintly related by his biographers: Whitefield stopped at one time in a certain town in the house of a general, who treated him very kindly. Mr. Whitefield, as his custom was, intended to speak to the family individually about the Gospel of Christ and their need of a Saviour, but he refrained. Something seemed to say to him:

"Now, George Whitefield, don't say a word to these good people, it will grieve them; they have been so kind to you. Why, you cannot tell the general, 'Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God;' they would be too harsh words to address to such a man as that. And you cannot talk to the wife and daughters concerning the things of the kingdom. See how kind they have been to you! The warning will not come well from one who has been so much obliged to them as you."

And so when Whitefield retired to rest that night he had not spoken to any of the persons of the house according to his usual custom. This troubled him. He was uneasy, and conscience whispered, "These people have been kind to you; is it not great unkindness not to warn them of the wrath to come? You dare not leave this place until you have addressed to them a word that might be blessed to their souls." But still George Whitefield did not dare say a word. However, the struggle in his mind continued, and lest he should go away without opportunity or power to speak to them he took off his diamond ring and wrote on the window of the room he occupied, the solemn words applicable to the condition of his host as to the man to whom they were originally addressed—"But one thing thou lackest," and having prayed much about it he went his way.

No sooner had he gone than the master of the house entered the room where the good man had slept. The first thing that struck the general's eye was the writing on the window-pane—"But one thing thou lackest." The thought flashed across his mind, "Then this holy man of God loves my soul; I thought he did not love it, for he said not a word to me about it; it appears that he does." "Wife," said he, "come here and see what is on that window." "Yes," said she, "depend upon it, he has been unhappy in our house. We have done the best we could to make him comfortable, but because we don't love the Lord he has been disturbed and unhappy."

The Spirit of God was at work in their hearts; they were convinced of the truth of that sentence, "One thing thou lackest." "Call up the children," said the father. And the son and three daughters came, and the whole family looked at the silent warning. There and then the general requested them to kneel with him around the bed their guest had occupied and join with him in prayer, that the one thing lacking might be granted to him and his family. The prayer, it is stated, was answered in each case, and the whole family were eventually converted through God's blessing on that solemn warning.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

A New Passion.

GRANT accompanied his patient to the country town, from whence he wrote to Mr. Waldron in London, giving such an account of his son's accident and illness as would avoid exciting any suspicion of the truth. On the evening of the day upon which he had received the letter, Mr. Waldron was with his son, anxious for him, and grateful beyond measure to the young doctor. There was, he said, an opening for a medical man at Little Aston, and he urged him to settle there under his patronage. He was himself about to give up his public life at the close of the present session, as he felt old age creeping upon him, and his health beginning to fail. A medical attendant in whom he could have confidence would soon become essential to him; and he had a pleasant house at the end of the town nearest to Aston Court where Grant could reside. The young man hesitated but little. John Morley had once or twice expressed his opinion that a good country practice might be established there; and Grant had neither funds nor influence to back him if he attempted to launch himself upon a more ambitious career. He accepted Mr. Waldron's grateful offer with alacrity; and a few weeks later John Morley and Hester saw him appear again upon their narrow stage at Little Aston.

It was not a step altogether to Robert Waldron's mind; but he was accustomed to let things take their course, and he did not oppose himself to this. The sole reason he could have urged against it, even to himself, was one which he could not have presented in plain words to his own conscience: it was a very subtle and vague feeling of jealousy of Grant's acquaintance with the Morleys and of the footing he had already gained in the solitary, and, to him, forbidden household. Hester, he thought—for so far he dare deal frankly with himself—was too rare and dainty a prize for a mere country doctor. He should be sorry if, after her hard and sorrowful girlhood, no brighter and more fortunate lot awaited her in the future.

When Robert returned to Aston Court in the spring, with the traces of his accident almost effaced, he found Grant lodging in a house nearly opposite to John Morley's, while he waited for the present tenant of his promised dwelling to leave. He was living therefore within the prohibited precincts; and friendly as he was with Grant, Robert had a shrewd suspicion that it would not be quite safe to visit him there. There was but little need for him to do so, as Grant could come freely and safely to Aston Court, but his residence so near to Hester quickened and fanned the almost unconscious jealousy in Robert's nature. Grant could and did see her every day; he heard her speak; he would, perhaps, teach her to smile, to laugh even; and then he recalled to mind the clear, sweet, uncertain laughter of the child Hester, in those days long gone by when he had taken her upon his knee and spoken to her the words he had hesitated to address directly to Rose. If he could only hear its music again! If he could only watch the languid lines about her lips melt and tremble into smiles! If he could but see the light come and go in her grave calm eyes, as her young heart stirred with new and happy thoughts!

He was not in love with Hester; it would have shocked him to have dreamed of being so, in his inmost heart. She was still almost a child to him; and a child whose life he had robbed of all natural buoyancy and joy. He wished he could, with his own hand, put her into possession of her proper inheritance of girlish gladness; but he did not like any other hand to do it. It went very far toward making him angry to think that a mere lad, uncultivated and poor, and with no attractions but his youth, should stand so fair a chance of doing what he could never do.

Before long Robert Waldron's vague envy took more definite form. It would be a shame, he argued, to let this pearl fall into hands so rough and coarse as Grant's, who would rob it of half its delicacy and brilliance. Though she and her father might count it no bad settlement for her to become the wife of a doctor under Mr. Waldron's patronage, it would be but a poor lot for her. They would be sure to think well of Grant's prospects and position. For, after all, John Morley was no other than a poor tradesman, struggling with difficulties; and there was a stigma upon the name of Morley in Little Aston. The last thought stung him sharply. But then Rose had not been Hester's mother. The tie between them was very slight and had lasted only for a few months. There was positively no relationship at all.

At any rate, since he could not atone for the past for Rose or John Morley, was it impossible to do something for this little Hester, the child who had once been so fond of him? Could he not place her in some position where her grace and beauty would be better seen than in her present obscurity and poverty? He was rich himself, having already inherited an estate from his mother, and some day his wealth would be doubled. It would be easy for him to remove Hester from her own sphere to one where life would be all gayety and brightness about her. But it would be necessary to see her often, and to make himself well acquainted with her character. How could this be managed?

There remained yet two or three months of the session to run out before his father and sister returned to settle permanently at Aston Court; and Robert was not at all sure that their residence there would be favorable to his views with regard to Hester. Since his return she had never been to the Court. How to meet her again, with no excitement which should alarm her, or make her unwilling to speak to him, became the problem of his many idle hours. He haunted the beautiful fields and lanes of the neighborhood, in the hope of crossing her path; but Hester was accustomed to walking early in the morning, at an hour when he scarcely knew that the sun had risen; and he haunted the fields and lanes in vain. It was only through Grant, who always avoided mentioning John Morley and Hester, that he could gain any information concerning her.

"You see the Morleys often, Grant," he said one day, with an air of nonchalance.

"Most days," was the curt reply.

"Living directly opposite to them, you may see them without going to the house," said Robert.

"No," he answered; "all I can see is the window of a room where the shutters have not been taken down since I lived there. I go in most days for a chat with the old man and Miss Hester."

"The friend of the household," observed Robert, with an ill-tempered sneer.

"And the only friend," responded Grant.

"Does poor little Hetty visit nowhere?" he inquired.

"Nowhere," replied Grant; "well, yes, at one house, and that is an odd one; and her friend is still more odd. I dare say you have no idea that there is such a place in Little Aston. It is a back court, with an alley leading to it, just opposite the chapel at the top of our street. There is a small baker's shop in the court, where family baking is done; and Hester's friend lives in the top story of the baker's house. I went with her one day to visit her friend, who was ailing. The ailment was a mere nothing; but she turned out to be an old Frenchwoman who could not speak a word of English. Hester was obliged to interpret between us, and it was amusing enough, I assure you. I know very little of French, and I cannot understand a word she says."

"Who is she?" asked Robert.

"The mother of Lawson, Mr. Morley's bookbinder," said Grant; "his father was a workman in a Parisian house, and married a Frenchwoman there. She only came over to live with her son a few months ago, and Hester goes to see her occasionally. It is her fête-day to-day, and she has invited me to make one of the party; but I shall not have time."

"Is she poor?" inquired Robert, with an air of sudden interest.

"I take it for granted," he answered, "since her son is only Mr. Morley's bookbinder. He is another curious study, well worth time; eats opium, and is a little shaky in the upper story. Hester tells me he used to see visions, and that he is greatly depressed now they have ceased. I see him often."

"I don't know the man at all," said Robert; "but this old Frenchwoman must be a curiosity in Little Aston. I can talk any patois of French like a native, and I think I will go and see her."

"You had better not," said Grant, significantly; "the court is exactly opposite the chapel in our street—you understand. You must keep away."

"That's a bore," said Robert Waldron, with a slight yawn of indifference.

But as soon as Grant had left him, he turned his steps eagerly toward the house of Lawson's mother. By making a circuit he could reach the upper end of the street without passing near John Morley's house; and at this hour of the afternoon it was certain that he would be confined to it by his business. The alley opposite the chapel was easily discovered, but he was an apparition so remarkable in the court, that all its scanty population turned out to stare at him, and the subdued clamor of their voices attracted the foreigner whom he had come to seek, to her window.

For the first moment Robert could scarcely believe he was in a town in England. The old half-timber house, with its very pointed gable surrounded by rotten woodwork, and the clear, fresh, coquettish, aged face of the Frenchwoman framed in the small lattice casement, was like a vision of the lands where he had spent so many years of his life. He mounted the winding staircase with swift steps. The old woman had opened the door, and the whole scene throughout seemed familiar to him. He presented himself before madame with all the courtesy and politeness which go far to win the people of her country. He could speak to her fluently, and the tears started to her eyes as she listened to her native tongue.

"Madame will pardon me," said Robert, "for intruding upon her. But I know France well; I have lived long in that charming country. Therefore I have ventured to pay a visit here, uninvited."

"Ah, seigneur!" exclaimed madame, with vivacity, "but monsieur is the welcome one. Seat yourself, I pray you. You know France well? You have lived there? Oh! talk to me about my dear country."

Robert accepted the seat she offered him near to herself, and took infinite pains to make an agreeable impression. It was not difficult. The delight of conversing in her own language freely became almost a transport and an ecstasy to her. She laughed, she wept, she nodded and tossed her head, she gesticulated to her heart's content, and, for the time, felt herself at home again. The hours in which Hester sat beside her, talking timidly in the unfamiliar words, were nothing compared to this golden hour when this charming stranger, so distinguished, so amiable, in so beautiful a toilet, listened to her, and did not require her to speak slowly and heavily. She had not been so happy since she left Burgundy.

"You are dull here," he said at the first pause in his flood of words; "have you no one to visit you?"

"No; I am never dull," answered the old woman gayly, "always I can think of making my toilet, and going out into the town; but that time never comes. There is rain, or there is no sun, or I have the headache. But I am never dull—never. I have all the dear little saints to talk to, and I say many more prayers here in England than in France; and the saints are very good company, you may be very sure. Then there is Miss Hester, my cherished one! She is coming to pay me a visit this evening. It is my fête day, and we have a little feast together. We take tea here, because my son cannot buy the wines of France."

"You must permit me to send you some," interrupted Robert; "I, too, like the wines of France."

"But no! but no, monsieur!" cried madame, "a thousand thanks—but no!"

"Who is Miss Hester?" asked Robert.

"It is an angel," responded madame, glowing with hilarity; "a veritable angel! I could do my little acts of devotion before her as before a blessed saint! I adore her, monsieur. She is perfectly charming, but melancholy, too melancholy for one so young. I say to her, 'Go to France, my cherished one. Go, go. There the sun shines, and one laughs without knowing why.' Her religion is melancholy, also too solemn. There are no dear little saints to confess one's little faults to; and it is too solemn to go always before the great God for every trifle. She should visit my dear France, monsieur. Chut! I hear her voice below there."

They listened in silence, and heard Hester's low, pleasant voice speaking to the children, who were playing about the door to make sure of seeing the stranger when he came out again. She came up rather slowly, step by step, as though feeling her way carefully through the gloom. Robert Waldron's heart stirred, and his pulses throbbed as they had never done before; and he rose from his seat, partly from a restlessness of excitement, and partly to hide that excitement from the keen eyes of madame. He placed himself in a position so as not to be seen at once by Hester as she entered; and at the same moment a light tap upon the door announced her arrival.

She had come in, and the door was closed behind her without her perceiving any other person but the old friend she had come to visit; and Robert Waldron had time to notice, with a poignant sense of admiration, the delicate color upon the cheeks, and the sweet faint smile upon her lips, as she stooped to receive the double kiss with which madame greeted her. When this ceremony of reception was ended, he stepped forward, calm apparently, but with a tremor through all his nerves, which was strange to himself. Hester's eyes opened widely with an expression of alarm; and she made an involuntary movement as if to escape from him and take to flight.

"I was going away instantly," he said, not venturing to approach her more nearly; "you are before your time, Hester. And yet," he added, looking into her candid eyes, and resolved to cast himself frankly upon the truth, "I own I came here solely to see you, and to speak to you. Grant told me you were coming to visit this old woman to-day, and I have introduced myself here for the chance of meeting you. There was no other opportunity, and I felt that I ought to see you once more."

"But why do you want to see me?" asked Hester, not angrily, but in a sorrowful voice, which made his heart beat the faster; "what have you to say to me that can do any of us good?"

"Child," he said, "there is much that I could say to you, and very much that I can do for you. Do you understand that I must do everything in my power, for my own peace of mind, if not for the sake of making your life more happy? Now that I have been in your home, and seen the wreck there with my own eyes, there will be no more rest for me until I have repaired it in some measure, however little. I could not know by any other means all that I had done; and do you suppose I can now forget it? I remember your father a happy man, growing rich, and with a successful future before him. I have seen him now, and his ruin is before me day and night."

JUSTIFICATION BY FAITH.

S. S. Lesson for June 8, Rom. 3 : 19-31. Golden Text, Rom. 5 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Self-Justification a Natural Impulse—Pleas in Justification of Unnatural Conduct — Christians Seeking to be Justified of Men—The Unattainable Standard—Our Representative's Perfect Obedience—The Power within—Imitations of Godliness — Justification Exclusively God's Work—The Way to Deal with Present Sin—Justified by the Righteousness of God.

"BEING justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." Everybody wants to justify himself, until he learns to accept God's justification which is by Jesus Christ our Lord. There is a natural desire in every man's heart to prove he is in the right. A passionate mother beats her child really to vent her own anger, but in irate language she justifies herself to her husband or to the neighbors by an eloquent description of the naughtiness of the child. Her tribunal is the opinion of her husband and her neighbors; in their eyes she seeks to be and she does not look higher! A thief will rob a man, and justify himself by saying he was only "relieving a man that had too much!" A man will swindle another, and justify himself by saying his victim was a fool to believe him, and it served him right! A worldly mother will marry her young daughter to a heartless, polluted libertine, because he happens to be of good family; and she will justify the sacrifice of her daughter's happiness for life by the thought of how the world would say it was a good match for her. The passion for being justified in the eyes of the world has stamped out all natural affection! A worldly father would rather let his son associate with aristocratic young men who are utterly dissolute than with those who are moral and upright, but whose position is lower in the social scale!

JUSTIFIED OF MEN.

How about the children of God? Worldlings as a rule do not care to be right, but only to appear right in the eyes of those about whose opinion they care. "God is not in all their thoughts" (Ps. 10 : 4). But children of God know something about the Lord's justification; can they care for that of man? Alas, too often it is so! How frequently you hear a child of God saying, "I am going to such and such a place of amusement; do you think I am wrong?" Man's opinion is still of some value to him, he wants to be justified, counted right by fellow-Christians. Many who are seeking healing, say, "I have left off my medicines and my bandages, and I am praying for healing; do you think that is right?" Another will say, "I have given up my jewels and my gay dresses, and I have given all I have to the China Inland Mission or to the Salvation Army; do you think that is right?" Or again: "My father does not wish me to go to the meetings—God blesses me there very much—I go sometimes; do you think I am wrong?" All these questions show a measure of leaning upon man for justification, the conscience is not standing alone with God.

Now what saith the Scripture? It tells us that "what things soever the law saith, it saith to them that are under the law: that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may become guilty before God." By the law of God, which "is a discerner of the thought and intents of the heart" (Heb. 4 : 12), it is clearly proved that "All have sinned, and come short of the glory of God;" and Paul, speaking of God, declares: "By the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in His sight." Thus while in seeking to prove ourselves in the right with our fellow-creatures, we have nothing but our own deeds to fall back upon; these deeds are the very things which God's Word declares cannot justify us before Him. How often an unconverted soul says, "I have prayed and done the best I can, and fulfilled all my religious duties to the best of my ability, and I don't know what more can be expected of me." All this is beside the mark. This is just that by which the Word of God says a man cannot be justified in His sight. "Then what can I do?" asks a poor anxious soul. Just nothing. "They that are in the flesh

CANNOT PLEASE GOD"

(Rom. 8 : 8), so you may as well give it up at once and not try, but cast yourself in your helplessness upon the mercy of God.

"But it does not seem to me fair," say some, "that a man should do his very best, and put himself to a good deal of pains and trouble to serve God, and yet that it should not answer; it seems to me that God is hard." Beloved, God sees the end from the beginning, that our hearts are corrupt and sinful by nature, and that we cannot live up to our own standard, much less to His. He asks for the honest acknowledgment of the truth that we do not and cannot come up to the requirements of His holy law; that we do not and cannot really love the Lord our God with all our heart, and all our soul, and all our mind, and all our strength. We set up a high standard, and fail to attain it; God sets before us an impossible standard that He may live it in us. God does not require of us an attempt to obey His law up to the measure of our ability, He requires perfect, faultless, and unswerving obedience; and in all the history of the world but one man has been found to render such an obedience, the Man Christ Jesus. And this Man, the Son of God, came on earth, a new Head of mankind, the Son of man, to include in Himself all mankind, and to submit to the penalty of the law just as though every human being existed in His one Person.

"BEHOLD THE MAN."

So God, the Judge of all men, can now deal with every man in Christ's Person, and not in His own. "Whom God hath set forth to be a Propitiation through faith in His blood, to declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past, through the forbearance of God." God loves wholeness, entirety; He has given His Son not only to die for us, but to enter in, and take possession of our being, that He may live out His own pure, holy life within us, and in our hearts and lives fulfil the law which He has first fulfilled in His own life on earth. How unlike this is to the miserable attempt of some unspiritual man to work up an imitation of godliness in His own life, a manufacture of prayer to resemble that "praying in the Holy Ghost" which avails with God, and a wearying attempt to force and constrain the naturally sinful heart to love holy things. It is like attempting to drive a carriage with a broken wheel or to use machinery without any motive power to drive it; it cannot do the work.

Justification, or the really putting us right and setting us free from all blame, is through Jesus Christ; God sets Him forth, and tells us "He was wounded for our transgressions, and bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and by His stripes we are healed. All we, like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." Our part is to accept Him and praise God with a full heart that He is all this to us, and then act as though He were. If He was wounded for my transgressions, then all my transgressions have already received "a just recompense of reward," and in the justice of the law are put an end to, to be remembered no more against me. Can I fail to praise, and bless, and love Him who has thus set me free? Never throughout eternity. If God has laid my iniquity on Him, then it is between God the Father and God the Son, I am no more in the transaction; only my heart melts with deep gratitude that He, the holy One, should have so deeply loved me and with such unspeakable self-sacrifice.

But how about the sense of condemnation for present sin, which may from time to time be revealed to me in my heart by the Holy Spirit, who leads me into all truth? Sin is sin; God will never call it by another name. If so much as a thought of envy, pride, harsh judgment, or unkind feeling about others forms for an instant in my mind, it is sin. What then? Am I to fall under its power? If I have been cleansed from indwelling sin by the precious blood of Jesus, and the Holy Spirit has taken possession of me, then I shall be much more sensitive to what God counts sin than ever in my life. But what shall I do? Shall I attempt to discover whether it is sin or whether it is only temptation? That would be to fall under its power by my being occupied with it, and by seeking to prove I am not in the wrong, and so justify myself to myself. No; I shall refer it instantly to Jesus for Him to cleanse and deal with. If our justification is in His hands, He must justify us from first to last, and so, with cleansing and sanctification, all our part is to believe in Him and thank Him. It is by not by our own righteousness that we are justified. "Now the righteousness of God without the law is manifested, being witnessed by the law and the prophets; even the righteousness of God which is by faith of Jesus Christ unto all and upon all them that believe." Again, "To declare His righteousness for the remission of sins that are past. . . . His righteousness that He might be just, and the Justifier of him which believeth in Jesus." He is righteous to justify, He makes us righteous by His justifications, and then fulfils in us the righteousness of the law; precious, blessed, holy Saviour!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

News from the Soudan of Serious Importance has been received during the past week by the British Government, but it has not yet been given to the public. It is known, however, that El Mahdi's emissaries are actively and successfully engaged in breeding discontent among the Egyptian soldiers who, with their British commanders, are garrisoning the Soudan. Military experts there say that sooner or later there is bound to be a wholesale mutiny of the Egyptian troops, accompanied by massacres of the British officers, as in the Sepoy rebellion of 1858, which, like the present rising in the Soudan, had a quasi-religious basis. It is estimated that El Mahdi's force includes 5000 soldiers of the Egyptian regular army. Some of these men were captured after the defeat of Hicks Pacha, and willingly changed their allegiance to El Mahdi, but the greater number have come to his standard in the steady flow of desertions from the Soudan garrisons, which have been in progress for the past seven months.

The Majority of the Czarewitch, the Eldest son of the Emperor of Russia, was celebrated with much pomp on May 18th. The young prince is twenty-six years of age, which in Russia is considered the period of majority. There was a state procession in honor of the occasion to the Palace Church, the Czar and Czarina leading. They were followed by Queen Olga of Greece, the Czarewitch, Prince William of Germany, and the Russian Grand Dukes and Duchesses. After prayers had been offered, the Czarewitch took the oath of allegiance to the Czar and loyalty to the fatherland, and swore to maintain the legal order of succession to the throne. A salute of 301 guns in honor of the day was then fired. Returning to the palace the Czarewitch took the oath of military allegiance on the standard of his body-guard of the Cossack regiment. The Czarewitch in the afternoon received deputations from all classes of the civil, military, and provincial population. The shipping in the Neva was resplendent with a display of the flags of all nations. The streets were all gayly decorated with flags and banners, and at night the entire city was brilliantly illuminated. Special services of thanksgiving were held in all the churches.

A Meeting of the German Liberal Party was held on May 19th, at which expressions of confidence in the government were made and the support of the party pledged. Five hundred delegates were present. Long discussions were had, in which Herren Hobrecht, Benningsen, Miquel, and other prominent speakers took part. The convention unanimously passed resolutions expressing unswerving loyalty to the emperor and the empire, and declaring its conviction of the necessity of the anti-social law, and resolved to maintain unimpaired the constitutional rights of the people's representatives. The convention declared its determination not to coalesce with other groups, and also pledged the party to support the government to the utmost in social and political reforms, and especially to endeavor to pass the Accidents Insurance bill during the present session.

A Split in the Conservative Party of England has been caused by the Government bill extending the suffrage. Lord Randolph Churchill, a brother of the blackguardly Duke of Marlborough, though a Conservative, and one who is bidding against Sir Stafford Northcote and Lord Salisbury for the leadership of the party, publicly refused to support an amendment introduced by the Conservatives to exclude Ireland from the operations of the bill. This announcement was greeted with cheers by the Liberals. Lord Randolph said that, although he objected to the bill strongly on account of some of its provisions, he thought the position taken by the Government was statesmanlike. He had no fear of the result of enfranchising the Irish agricultural laborer, and expressed the hope that the Conservatives would not alienate the good opinion of the Irish by supporting the amendment. Lord Randolph was reprimanded in strong terms before the House of Commons by a prominent member of the party, but he voted with the Government, who on this occasion had a majority of 195. All the Parnellites and several Conservatives swelled the majority. Lord Randolph Churchill's revolt has caused much comment in the press, which regards it as an ominous sign of disorganization.

Prince Napoleon and his Eldest Son, Prince Victor, appear to have quarrelled, although both parties strenuously deny that there is any disagreement. The young man, however, has quitted the parental roof, to which he states he will not return. He has gone on a visit to the ex-Empress, and will on his return to France reside in his own private apartments. The young Prince's position is a delicate one. His father is the natural head of the family, but he has always been unpopular in France, and was especially odious to Napoleon III. and his family. The young Prince Louis who was killed in Zululand passed over Prince Napoleon in his will and made Prince Victor his heir. The consequence has been that many Bonapartists have attached themselves to the son rather than to the father.

The Five Hundredth Anniversary of the death of John Wycliffe, the earliest English reformer and translator of the Bible, was celebrated with enthusiasm in London last week. The celebration was inaugurated on May 21st at St. Andrew's Church, Blackfriars. The church is on the site of the monastery where the Pope's bull against Wycliffe was read. Dr. Ryle, Bishop of Liverpool, preached a sermon on the lessons of Wycliffe's life, in the course of which he said: "Wycliffe was the first Englishman to maintain the supremacy of the Scriptures, to denounce the Roman Church, and to translate the Bible. He was the morning star of the English reformation. He appeared in the darkest period of ignorance and superstition and urged Christians to rally around the principles he boldly proclaimed." A meeting was subsequently held in the official residence of the Lord Mayor of London to consider the best means of marking in some conspicuous and permanent way the public regard for the memory of the reformer. On the following day another large meeting under the presidency of Lord Shaftesbury was held in Exeter Hall, at which several distinguished men delivered addresses on Wycliffe's teaching and character.

The Duke of Marlborough has Caused much indignation in England by proposing to sell his magnificent collection of pictures. They were presented to his famous ancestor by the nation after the victory of Blenheim as a mark of national gratitude, and they with the splendid palace of Blenheim, also given him by the people, were regarded as heirlooms of the family. The present Duke is one of the most licentious men of the day. His character is so vile that on his accession to the title a few months ago he was informed that the usual custom of appearing at court would in his case be dispensed with—in fact, that he would not be received there. He has now offered eleven of his pictures to the Government for $1,837,500. They are masterpieces of Titian and Rubens. If the English Government declines the offer they will be sold to the German Government.

A Cure for Hydrophobia is Claimed to have been discovered by the distinguished French chemist, M. Louis Pasteur. His principle is that of inoculation. His experiments upon animals have satisfied him that a person inoculated after being bitten by a rabid animal, but before symptoms of hydrophobia have appeared, is not only saved from the results of the bite, but would not be liable to suffer from hydrophobia even if bitten at a future time by a mad dog. The virus used in inoculation is obtained from a monkey inoculated from another monkey who was also inoculated from a third monkey which was inoculated directly from a rabid dog. He also made the discovery that whereas the virus lost its intensity in being transmitted through monkeys, it increased its potency when transmitted through other animals, such as rabbits. The discovery, if true, is of vital importance.

The Incomes of Religious Societies in Great Britain show that during the past year there has been no decrease of liberality among Christian people. The following figures are from reports recently issued: The income of the British and Foreign Bible Society for the year just ended was $1,166,545; the Church Missionary Society, $1,155,000; the Weslevan Missionary Society, $750,000; the Baptist Missionary Society, $324,135; the London City Missionary Society, $314,850; the Church Pastoral Aid Society, $478,475.

Mr. and Mrs. Muller of the Bristol Orphanages who are now visiting India received a warm welcome at Benares recently. They were entertained at the London Mission House, where, on the evening of their arrival, nearly all the missionaries and missionary ladies of the five different societies, and some of the other friends of missions at Benares, assembled to tender them a reception. Mr. Müller delivered a profoundly impressive address. On the following day a large meeting was held in the mission church, at which Mr. Müller again spoke, describing his life work and recounting some remarkable cases of answer to special prayer.

The Spezia Mission in Italy, of which an Account, with a picture of the buildings occupied, has already appeared in these columns, is making encouraging progress. Mr. Edward Clarke, its superintendent, says: "After eighteen years of toil, the mission can now report no less than fourteen full stations, with more than twenty sub-stations, where the Gospel of Jesus Christ is faithfully made known. It has the aid of five British missionaries and twenty-two native helpers. It has six Bible day schools, with between three and four hundred scholars; and eight Sunday-schools, with a most extensive Bible and Tract Mission, and a Sailors' Mission; and, in addition, a Young Men and Young Women's Christian Association, and Mothers' Meetings; and, what is not to be overlooked, a noonday daily prayer-meeting."

"Thy Healer," A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter whose expositions of the International Sunday-school lessons are published every week in this journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

MENTION was made in these columns last week of the imposing celebration of the five hundredth anniversary of the death of John Wickliffe; this week with his portrait we give a brief sketch of the events of his life. At a time when the Bible is being assaulted, rudely by its avowed enemies, and insidiously by its professed friends, such facts as are furnished by a life of this intrepid man may be useful in stirring the enthusiasm of Christians. The Bible in Wickliffe's hands was the sole weapon with which he confronted the most arrogant despotism of the world, and shook from the throat of his native country its cruel deathly grasp. With the Bible alone he was enabled, through the power of God, to win for his country her religious liberty, and it was through the vitality of the principles he inculcated that at a later time the men who colonized New England were prepared to sacrifice home and fatherland rather than their faith. It is well that his countrymen should keep his memory green; it is well that we should understand why they do so.

The exact spot where John Wickliffe was born is unknown. It is generally believed to have been in the hamlet of Spresswell, close to the river Tees, and situated about half a mile from the present village of Wickliffe, near Richmond, in Yorkshire, England. The date of his birth is, according to tradition, the year 1324; but probably it should be fixed a few years earlier. He was named John, and according to the custom of the age, was called after the place of his residence—John de Wickliffe, or John of Wickliffe.

Of Wickliffe's early years and education very little is recorded. While still young he was destined for the Church. When about sixteen he was sent to Oxford. At that time the city contained five colleges, or "halls," and about the date of Wickliffe's arrival, nearly 30,000 students were studying there. He entered at Merton College, and studied under the learned and saintly Bradwardine.

It is as a theologian that Wickliffe merits the gratitude of all succeeding ages. At that time it was not necessary to read the Bible as a preparation for the priesthood. The Bachelors of Theology of the lowest grade held readings in the Word of God; but those of the middle and higher ranks considered it beneath their dignity to expound so elementary a book as the Scriptures. But Wickliffe loved the Bible, and by and by he became known as

"THE GOSPEL DOCTOR."

In 1348 a terrible pestilence ravaged Europe. Appearing first in Tartary, it devastated various kingdoms of Asia, and then passed onward to Europe. Italy's beautiful cities were turned into charnel-houses. Crossing the Alps, it entered Northern Europe and soon appeared in England. In August, 1348, it broke out at Dorchester, and on the 1st of November in the same year it reached London. One hundred thousand of the inhabitants of that city perished. Husbandry was suspended, the courts of justice were closed, Parliament did not meet; everywhere reigned terror, indescribable mourning, and death.

This terrible visitation made a deep impression upon Wickliffe. He frequently referred to it in after life. It sounded like the trumpet of the Judgment Day in his heart, and he felt how awful a thing it was to die. His burdened soul found relief in the study of the Scriptures, and the struggles which he underwent gave him a confidence in God and a conception of the importance of eternal things, which prepared him to face even death and the stake.

In 1372 Wickliffe took his degree of Doctor of Divinity—a distinction more rare in those days than in ours. The circle of his influence was extended, and he began to be regarded as the centre of a new age. A profound teacher, and his disputations gave strength to his sermons, and his sermons shed light upon his disputations. He was in the habit of holding meetings of the learned during the week, at which he proved, first, that the Bible was the supreme authority on all questions of doctrine, and secondly, that some particular doctrine was taught in the Bible. On the following Sunday he preached that doctrine to the people in simple, vigorous Saxon.

Before Wickliffe reached his fortieth year the country was stirred to its centre by the iniquities, the extortions, and the vices of a gang of men who called themselves

FRANCISCAN FRIARS.

They professed to be followers of St. Francis of Assisi, but they were not like him espoused to the bride of poverty, nor like him virtuous of life. The friars claimed, in the name of the Pope, to grant men pardon for their sins. The fallacy of this claim he exposed, but at the same time he pointed them to Him who alone could grant pardon for sin. "There cometh," said he, "no pardon but of God." In thus opposing the begging friars, the Reformer ran great hazard. Their power was immense. For nearly two centuries the Inquisition had been performing its work of torture and destruction in Spain and other lands. During that period its odious business had devolved chiefly upon the orders of St. Dominic and St. Francis, and these, while appealing to the rack and to the stake as their ultimate weapons of debate, are described as "the confessors, the preachers, and the rulers commonly of all men." Men turned to the New Testament to see if it were so, and thus became more deeply acquainted with the Word of God. Wickliffe, especially, was led to a yet closer study of the Bible. The truths of Scripture were revealed to him more and more plainly, and he was led to see how widely the Church of Rome had departed from the Gospel of Christ.

A visit to Bruges in 1374, in the capacity of a Royal Commissioner, was an important one for the reformer. The views which there opened to him of papal corruption received new impetus and prompted him to extend his denunciation from the friars to the Pope himself. Soon after his return, Wickliffe was appointed by King Edward III. to a pretty village in Leicestershire. As this preferment came from the King, it may be accepted as a sign of the royal approval of his conduct as a commissioner, and of his growing influence at Court.

The eminent services which Wickliffe rendered to his country, and the bold stand that he maintained against the temporal power of the Pope, caused him to be held in the highest esteem by the nation, but brought upon him the vengeance of the Pontiff and the papal party. On the 3d of February, 1377, at the instance of Courtenay, Bishop of London, he was cited to appear on the 19th of the same month, in Our Lady's Chapel in St. Paul's Cathedral, to answer for his teaching.

As the day drew near, rumors spread abroad of what was about to take place, and when the time arrived a large crowd had assembled at the door of the cathedral. Attended by

TWO POWERFUL FRIENDS

John of Gaunt, Duke of Lancaster, and Lord Percy, Earl Marshal of England—Wickliffe appeared at the outside of the assemblage. The Duke of Lancaster and Wickliffe had met at Bruges, and the Duke held the Reformer in high esteem, on political if not on religious grounds. He therefore accompanied him and resolved to show him countenance before the tribunal of bishops.

The haughty Courtenay watched the movements of Wickliffe and his friends, and beheld with displeasure the humble Rector of Lutterworth accompanied by the two most powerful men in England. Lancaster, having uttered some haughty words, was immediately attacked by the Bishop's partisans, who fell upon him and Percy, and even upon Wickliffe, who alone had remained calm. The two noblemen resisted, their friends and servants defended them, the uproar became extreme, and there was no hope of restoring tranquillity. The two lords escaped with difficulty, and the assembly broke up in great confusion. (See frontispiece picture, No. 1.)

As for Wickliffe, he was dismissed with against preaching his doctrines. But this decision of the priests was not ratified by the people of England. Public opinion declared in favor of the Reformer. "If he is guilty," said they, "why is he not punished? If he is innocent, why is he ordered to be silent? If he is the weakest in power, he is the strongest in truth!" The cause of Wickliffe began to be more widely discussed and better understood by the nation. The designs of his enemies had been thwarted, but their hostility increased.

Wickliffe next challenged the Pope, as the Vicar of St. Peter, to prove his right to temporal supremacy. "It may indeed be claimed by you," said he, "in virtue of some other plea, but assuredly by no right or title derived from the apostles. For how could an apostle give unto you that which he did not himself possess?" His penetrating genius, his sterling uprightness, his cool, cautious, yet fearless courage, made the humble Rector of Lutterworth a most formidable antagonist, and one whom the Romish hierarchy saw must not be despised.

Sudbury, the new Archbishop of Canterbury, summoned Wickliffe to appear before him in April, 1378, to answer for his teaching. The court was to sit in the Archbishop's chapel at Lambeth. The papal commissioners were the Primate and the Bishop of London. On the day appointed, Wickliffe, unaccompanied by either the Duke of Lancaster or Percy, proceeded to the archiepiscopal palace, situated on the right bank of the Thames, opposite Westminster. "Men expected he should be devoured, being brought into the lion's den," remarks Fuller in his "Church History," but while the Primate and his peers were consulting, a messenger entered. It was Sir Lewis Clifford, who had been sent by the queen-mother to forbid the bishops passing sentence upon the courageous and dreaded Reformer. The threatening aspect of the multitude had produced a feeling of consternation among the bishops; the message brought from the queen-mother rendered their dismay complete. The proceedings were instantly stopped. A second time the Reformer returned unhurt and uncondemned from the tribunal of his powerful enemies. A second time he was victorious. The court issued a prohibition against the future teaching of the tenets charged against him; but, as he had given no promise to obey it, he continued to declare and spread his doctrines as heretofore.

Wickliffe was

A TRUE PASTOR.

He preached the Gospel to the poor, and ministered by the bedside of the sick and dying, whether freeman or slave. (See frontispiece picture, No. 2.) Nearly three hundred of his sermons remain, having escaped the efforts which were persistently put forth to destroy all that issued from his pen. These sufficiently prove that his labors as a preacher were abundant. In his pulpit discourses, as well as in his writings, he continued to denounce the lust of dominion, the avarice, and the cruelty of the Pope. The Bible as he studied it became increasingly precious, and the Reformer now is-ued his work "On the Truth and Meaning of cripture." In this he reaffirmed the supreme uthority of the Word of God, the right of pri- ate judgment, and the sufficiency of Christ's aw to rule Christ's Church.

The labors which devolved upon him, and the arassing attacks of his foes, were more than is frame could bear. In 1379 he fell t Oxford. Great was the joy in the monaste- es; but for that joy to be complete the heretic ust recant. Four regents, representing the our orders of friars, accompanied by four alder- en, were deputed to visit their dying enemy. hey hastened to his dwelling, and found him retched upon his bed, calm and serene. "You ave death on your lips," said they; "be ouched by your faults, and retract in our pres- nce all that you have said to our injury." The onsolation he had found in Jesus Christ gave e indomitable man fresh energy. He begged is servant to raise him on his couch. (See rontispiece picture, No. 3.) Then, feeble and ale, and scarcely able to support himself, he rned toward the friars, who were waiting for is recantation, and opening his livid lips, and xing on them a piercing look, he said with em- hasis, "I shall not die, but live, and again de- are the evil deeds of the friars." The monks ished in astonishment and confusion from his amber. Wickliffe's prediction was verified, d he lived to complete the most glorious of is works,

THE TRANSLATION OF THE BIBLE to the language of the common people.

This grand work was finished by 1382. As a ersion of the Scriptures it was remarkably uthful and spirited. The following extract ill show the character of his translation. It is at of John 14 : 1–4: "Be not youre herte raied, ne drede it; ye bileuen in God, and leue ye in me. In the hous of my fadir ben any dwellyngis; if ony thing lesse, Y hadde id to you, for Y go to make redi to you a ace. And if Y go, and make redi to you a ace, eftsoones Y come, and Y schal take you my silf, that where Y am, ye be. And hidur Y go, ye witen, and ye witen the weie." icture No. 4 shows Wickliffe at his work.)

In those days there was no printing-press to ultiply copies by the thousand as in our times, d no publishing firms to circulate these thou- nds among the people. But the interest taken the man and in his work enlisted a hundred pert hands, who, though they toiled to multi- y copies, could scarcely supply the many who ere eager to buy. Some ordered complete pies to be made for them; others were con- nt with portions; the same copy served sev- al families in many instances, and in a very ort time Wickliffe's English Bible had ob- ined a wide circulation, and brought a new life to many an English home.

The importance of

eply impressed the Reformer. "The highest rvice," he said, "that men may attain to on rth is to preach the Word of God." He saw e begging friars strolling over the country, eaching the legends of saints and the history the Trojan war, captivating the people, and felt the need of doing for the glory of God at they did to fill their wallets. Turning to e most pious of his disciples, he said, "Go d preach, it is the sublimest work. After ur sermon is ended, do you visit the sick, the ed, the poor, the blind, and the lame, and ccor them according to your ability." These angelists travelled throughout the land, find- g favor with the people, but being persecuted the Church. In 1382 "their number very uch increased, and that, starting like saplings m the root of a tree, they were multiplied, d filled every place within the compass of the nd." The doctrines of the Reformer were us disseminated over the country, and they came known to all classes of society. Among e common people his disciples were innumer- le. "You could not meet two men on the highway," said one of his enemies, "but one of them was a Wickliffite."

In the spring of 1381 Wickliffe posted up at Oxford twelve theses, or short propositions, in which he denied the dogma of Transubstantia- tion, and challenged those of a contrary opinion to debate the matter with him. The first of these theses was as follows: "The consecrated host which we see upon the altar is neither Christ nor any part of Christ, but an efficacious sign of Him." Wickliffe argued that the bread and wine were as truly bread and wine after as before their consecration. The publication of these theses, as may be imagined, caused great commotion at Oxford. (See frontispiece pict- ure, No. 5.)

THE WAT TYLER RISING.

In the summer of 1381 the people, oppressed by their heavy burdens and the severity of the tax-collectors, rose in rebellion, and, led by Wat Tyler and a dissolute priest named Ball, marched upon London. The enemies of the Reformation endeavored to lay the blame of this insurrection to the teaching of Wickliffe. But the Gospel incites not to deeds of violence, and the sympathy of the insurrectionists with the mendicant friars—the enemies of Wickliffe —proved that he was not the one who led the people on to rebellion.

Immediately after the insurrection of Wat Tyler and his followers, Courtenay, the Bishop of London, was made Primate in the place of Sudbury, and he convoked a synod to try the Rector of Lutterworth. The court met on the 17th of May, 1382, in the hall of the Dominican Monastery, Blackfriars, London. It consisted of eight prelates, fourteen doctors, six bachelors of divinity, fifteen mendicant friars, and four monks. It was, however, adjourned to a later period.

ANOTHER TRIAL.

In November, 1382, both Parliament and Con- vocation were assembled at Oxford. Courtenay appealed to the Parliament against his enemy, but his appeal was contemptuously rejected. Baffled in the Parliament, Courtenay turned to Convocation. In this meeting the Archbishop had concentrated his whole strength. Six bish- ops, many doctors in divinity, and a host of in- ferior clergy were there; the concourse being swelled by the dignitaries and youths of Oxford. Before this assembly Wickliffe was again cited to appear.

A solemn silence reigned as the Reformer stood alone before his judges, calm and firm. The indictment turned especially upon Transub- stantiation. Did he affirm or deny that cardinal doctrine of the Church; Lancaster had advised him to submit in all doctrinal matters to the judgment of his order. But he was bound by his conscience and the Word of God, and he could not deny. Raising his venerable head, and looking with his clear, piercing eye straight at Courtenay (see frontispiece picture, No. 6), he reproached the priests for disseminating error in order to sell their masses, and then, stop- ping, uttered the simple but energetic words, "The truth shall prevail." "Having thus spo- ken," says D'Aubigné, "he prepared to leave he court. His enemies dared not say a word; and, like his Divine Master at Nazareth, he passed through the midst of them, and no man ventured to stop him." Leaving Oxford, he retired once more to Lutterworth.

His remaining days were passed in peace, un- disturbed by his enemies. Their enmity was unabated, but God in a marvellous manner pro- tected His servant. The contention between the two rival Popes, the political troubles of England, the favor with which the Duke of Lan- caster still regarded him, all combined to form a rampart around the Reformer. "His very courage, in the hand of God, was his shield; for, while weaker men were apprehended and compelled to recant, Wickliffe, who would burn, but not recant, was left at liberty." He himself expected nothing but imprisonment and death.

During the two years which intervened be- tween his appearance at the Oxford Synod and his death, Wickliffe continued zealously at work. But the end drew near. Toward the close of 1382 the Reformer had been but from this he partially recovered. He was in his church at Lutterworth, in the midst of his beloved flock, on the last Sunday in 1384, en- gaged in the administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. As he was in the act of consecrating the bread and wine, he was again stricken with paralysis, and fell to the ground. His friends affectionately carried him from the church to the rectory, and laid him upon his bed. He continued speechless until the 31st of December, 1384, when he died.

Thirty years after the Reformer's death, the Council of Constance condemned a number of propositions which were said to have been ex- tracted from his writings; and as it appeared that he died still holding those doctrines, he was pronounced an obstinate heretic, his mem- ory was declared infamous, and it was decreed "that his body and bones should be taken from the ground and thrown away from the burial of any church." In pursuance of this decree, his grave at Lutterworth was opened and his re- mains removed. These were then burned, and the ashes cast into the adjoining brook named the "Swift," and Fuller, describing the scene, quaintly but truly says: "This brook conveyed them into Avon, the Avon into the Severn, the Severn into the narrow seas, they into the main ocean, and thus the ashes of Wickliffe were the emblem of his doctrine, which is now dispersed all the world over."

As thou these ashes, little brook, will bear
Into the Avon, Avon to the tide
Of Severn, Severn to the narrow seas,
Into main ocean they, this deed accursed,
An emblem yields to friends and enemies,
How the bold Teacher's doctrine, sanctified
By truth, shall spread, throughout the world dispersed.

How a Sailor Found Christ.—He Thus Tells the story: "It is four years and six months since I gave myself to Jesus. Before that I was one of the worst characters about the quays of Glasgow. Strong drink was my god, and the rum-shop my place of worship. Four years and nine months ago I joined a small coasting steamer, and found that one of my shipmates was an old companion of mine, whom I had not seen for six years. One day I was standing on the gangway swearing badly, and this man came forward and said, 'You know very well that you should not say these words.' Then he turned away and left me. The rebuke went home and would not leave me, more especially when I thought what kind of man he had been. On the next Sabbath I went to the Seaman's Bethel, determined to reform and to get to heaven by living a good life. The man who spoke that day pointed with his finger over to me and said, 'There is a man who is coming to God through his own good works.' Ah, thought I, my com- panion has been telling of me; I'll never try to be a Christian again. When I got to the steamer on Monday my companion asked, 'How did you pass the Sabbath?' 'Very well.' 'Where were you?' 'In the Seamen's Bethel; do you know any one there?' 'Yes; an old man.' 'Do you know a young man about thirty-five years of age?' 'No.' 'Were you telling any of them about me?' 'No.' The preacher pointed to me and said, "Here is a man trying to save him- self." 'Well, is it true?' 'Yes.' 'Then it is clear that God sent the word to you.' Well, after this talk I tried to stop drinking and swearing, but it was no use till I actually became a man of prayer, though not a Christian. God heard and answered my prayers, and kept me from these sins. Then I became more anxious about my soul. In a railway carriage on the Greenock Railway God sent peace to my soul through the words in John 8 : 46, 'If I say the truth why do ye not believe me?' I took it as though Jesus put the question to me personally, and I thank God that I believed Him at once and praise Him day by day."

CAN THE UNPARDONABLE SIN BE COMMITTED IN OUR TIME?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, June 1, 1884.

"All sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men, but the blasphemy against the Holy Ghost shall not be forgiven unto men. And whosoever speaketh a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him: but whosoever speaketh against the Holy Ghost, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in this world, neither in the world to come."—MATTHEW 12:31, 32.

"He found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears."—HEBREWS 12:17.

LET it be understood at the outset that the Protestant pulpit has not any revelation not made to the Protestant pew. Ministers of religion have no right to lord it over God's heritage. When we preach we do not utter edicts, but only offer opinions. In this day, when the Bible is in almost every house and in almost every hand, let every man understand that he has an equal right with others to interpret the Word of God, asking only divine illumination. As you sometimes gather the family at the evening stand to hear some interesting book read, so this great Christian home circle gather around this text, and may the light of the same lamp fall on all our faces.

You see from the reading of the first passage that there is a sin against the Holy Ghost which never will be pardoned. A man having committed it is bound hand and foot for the dungeons of despair. Sermons may be preached to him, songs may be sung to him, prayers may be offered in his behalf, but all to no purpose. He is a captive for this life and a captive for the world to come. Has any one in this audience committed that sin? Mark you, all sins are against the Holy Ghost, but the one spoken of in the text is a very particular sin, and differs from all other sins that a man ever committed or ever can commit.

WHAT THE SIN IS.

In my opinion, the sin against the Holy Ghost was ascribing the works of the Spirit to Satanic agency. Indeed, the Bible distinctly so declares. Here is a man who is restored to sight after having been blind, and in Christ's time a man says to him, "That's the work of Beelzebub;" or a man dead is brought to life by the Lord Jesus, and some one says, "That man was brought to life by Satanic power, and not by Divine power." As soon as a man thought that or said that he dropped under the curse of the text.

I do not believe it is possible to commit that sin in our time. I think it only could be committed in apostolic times. The day of miracles has ceased, and Christ is not present in body, and I have the opinion that that sin cannot be committed in our own day. However, it is a very dangerous thing to say anything against the Holy Ghost, and the human race has been most mercifully kept from that. You have heard men swear by the name of Almighty God, and swear by the name of Jesus Christ; but you have never heard any one swear by the Holy Ghost; so that, looking over this audience this morning, I can feel there is

SALVATION FOR ALL.

It is not as when they put out in the lifeboats from the Loch Earn to the Ville du Havre, and the sailors knew there was room for only a part of the passengers. How badly those sailors must have felt when they got some of the passengers into the lifeboats and then pulled away, leaving others to perish! I am glad that the Gospel lifeboat is large enough to take in all the people, and I can confidently this morning invite you to come aboard this old Gospel craft.

But there are persons here who are afraid that they have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost, and that they can never be pardoned. A sailing vessel is becalmed mid-Atlantic—becalmed for one day, two days, three days, four days, five days, six days. The captain walks the deck and says, "It seems to me that the gales of Heaven have forsaken this ship, and that we will never get into harbor." But after a while the sails begin to flutter, and the water begins to ripple, and after a while the sails are full, and the ripple of the sea becomes a great billow. Is it very hard work to persuade that captain that the gales of Heaven have not forsaken the ship? Now, you are here this morning, and you have an anxiety of soul lest you have committed the unpardonable sin. That very anxiety was produced by the Holy Ghost, and shows you are not forsaken. For this is a divine simile, the Holy Spirit compared to the winds of heaven. And this anxiety which you feel in regard to this subject, and this earnest question that you are asking, are proof positive that your soul is being moved upon by the Holy Ghost, and you are not becalmed forever. There is an opportunity of getting into the harbor.

But while it seems to me impossible that a man commit the sin spoken of in the first text, the second text that I read to you implies that a man may commit

AN IRREVOCABLE SIN.

That is, he may do a wrong that can never be corrected, he may do something for which afterward he shall seek a place of repentance and not find it, though he seek it with tears. Esau had a birthright. It meant temporal and spiritual blessing. In a fit of hunger one day he traded it off for something to eat. As though you should take bonds and mortgages and government securities, and in some fit of recklessness or hunger you should go into a restaurant and put down these valuables and legally transfer them in order that you might get some style of food. Esau for a mess of pottage sold his birthright. He was very sorry about it afterward, but he could not get it back. He sought a place of repentance, and sought it carefully and with tears, but could not find it.

I. Now, while I do not think it is possible for you to commit the unpardonable sin spoken of in the text, it is possible for you and for me to make irrevocable mistakes, and in this class of irrevocable mistakes, in the first place, I put the follies of

A MISSPENT YOUTH.

At forty, or fifty, or sixty years of age we may wake up and say, "Oh, the neglects of my early studies when I was at school or college; how I neglected geology, and mathematics, and chemistry; I wish I had not neglected them; how very helpful they would have been to me in the duties of life; I am sorry." Are you sorry? You will never get back those advantages, it does not make any difference how sorry you are. God will forgive you, but you will never forgive yourself. You may say, "Oh, if I had only disciplined my mind when I had the opportunity!" I do not wonder at your regret. You can seek a place of repentance; you will seek it in vain, you cannot find it. A man at fifty years of age says, "Oh, I wish I had not on me these habits of indolence! When will I ever get rid of them?" Never. Every stroke of work you do will be against the protest of your entire physical nature. You get that habit on you when you are twenty or twenty-five years of age, and you never will get over it.

A man always—every man has an idea in his mind that somewhere in the future there will be a time when he can correct his mistakes. If we only repent in time God will forgive us, and then it will be just as though we had never sinned. My subject runs in collision with that theory. There are those who go in the days of their youth and commit transgressions. They call it

"SOWING WILD OATS."

They say, "Oh, we'll get over these things after a while, and then we'll devote ourselves to high and noble enterprises." "They that sow to the winds will reap the whirlwind." A man at forty or fifty years of age says, "Oh, if it wasn't for the sins of my youth what a strong constitution I would have had, and how useful I might have been to the world and the Church." You are sorry. Are you? Yes, but that does not bring back the energy that you lost.

At the foot of this pulpit I met a clergyman at the close of the service. I said, "Where are you preaching now?" "Oh," he replied, "I haven't preached any for years; I am suffering now for the sins of my youth; I shall never preach again." I knew that man to be a consecrated man, honored to the very last extent in the neighborhood where he had preached the Gospel, wholly consecrated to the Lord; but he had on him the effects of the sins of his youth. Oh, there is a wonderful pathos in that passage of the Psalmist where he says, "Remember not the sins of my youth." God forgave him, but the laws of nature never forgive, never forgive. They pursue a man for the sins of his youth; they pursue him to the gate of the grave, and they shake their fist at him after he has gone in, crying, "Pay me what thou owest!"

God forgives, but the laws of nature never forgive. Why do I say this? To give annoyance to those who have only baleful retrospection? No, for the benefit of these young people. I want them to understand that people never get over the sins of their youth, though God may forgive those sins. I want them to understand that eternity is wrapped up in this hour. I want them to understand that a minute is not made up of sixty seconds, but of everlasting ages. Oh, what a dignity this gives to the lives of these young people! In the light of this subject life is not something to be smirked about, not something to be danced at, but something to be weighed in everlasting balances, the balances of eternity. Young man, the sin you committed yesterday, the sin you commit to-day, the sin you shall commit to-morrow, will be in some respects. God may forgive you, the laws of nature never will. The scars of that sin will be everlasting.

A father was trying to illustrate to his son his evil habits, and every time the son committed a sin the father drove a nail into a post until there were many nails in the post. The young man after a while began to repent his sins and give up his evil habits, and every time he repented the father took a nail out of the post until after a while the nails were all gone out of the post. "But," said the son, "father, the scars are all there yet." God forgives, but the scars stay. Do not be under the infatuation, young men, that because God forgives you and because society after a while may forgive you, the laws of nature are ever going to forgive you. The follies of youth are irrevocable mistakes. There are a thousand men in this house who with hand uplifted to heaven would attest it.

In Belgium, sixty years ago, some miners got into a quarrel, and one set of miners, in order to revenge another set of miners, set fire to the mine where they were working. That fire has burned on for half a century; it is blazing to-day. They cannot put it out. It never will be put out until it is wrapped in the greater conflagration of the last day. It is easy to start a fire that never will be quenched. Oh, young men, be not under the infatuation that the sins of your youth can ever be eradicated. God will forgive you, and you may enter heaven, but the scars will be yet.

II. I will put amid these irrevocable mistakes

PARENTAL NEGLECT.

We start our children. When they are ten years of age we wake up and try to correct this or that habit. It is too late. I believe that if parents do not make an impression upon a child for Christ and for heaven before ten years are past, they never will make any impression. Talk about people beginning life at twenty-one; life is decided between ten and twenty in nine cases out of ten. The following fifty years of not so much importance in the formation of character as the first twenty. A man wakes up at fifty years of age. He says, "I must become a Christian; here and now I yield my heart to God." He goes home a Christian. He has spent all his life in worldliness and sin. He says, "Now let us call the family together and have prayers." He opens his Bible. He says, "Call the family together." Where are the family? One in New Orleans, one in Cincinnati, one in Boston, two in eternity. Ah, he cannot call his family together! I say it for the benefit of young parents, parents of twenty-five, or thirty, or thirty-five, now is the time for family prayers, now is the time to call your family together.

ALPINE CLIMBERS.

I do not think I was ever so much impressed by a picture as I was by one, although it was only a rough wood-cut that I saw in a window in Chamouni, Switzerland, a representation of a group of people that had been trying a few months before to climb the Alps. You know that people who climb the Alps have a rope put around the waist, and guides go ahead and guides come after. The rope connects them all together, so that if one slips the others may save him from fatality. Well, this group of eight or ten people were on the side of the mountains, all tied together, passing along on a very slippery place, and one slipped and dropped, and the others slipped and were going down this precipice, when one man, with more muscular power than the others, halted on the ice, struck his feet into the iceberg, and halted; but the rope broke! Fifty years from now, at the foot of that glacier, the rest will be found. Here is a whole family bound together by a cord of affection wandering on the slippery places of worldliness and sin. All given up to the world. No Christ in that family. All bound together and on the slippery places. Passing on down, the father at fifty years of age strikes his foot on the "Rock of Ages," and halts. But the rope broke! the rope broke!

A ship carpenter in New York wakes up and says, "That vessel has been gone three days at sea. Why, there is a timber in that ship that ought not to have been there. It was worm-eaten." Or, "I had a timber put in that ship that was the wrong kind of wood. Oh, I am so sorry about it! I am very sorry. I will correct it. I have another piece of timber to put in the place of it." Correct it! That ship went down last night in a cyclone. Oh, the time to train our children for God and for heaven is at the start; it is at the start. When a man comes at fifty years of age and chooses God, I congratulate him, but oh, I think what a pity you did not come twenty-five years ago.

III. Among the irrevocable mistakes also I place

UNKINDNESS TO THE DEPARTED.

When I was a boy and a little reckless, my mother used to say to me, "De Witt, you will be sorry for this when I am gone." I remember just how she looked, with her cap and spectacles. I remember just how she sat with the Bible on her lap. I laughed the admonition off, but she never said a truer thing in all her life. I have been sorry for it ever since. And yet we do unkindness to people. "Oh," we say, "it don't make much difference; we'll apologize after a while, and if we don't apologize it don't make any difference." Just wait until they are gone, and see how you will feel about it. A parent, without asking the circumstances of the provocation, boxes a child's ears. A little child falling in the street comes in all covered with the dust, and the parent, as though one disaster was not enough, whips it. After a while there will be a little slab on a grave in Greenwood, and on it, "Our Willie" or "Our Charlie." The moral of which is: be kind to your friends while you have them.

BE ECONOMICAL OF YOUR SATIRE.

Spare your scolding. Shut up in a dark cave from which they can never swarm forth all the words that have a sting in them. You will be sorry for them after a while—very soon you will be sorry—perhaps to-morrow.

David Hume had a most excellent Christian mother, and he set himself to work to overthrow her religion. David Hume was applauded in the courts of Europe, and his mother was fascinated with his popularity. David Hume came home, and this old Christian woman said, "Well now, here is my son; he is a great man, and he says religion is a sham, and it must be." So she gave up her religion. David Hume one day riding from Edinburgh to London was met on the way by the postman, who handed him a letter. He opened the letter. It was from his mother, saying, "I am dying, and my philosophy gives me no comfort. I am in great sorrow. Come to me and comfort me, my son David." Do you suppose that David Hume could ever undo the wrong he did that mother, either in this world or the world to come? He robbed her of her holy religion, and gave her a hollow philosophy that afforded her no peace when she died. Oh, these wrongs to the departed, they are irrevocable mistakes.

IV. In this list I also put all of getting good. I never come to a Saturday night but I can see that during the week there were opportunities where I might have bettered my spiritual condition. I never come to a birthday but I think there were times during the past year that might have been made better, and I neglected the opportunity. I never leave this pulpit and go home, morn or night, but I regret that I did not better present the great truths of the Gospel. How is it with you? Have you lost any opportunities?

If a farmer take a certain number of bushels of wheat, and he throw this wheat on a certain number of acres of ground properly prepared, he expects a proportionate number of sheaves. Have the sheaves of your moral and spiritual harvest corresponded with the truth and the advantages planted? I cannot tell you, my brother, my sister. You know. You know. What does that mean? Why, it means, if we are going to get any good out of this Sabbath we are going to get it before the hand of the clock turns around to twelve to-night. It means that opportunities gone are gone forever. It means while at our feasts the chalice may be passed to me and I may decline it, yet that very chalice may come back to me after a while; in this matter of the Gospel feast a chalice comes and I reject it—it never comes back—never. That one opportunity gone forever.

V. In this class I put all lost

OPPORTUNITIES OF USEFULNESS.

There is a chance of benefiting that man once—never again. You have a business partner who is a proud, arrogant man. If ordinarily you should say to him, "Attend to the things of the soul, become a Christian," he would say to you, "Mind your own business, and I'll mind mine." But there has been an affliction in his household, and his heart is tender. He is looking for sympathy and solace. Now is your time, oh man! Speak, or forever hold your peace. You are in a religious meeting. A great impression is being produced. Something says to you, "Now is the time for you to speak a word for God." Your cheek flushes, you half arise from your seat, you sink back cowering before men whose breath is in their nostrils. Your neglect will tell on eternal ages.

A lost opportunity of getting good or of doing good never comes back. You may fish for it; it will never take the hook. You may dig for it; it will never be found.

Here I stand on the first Sabbath in June, 1884. There are people in this house I have never met before, and I will never meet them again until the judgment. If I miss this opportunity I miss my only opportunity. I want them to understand that every minute has two wings, and that it does not fly in a circle, like a hawk, but in a straight line from eternity to eternity, and that if a minute, if an opportunity, if a privilege get an inch against us, a hundredth part of an inch apast us, a thousandth part of an inch apast us, a millionth part of an inch apast us, no man can ever come up with it. So I stand before men who have this day

A GLORIOUS BIRTHRIGHT.

What was Esau's birthright compared with this? Birthright of a Christian ancestry. Birthright of Gospel privileges. Birthright of glorious Sabbaths. Birthright of national liberty. Birthright glorious beyond all description. Are you going to sell it? Satan wants to buy it. The world wants to buy it. Will you sell it? God forbid that you should make such a bargain as they offer to your soul! And so this morning I stand here and offer you all the pardon and peace of the Gospel "without money and without price."

I could play a sweeter harp, I could tell of gates of pearl and crowns of light, but of what advantage would that be to a man who has no preparation for that land, who is on the wrong road? And so I stand here inviting you to come; and while there are sins which we have committed which are irrevocable—I confess it for myself, and you must confess it for yourselves—there are sins which we have committed which are irrevocable, still, come now, let all come to the foot of God's throne of mercy and have our sins pardoned. Let us all be made right with God. Come, let us enter into the wide door of His mercy, that door so wide that you may all enter. I stand here, though a stranger to many of you, as it is every Sabbath morning and every Sabbath night, with just as much confidence as though I knew all your history, and I offer you pardon, and peace, and life, and heaven, now and without one single exception.

STUART HOLLAND,

the lad, stood on the Arctic. You know the Arctic was run down in a fog. Stuart Holland stood at the signal-gun. He was a mere lad, but he felt the responsibility. He thought if he could sound that gun so ships passing by could hear, perhaps all the passengers might be rescued. So Stuart Holland, the lad, stood at the signal-gun and fired it. It went over the sea, boom! boom! boom! The engineer left his place. The helmsman left his place. Some of the passengers fainted, some prayed, some blasphemed, some got off in the lifeboats, some went off on rafts, but three hundred were drowned. But Stuart Holland stood at the gun, and kept sounding it and sounding it until after a while the powder was gone. Then he took an axe and went down to the magazine, and brought out more powder, and stood at the signal-gun, and it sounded over the sea, boom! boom! boom! When the ship sank he sank.

Oh, there are some of you in peril, immortal peril. Sickness will come on you. Death will come on you. Judgment will come on you. Eternity will come on you. In the most unexpected moment it will crash into you. Some get off in

THE LIFEBOATS.

All is well. You are just as safe for heaven as if you were there. You may have your struggles and trials, but you are going into glory that is provided for you. You get into the lifeboat. Others are making no attempt to escape. So I stand here and I sound this signal-gun of the Gospel. "Now is the accepted time. Now is the day of salvation." "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thought, and let him return unto the Lord who will have mercy and unto our God who will abundantly pardon." Now! Now! "Whosoever will, let him come." Now! Now!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Firing a Broadside at Friends.—The Rev. Mr. Salmond said at a recent meeting: "During the war between England and France two vessels came into collision in the darkness of night. They immediately poured a fierce and deadly broadside into each other, thinking they were enemies. You can imagine their sorrow and vain regrets when the morning light showed that they were friends, both sailing under the English flag. Naturally, you say, 'It was a foolish action to fire upon each other without knowing upon whom they were firing.' Well, do you never say hard things of your fellow-worker for Christ, thinking him an enemy to the cause? 'Speak not evil one of another, brethren'" (James 4 : 11).

Satan Nibbling at a Man's Heels.—Mr. Jack related the following: "I heard of a good man who when dying said in answer to the question, 'Have you perfect peace?'—'I have great peace in Christ, but Satan is nibbling at my heels.' This expresses very pithily our conflict with sin in this life. So long as we are in the flesh, Satan will not let us alone; he will be always 'nibbling at our heels;' therefore we ought always to be looking to Christ, and not allow ourselves to be distracted by the annoyances which beset us day by day, and then we will have peace flowing like a river.' Christ's heel has been bruised by Satan, but, thank God, Christ has bruised his head, and will shortly beat him down under our feet."

A Highlander's Testimony, as Recently given, was as follows: "I praise the Lord that through the blood of Jesus I can say I am saved from my old sins and desires. I was a black sinner indeed when the Saviour took me and washed me in the cleansing fountain opened for sinners like me. My former life was a feverish existence of false excitement and deep depression. When I was not under the influence of drink I was dull and morose, but now I am calm and deeply tranquil, knowing that my Heavenly Father loves me and always watches over me. I rest in peace and find that His promises are true. I wish to testify that when Jesus saved me He gave a proof that He can and will save any one who really desires salvation."

A Boast at a Dinner-Table.—The Rev. Dr. Joseph Brown said: "A medical doctor once said to me at a dinner-table, 'I can take care of myself, Dr. Brown, without signing the pledge.' I did not flare up at the implied reproach that I could not take care of myself without the pledge, and reply angrily, 'Do you think I can't do the same?' 'No,' I answered softly, as enjoined by the Scriptures, 'I have no doubt you can do so, but as a professed Christian you are bound to think of others besides number one.' The question put by the murderer Cain to God, 'Am I my brother's keeper?' is still, we might say, daily put by the advocates of our drinking habits to those Christians who are toiling in the name of our divine Master to overcome and abolish these customs, which are dragging the élite of our youth to a shameful grave."

A Wrecked Sailor's Song.—Mr. Pittendreigh related: "One Sunday morning in December, two years ago, the worshippers in a Methodist chapel in the south of England heard the cry which usually drives the blood from the cheeks of the stoutest-hearted man—'A ship on the rocks!' The minister stopped the service, as most of the men belonging to the village were in the chapel, and said, 'We will go and try to save life, friends!' He left the pulpit, and himself led his congregation to the coast, where they saw a ship being dashed to pieces on the rocks, and saw that there was no chance whatever of saving life, owing to her position. There was no life-saving apparatus, and the life-boat was at least ten miles off. Three men clung to the wreck in full view of the crowd, which was helpless to save them. The man of God, when he realized this, asked, 'Can I speak to these men?' 'Yes, sir. Here is a speaking-trumpet.' As he raised it to his mouth a large wave came rolling shoreward and washed off two of the distressed men, and they were seen no more. The minister thought, 'Shall I preach a sermon to that man? No; it will not do. Lord, give me wisdom to speak.' Again he put the trumpet to his mouth, and shouted through it, 'Hold on! Look to Jesus!' He listened, but there was no reply. Again he cried, 'Hold on! Look to Jesus!' This time a voice came faintly over the intervening water, 'Ay, ay, sir! I have.' The sorrowing watchers soon heard a voice singing, and this is what they heard that doomed man sing:

'Jesus, lover of my soul:
Let me to Thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high;
Hide me, O my Saviour, hide,
Till the storm of life is past;
Safe into the haven guide,
O receive my soul at last!'

As he began the second verse another wave came rolling on, and swept him into eternity."

An Officer's Kindness to a Rat-Catcher.—"An officer in the army was dining with a gentleman, and remarked to a nephew of his host, 'What do you think! your uncle tells me that he gave up his wine for the sake of an old, drinking negro rat-catcher in the West Indies!' The officer was much amused at the idea of a gentleman giving up anything for a nigger; he had not realized that the negro was his brother, and that he was his keeper. The facts of the case were as follows: The host at one time held an estate in the West Indies. One day he was urging the rat-catcher to give up drinking rum, pointing out that it was ruining him here and hereafter. The old negro replied, 'It is all very well for you, massa, to tell me to give up my drop of rum, but you take wine every day yourself.' 'Sambo, if you will give up rum I will give up wine.' His kindness so moved the heart of the old rat-catcher that he gave up the rum, and more than that, he inquired into the cause of his master's self-denial, and for the first time really understood that the ethics of Christianity were comprised in the new commandment given by Jesus, 'That ye love one another; as I have loved you, that ye also love one another' (John 13 : 34)."

Cast into Prison for Christ's Sake.—The Rev. Dr. Bonar said: "Ten years ago a Jewish boy lived next door to a Christian family, with the members of which he got to be very intimate. Out of curiosity he asked them to take him to church, which they gladly did. His visit was repeated again and again, till his father heard of it, and sternly prohibited him going to a place of Christian worship in future. The son obeyed his father's injunctions till he could no longer refrain. Going to his father, he told him that he felt it impossible to stay away from church. The father said, 'Will you persist in going to the Christian church? Then leave my house, now!' This he did, and went to his Christian friends next door, who sent him to another town to the care of some friends. The father heard that the boy was living among Christians, and after a little time, traced him out and laid a charge of robbery against him. The boy was arrested by the police on the charge of robbing his father and brother, and they both swore against him at the court, with the result that he was sent to prison for three months. While in prison he read a German New Testament, and then, for the first time, did he become a 'true' Christian. When his sentence expired his father offered him a large bribe to give up Christianity, but though he was homeless and friendless, he steadfastly refused to do so. On the evening of his liberation he was sitting very much cast down on the stone steps of a church. The pastor, seeing him, asked him a few questions, when the lad told his simple story. The pastor telegraphed to his friends, 'Is ——'s story true?' 'Yes; it is,' was the answer; 'we thought our young friend was lost; protect him at our expense.' It is needless to go into further details; but that boy is now a very successful missionary in Hamburg."

THE TWO RESURRECTIONS.

By Rev. G. W. Pendleton, A.M.

A Paper read before the Ministers' Conference of Eastern Connecticut on March 24th, 1884.

The Key-stone of Christianity—The Resurrection of all Men Assured — Difference in the Terms Employed — The Two Resurrections — The Millennial Interval—The Figurative and the Literal—The Bodies Quickened with the Souls — Not a Transmigration of Souls — An Implied Interval—The Millennium not a mere Revival—Reigning with Christ—The Signal of the Seventh Trumpet—Not a New Doctrine.

THE resurrection of the human body is linked with the resurrection of Christ, and is therefore the key-stone of Christianity. "If Christ be not risen, then is our faith vain, and we are yet in our sins." "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept." The resurrection of all men is assured by the resurrection of Christ. Hence Paul had "hope toward God, that there would be a resurrection of the just and of the unjust."

DISTINCTIVE TERMS.

The Greek term (anastasis) translated resurrection means literally a standing up again of what had before existed. Resurrection is not merely a rising up, but a rising again (Latin, re, again, and surgo, to rise), a re-rising, or a rising of what has been laid away. There are two phrases used in the Scriptures in reference to the resurrection—"the resurrection of the dead" and "the resurrection from the dead," or "from among the dead." The Greek of this last phrase is anastasis ek ton nekron, a rising out of the dead, or dead ones. Nekros with ek is used thirty-six times in the New Testament. In Matt. 17 : 9 and Mark 9 : 9–10 we have ek nekron anastee, "Be risen again from the dead," and is applied to the resurrection of Christ in about thirty instances, and is translated "from the dead."

Now it is an established fact that the resurrection of Christ was out from the dead ones. It was not a resurrection of the dead—it is never called so in the New Testament; but "from the dead." Lazarus was also raised (ek nekron) from the dead. All the dead did not rise with Christ and Lazarus. Both rose from among the dead. This form of the Greek is used in reference to the people of God. Luke 20 : 35, "They, who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection 'from the dead' (not of the dead), neither marry, nor are given in marriage; neither can they die any more; for they are equal unto the angels, and are the children of God, being

This is a resurrection out of the dead; to attain it they must be accounted worthy; they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. They are immortal. "Neither can they die any more." The wicked have no part in this resurrection.

Paul sought a part in this resurrection. He labored and suffered the loss of all things. "If by any means I may attain unto the (exanastasin ton nekron) out-rising from the dead." Some versions have out-rising out from the dead, but our version is rendered "of the dead." But why did Paul labor and suffer to secure a part in the resurrection from the dead, when he could without any effort have a part in the resurrection of the dead, or in the general resurrection? Paul knew that only the saints could attain unto the resurrection from the dead—that for which he was striving.

We now come to the subject of

taught in the 20th chapter of Revelation—the resurrection of "the just and of the unjust." In the resurrection of the just, none but "the blessed and holy would have a part." "Blessed and holy is he that hath part in the first resurrection." "They shall be priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a (the) thousand years." "But the rest of the dead lived not again, until the thousand years were finished." We have, then, two resurrections distinctly taught—the first in which only the blessed and holy have a part; and the second, of "the rest of the dead," which takes place a thousand years later.

We know that some take the ground that this chapter must be interpreted all literally or all figuratively. But nothing is more absurd than such a view. If we interpret it all literally, then we have Satan, a spirit, bound with a material chain, and converted into a literal dragon and serpent; the souls of men literally dying and living, and literally sitting on material thrones. If we interpret it all figuratively, then the first resurrection is a mere figure; the second resurrection, when "the rest of the dead" shall be raised, and "both great and small shall stand before God;" the realities of death, judgment and eternity, and even Satan himself, are all reduced to mere figures of speech. Absurd! The true principle of interpretation is to give to words their literal, primary meaning, unless there is a good reason for a different interpretation.

Following this mode of interpretation, we find in this chapter two classes of persons raised in the first resurrection—those who were "beheaded for the witness of Jesus and for the word of God," and those who would not "worship the beast, nor his image, neither received his mark upon their foreheads or in their hands." All who rejected the abominations of Rome, all true Christians in every age till Christ comes, and "the man of sin who is destroyed by the brightness of His coming." The rest of the dead—the wicked—are raised in the second resurrection a thousand years later.

Thus the dead of all ages are divided into

TWO COMPANIES

during the millennial period—one company living in their raised bodies and reigning with Christ the thousand years, and the rest of the dead, who lived not again until the thousand years were finished. Some lay great stress on the term souls—"I saw the souls of them," etc. The Greek is psukas and not pnumas, and psukee often includes the entire man. Paul says, "We were two hundred, threescore and sixteen souls (persons) in the ship." We affirm that the first resurrection here cannot be a moral or spiritual one, for there is no first moral or spiritual resurrection in distinction from a second. If there is a first spiritual resurrection, what is the second? If we should spiritualize these plain words of Scripture touching the resurrection, where shall we find Scripture to prove of the body? for it will be more consistent to interpret all Scripture on this subject in the same manner, and thus make the Word of God consistent with itself; and like the Swedenborgians and the Universalists spiritualize all Scriptures touching the resurrection of the human body.

Again: If only the souls of the saints are quickened in this first resurrection, what is done for them more than is done in their regeneration? They are already "blessed and holy." If they go forth in the spirit of the martyrs, such as Stephen, Paul, and Peter, there is no intimation that they have any greater spiritual power than the martyrs had. The theory that the souls of the martyrs will live in the souls of the saints through the Millennium, savors too much of the doctrine of the transmigration of souls to be readily believed.

Henry says of the two resurrections: "Those in the first resurrection who had suffered for Christ not receiving the mark of the beast, nor worshipping his image, are raised from the dead and restored to life." "This may be taken literally or figuratively." "This is called the first resurrection, which none but those who have served Christ and suffered for Him shall be favored with." "As for the wicked, they shall not be raised up till Satan be let loose." "The rest of the dead lived not till the thousand years were finished." But some object to this view of the resurrection, because the righteous and wicked are spoken of in the Bible as being raised at the same time. But in every Scripture on this subject the saints are mentioned first. Events are often grouped together without designating the time that will elapse between their occurrence. To give one example, see 1 Cor. 15:23: "But every man in his own order, Christ, the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at His coming." Here the resurrection of Christ and the resurrection of His people are mentioned without any notice of and yet we know that these events are more than eighteen hundred years apart. As the traveller looks at the outskirts of the distant horizon and sees only parts of the intervening landscape, so the eyes of the prophets, as they saw the grand outline of coming events, did not observe the distance between the exact time of their accomplishment. Hence we regard the 20th chapter of Revelation as the key to all the other Scriptures as to the time of the two resurrections. "The rest of the dead lived not till the thousand years were finished."

Now, where comes in the resurrection of the dead if the first and the second resurrections are symbolical or spiritual? for immediately after the second resurrection occurs the general judgment, when the raised dead, small and great, stand before God to be judged. Every man will come forth in his own rank, order, or company. Hence Christ says to His disciples, "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Dr. Cotton Mather says, "In the resurrection Christ was the first band; those who are His, a band by themselves; those who are not His must form the third band, the last band or division in the great army of the dead."

Between the two resurrections is or the thousand years. "They lived (those raised in the first resurrection) and reigned with Christ the thousand years." If the resurrections are spiritual and the Millennium is spiritual, then this reign of Christ with the saints for a thousand years must be a great revival of religion, differing in no respect from the spiritual condition of the Church for the past eighteen hundred years, except that this reign is confined to a part only of the true people of God, and (according to this theory) Christ will remain on His mediatorial throne as He has since He ascended on high. I think there is something more glorious than this in the words, "And they lived and reigned with Christ the thousand years."

In the beginning of the Millennium Satan is bound and cast into the bottomless pit; then all the righteous dead are raised. "They lived and reigned," and

CHRIST REIGNED WITH THEM

—reigned personally over His redeemed Church after their resurrection. I cannot regard it as a spiritual reign, for Christ has been reigning over His Church, spiritually, for near two thousand years instead of one. "I saw thrones, and they sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them." "The saints of all ages in harmony meet." "Then shall the moon be confounded, and the sun ashamed, when the Lord of hosts shall reign in Mount Zion, and in Jerusalem, and before His ancients gloriously." "His ancients"—Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, and the ancient prophets—"all reign with Him in Mount Zion and in Jerusalem."

The Millennial reign begins with the sound of the seventh trumpet, and not at the close; "and when the seventh angel shall begin to sound, there shall be time no longer; the mystery of God is finished," and the elders say, "Thy wrath is come." "The kingdoms of this world shall become the kingdom of our Lord and His Christ." Christ says to His disciples, "Ye who have followed me in the regeneration" (in the new order of things, "when I make all things new") "when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." All true believers share in this reign with Christ. And which they will sing: "And they sang a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof, for thou wast slain and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation, and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." Those who were raised in the first resurrection were to be made "priests of God and of Christ, and shall reign with Him a thousand years." But they did not sing we shall reign spiritually with Christ on His mediatorial throne as now, but "we shall reign with Him as kings and priests on the earth."

This view of the Millennium and of the resurrection is as some think. Kitto says, "The Millennial doctrine may be regarded as generally prevalent in the second century." Newton says, "The doctrine of the Millennium was generally believed in the first and purest ages." Meade says, "This was the opinion of the whole orthodox Christian Church in the age immediately following St. John." Daniel Whitby, who lived about a hundred and seventy-five years ago, the originator of the spiritual theory of Christ's reign of a thousand years, or the Millennium and the spiritual resurrection, admitted that the literal view of these doctrines was held in the Eastern Church by Papias, Justin, Irenæus, Nepos, Apollinarius, and Methodius; and in the West and South by Tertullian, Cyprian, Victorinus, Lactantius, and Severus, and by the first Nicene Council. "These men," he says, "were witnesses of the tradition, which they had received from Christ and His Apostles, and which was taught them by the elders, the disciples of Christ." Whitby furthermore says that "they held that the first resurrection was not confined to the martyrs only, but that all the just were then to rise and reign with Christ." Thus the literal view of the two resurrections and the Millennium is as old as Christianity.

Two hundred and twenty-four years ago,

THE BAPTIST CONFESSION OF FAITH

in England (1660) contained it; it was approved and signed by forty-one elders and deacons, and twenty thousand members; and these were the words of their declaration: "The kingdom is His (Christ's), and He is the Governor among the nations, and King over all the earth; and we shall reign with Him on the earth." Dr. Gill, born in 1687, a Baptist, said: "This kingdom of Christ will be bounded by two resurrections; by the first, the resurrection of the just, and by the second, the resurrection of the wicked." "This glorious, visible kingdom of Christ will be on earth and not in heaven, and thus distinct from the kingdom of heaven." I could refer to hundreds holding similar views in the past on this theory, but I must close.

It is evident that all mankind will be raised from the dead. "They that have done good shall come forth to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." "But every man in his own order or company." "The dead in Christ shall rise first." It is no more certain that the body is laid in the grave than that it will be raised from the grave. No matter if its atoms slumber in coral beds, or enter into a thousand material substances, the power of God will speak life into them in the morning of the resurrection, and change them into immortal forms. And no less certain is it that Christ will make His tabernacle with men and reign over them on the earth. "He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." "And in mercy shall the throne be established, and He shall sit upon it in truth in the tabernacle of David, judging and hasting righteousness." The saints "lived and reigned with Christ the thousand years."

CURRENT EVENTS.

Chicago is Crowded with the Delegates of the National Republican Convention as we go to press, and probably before these lines are read, the name of its candidate for the Presidency will have been telegraphed to every city in the Union. At the time of writing there are no certain indications of the man on whom the choice of the convention will fall. That he will be a man of sterling character, an honest, upright, God-fearing man, worthy of the high office for which his party makes him its candidate, we earnestly hope. Both the Republican and Democratic parties number many such in their ranks, as they also contain some who, in spite of their popularity, are, by reason of moral turpitude, notoriously unfit to be intrusted with executive power. The delegates have a momentous duty to perform in making their selection. We pray God, in whose hands are the destinies of this great nation, that they may receive divine guidance. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has no interest in the success of the candidate of either the Republican or Democratic party as such, but before either is nominated, and when the advice can be given without an invidious meaning being attached to it, it earnestly advises its readers, who will be asked to ratify the choice of the conventions by their votes, to act conscientiously in this important matter. If either party, influenced by unworthy motives, nominate a candidate whose past record shows him to be destitute of moral principle, it will be the duty of Christian men of that party to abjure party allegiance and vote against the candidate of their party. To make an unfit man President—to fill the highest office on earth unworthily—would be a national disgrace, and every man whose vote was cast for that candidate would share the responsibility. We sincerely hope that the candidate chosen by the Republican Convention, and he who will be chosen soon by the Democratic Convention, will both be men, either of whom Christians can conscientiously support. If, unhappily, Christian principle should, in the hearts of Christian men, be placed in conflict with party allegiance, Christian principle must rule, however painful it may be to separate from party affiliations.

The New Scheme for the Suppression of polygamy in Utah was before the Senate last week. Senator Hoar, in presenting the Judiciary Committee's favorable report, said: "The American people did not propose to have grow up in the heart of the country a nation founded upon the denial of the purity of the family. In the framing of the bill, severe and stringent as some of its provisions seemed to be, it had not been the purpose of the committee to infringe in the least upon the fundamental American doctrine of liberty of conscience. The American State rested on the doctrine that the family, based on the union of one man with one woman, was the unit. To protect the purity of the family was the chief object of legislation. Without such purity no State could long exist." Mr. Hoar spoke earnestly of the methods of Mormonism to extend itself, and declared that it was quite time Congress directed its attention to the subject. He contended that Congress has a right to interfere with such an institution as the Mormon Church. Senator Brown, of Georgia, opposed the bill, dwelling on the immorality which prevailed in other parts of the country, using the statistics of New England as the basis of his indictment. He contended that the immorality of New England was a greater evil than the polygamy of Utah. Congress, however, takes the open and shameless defiance of the law into account, as well as the systematized effort to propagate the pernicious doctrines, in the case of Utah, not the question of the sin involved, which, of course, is the same in one case as in the other.

Several of the Prominent Figures in the recent financial disturbance will probably appear in the criminal dock. The arrest of James D. Fish, President of the Marine Bank, and John C. Eno, ex-President of the Second National Bank, was effected last week. Eno had made good his escape to Quebec, and was on board a steamer bound for England. An effort is being made to prevent his extradition, and eminent Canadian lawyers are engaged to argue the question. The warrant charges him with forgery. That offence, if it can be proved to the satisfaction of the Canadian authorities, will be valid ground for granting extradition. Hinckley, the defaulting paying-teller of the West Side Bank, is believed to be in Mexico. Some of his disastrous stock speculations have been traced. The West Side Bank was able to resume business on Saturday. Another startling defalcation was discovered last week. This time it is in a Government department. Colonel J. O. P. Burnside, disbursing clerk of the Post Office Department, was arrested on Thursday, charged with embezzlement amounting, it is believed, to $45,000. He too speculated in stocks, and is charged with using public funds to cover his losses. It is evident that the mania for speculation has affected a large number of persons occupying places of trust, whose principles were not strong enough to resist temptation.

The Death of the Presiding Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church in this country, Bishop Smith, of Kentucky, took place at his residence in New York on Saturday morning last. The Right Rev. Benjamin B. Smith was within a few days of his ninetieth birthday, having been born in Bristol, R. I., on June 13th, 1794. He retained in vigorous use all his faculties up to a short time before his death, an immunity from ordinary ills, which he attributed to the fact that he never used spirits or tobacco. His health has throughout his long life been singularly good, and he often remarked that he had never had occasion to swallow an ounce of medicine. He was ordained deacon in 1817, and priest in St. Michael's, Marblehead, Mass., on June 24th, 1818. After being rector of Marblehead for two years he became rector of St. George's Church, Accomack, Va. Two years later he was rector of Zion's Church, Charlestown, Va. In 1823 he removed to Vermont, and became rector of St. Stephen's Church, Middlebury. He remained in Vermont until 1828, when he became rector of Grace Church Mission in Philadelphia. In 1832 he was rector of Christ Church, Lexington, Ky. On October 30th, 1832, he was consecrated first Bishop of the Diocese of Kentucky, from which position he retired about four years ago and came to spend his remaining days with his married daughter in New York.

Decoration Day was Observed on Friday with marked enthusiasm. It was expected, when the day was appointed, that as years rolled by the day would lose its connection with the idea that gave it significance, but last Friday's enthusiasm showed no signs of decadence in any of the Northern cities. The statues and graves were decorated, and the old battle-stained flags were affectionately borne on parade. It was a gratifying characteristic of the orations delivered that, in spite of the efforts of professional politicians to keep the bloody shirt prominent, the references made to the South were uniformly kind and respectful.

Decided Action on the Temperance Question has been taken by another of the great religious conventions. The General Synod of Reformed Presbyterians in session at Pittsburg, Pa., on May 26th, took into consideration the report of the Committee on Discipline, which gave rise to an animated discussion. The report condemned the pernicious liquor traffic licensed by the Government, and provided for the excommunication of such church members as deal in spirituous liquors and rent property to tavern-keepers. The last clause encountered strong opposition, but after a heated debate the report was unanimously adopted.

The Garfield Memorial Hospital in Washington, D. C., was appropriately dedicated on Decoration Day. Rev. Mr. Butler, of the Lutheran Memorial Church, officiated, and Justice Miller, of the Supreme Court, President of the Board of Directors of the hospital, delivered an address. A garden party and music and other entertainments followed the dedication services. The hospital will be opened for patients in about two weeks. A resident physician and five nurses will comprise the hospital staff, and there will be accommodation for forty patients.

The Sale of Liquor in Drug Stores has been condemned by an authority which is generally respected by the trade. The Alumni of the Philadelphia College of Pharmacy, after considering the practice, decided that it is harmful. They passed a resolution declaring that "the sale of intoxicating liquors as a beverage in drug stores is a growing evil, tending to degrade the profession of pharmacy and damage the morals of the community."

The Non-observance of the Sabbath in Chicago is arousing the serious attention of its Christian citizens. The Chicago correspondent of the New York Tribune, in the course of his weekly letter, sketches the progress of the movement which has turned the Sunday into a Paris Sunday there. He says: "There has been very rapid progress toward eliminating the day as a holy and church-going one from the calendar within the past five years, and replacing it with a theatre, baseball, and racing one. The theatre innovation was gradual and confined to the variety houses for a time, but has gradually included nearly every house in the city. The Sunday performance has grown to be the most profitable financially of the week, and latterly one half of the theatres have extended their observance of the Sabbath by giving matinée performances. The baseball innovation came with the present season, and now the Chicago Driving Park has formally decided to inaugurate Sunday racing. The argument put forward by the directors is a citation of the innovations already made and countenanced. The last move, however, has awakened the old fires of antagonism. A formal appeal has been made to the mayor to prevent the proposed racing, but that official has given no sign that he will interfere in any way in the matter."

The New York Medical Mission, which Held its third annual meeting recently, is doing a valuable work in the city. Dr. Dowknott, the medical superintendent, stated in his report that during the past year 2791 cases of disease and injury had been treated there; the total attendances numbered 7613, and the number of prescriptions dispensed free of charge was nearly 10,000. Besides all this, those who go to the dispensary have the Gospel preached to them, and while they are waiting for the physician have opportunity for religious conversation. During the past year the mission has often been in severe financial straits, but on every occasion God has sent the needed funds.

A Home for Incurables is to be Erected by the Jews of New York as a memorial of the one hundredth birthday of the eminent Jewish philanthropist, Sir Moses Montefiore, which will occur on November 5th, this year. It is intended to spend $100,000 upon it. A letter from the venerable philanthropist approving the project has been received, in which he says: "I thank the Lord that He has spared me to this advanced age and has inspired and enabled me to be a co-worker in every good cause for suffering humanity. May Almighty God bless every one who remembers the oppressed, and seeks to deliver them from the oppressor, and all who send help to the poor and needy. You say you want to erect a building—a home which shall be my memorial. May the future generation have only such examples before them as shall inspire them to do good to all men in the name of Jehovah."

The Appearance of a False Messiah is Reported by Southern journals. They say that the colored people of Madison, Jackson, and the neighboring counties of Georgia are excited by the preaching of a man of their own race, who claims that he is the Messiah, and declares that he will soon appear on a white horse as the hope of Israel, and lead his followers into "the promised land." His deluded followers have eagerly assented to this claim, and speak of him as the veritable Christ. A gentleman who has been visiting one of the haunts of the impostor, declares that his dupes worship him, and that he has forgiven the sins of a large number, being quite lavish in his clemency. He exhibits scars, which he pretends are the marks of the wounds in his hands and feet and the spear wound in his side. He has evidently used an instrument upon himself so as to secure the marks of nails. The man is probably a demented fanatic, and is not likely to do much harm outside of his immediate locality. His appearance, however, just at this time when the Mahdi is making similar claims among the Arabs, is significant. Such appearances, Christ said, would be one of the signs by which the watchful might know that the time of His coming was approaching (Matt. 24 : 24).

A Fifty-Mile Walk for a Husband was taken recently in Virginia. Two young people living in Patterson left home for Luray to be married. They started on May 23d, taking a train on the Shenandoah Valley Railroad. Soon afterward the young man became restless, and told another passenger that he was not as anxious to get married as he thought he was when he started. When Marksville was reached, he gave his sweetheart the slip, and boarding another train returned to Patterson. Before reaching Luray the girl discovered her desertion, and determined to follow her recreant lover. She had no money, he having her purse, but she refused all assistance from the sympathizing passengers, and bravely started for Patterson, fifty miles away, on foot, following the railroad track. She reached Patterson thirty-six hours later, and without stopping to make any preparation she marched to her lover's place of business, and found him at work. He was dumbfounded at seeing her, and when he heard of her exploits he surrendered unconditionally. He took his hat, and they went at once to a clergyman and were married. It may be hoped the lady will find her husband worth the trouble she took to secure him. Unbiassed strangers, who know only the facts reported, will be inclined to doubt whether a union into which one party was so unwilling to enter promises much happiness. The marriage relation is frequently used in the Bible to describe the union between God and His people; but in that union it is the bride alone who is guilty of desertion (Hosea 2 : 19, 20).

A Dangerous Ledge has been Discovered near Boston Harbor. The Post of that city announced last week that, acting on hints thrown out by sailors at the time of the City of Columbus disaster, it instituted soundings along the south shore of Boston Bay, and found a mass of rock, with a rugged surface, in the main ship channel off Minot's Ledge Light, lying only four and a half fathoms below the surface, where all Government charts give twelve and three quarters. In good weather this would prove no obstruction, but in rough weather deep draft vessels are in danger of striking it. The Post says it is a marvel that no shipping has been wrecked there. It seems strange that the Government charts should be misleading in so important a matter. The moral and spiritual wrecks of life, which most frequently occur when youth is leaving the harbor of home for the voyage of the world, might all be avoided by carefully following the chart God has provided in the Bible. Every such wreck is due to neglect of some explicit warning contained in its pages (Prov. 6 : 20–23).

A Mother's Dream Resulted in Saving the life of her child at Norwich, Conn., on May 1st. The mother says that her child had had a tooth extracted that day, and appeared to be well over it. But at night the mother dreamed that she was holding her daughter in her lap and that the child was dying. She awoke, went to the child's bed, and found her daughter in a critical condition. Excessive hemorrhage had set in, and the child lay insensible and pallid as a corpse, and her garments and coverings were soaked with blood. The doctor was summoned, and when he arrived he found it necessary to inject milk into her veins to stimulate the circulation. The doctor is of the opinion that if the child's condition had been discovered but a little later she would have been beyond help. The warning was conveyed in a way that, as yet, science cannot explain; but the important fact was that however it came, it was heeded. It is in neglecting warnings that men err both as to their own condition and that of others. How many spiritual disasters might be averted were people more prompt to heed the warnings God sends to them in the shape of sickness, financial loss, and in other forms! (Prov. 29 : 1.)

The Edge of a Niagara Precipice is a Perilous place to sleep, yet a man did sleep there last week, and lost his life in consequence. Two men who were travelling by rail to New York were on May 27th, owing to the unpunctuality of the train, unable to make the West Shore connection, and finding that no train would leave until the following morning, they started on foot to see the falls. They became tired, and when about two hundred yards from the Cantilever Bridge they climbed the iron fence and lay down to rest. They both fell asleep, and when one of them awoke his companion was no longer there. Looking over the precipice he saw, to his horror, a mangled body on the rocks below. He gave an alarm, and the police drew the corpse up with ropes, and it was at once recognized by the traveller as that of his companion, who a short time before had fallen asleep by his side. It was a horrible sight, which the survivor will never forget. It is safe to predict that he will never again go to sleep on the edge of a precipice. Of the multitudes who die every day, how many die while spiritually asleep! We know not by actual sight where they fall, but God's Word reveals sufficient of the misery of the lost to appall us by its horror. Yet their impenitent companions sleep on, and they too are dying around us every day (Eph. 5 : 14).

THE SPRINKLING OF THE BLOOD OF THE SACRIFICE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the Lord, before the veil of the sanctuary, etc.—LEVITICUS 4 : 6, 7.

The Central Mystery—A Variety of Sacrifices—Each a Type—Every Man's Christ—I. Christ's Sacrifice in Relation to the Father—The Blood of Atonement the Prominent Thing—The Sevenfold Perfection—The Way of Access to God—A Type of Guilt—Of Difficulty—A Woman Enlightened—II. The Influence of the Blood upon Prayer—Its Use by the Intercessor—The Believer's Plea—How to Spend the Last Half Hour—III. Its Influence on Service—Out-and-Out Converts—Load the Altar.

I HAVE aforetime preached to you upon the types of our Lord's sacrifice; the subject is as large as it is important. We began with the laying of the hands upon the offering, and we went on to the all-important matter of the slaying of the victim.* Now we come to the use which was made of the blood of the sacrifice after it had been slain. In thinking upon this subject, I seem to hear a voice saying to me, "Put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." This is of our religion, it becomes us to be reverent in heart as we approach it. The doctrine of substitution is the heart of the whole matter, our whole heart needs to be aroused while we speak upon it. The Son of God Himself, assuming human nature, and in that nature bleeding and dying in our place and stead, is the revelation of revelation, the wonder of wonders, the glory of the glorious God. Solemnity and awe may well fill us while we meditate on such a theme.

The sacrifices under the law were varied according to the uppermost thoughts in the offerers' minds and their peculiar conditions before God. A burnt-offering, a peace-offering, or a sin-offering might be brought, according as men wished to give unto the Lord, to have fellowship with Him, or to confess their sin to Him. There was a sacrifice specially arranged for the anointed priest, another for all the congregation, another for a ruler, and yet another for one of the common people; in truth, the typical sacrifices all pointed to the one great sacrifice, but they indicated various marks and characteristics of the undivided Lamb of God. The victims varied from a bullock or a lamb down to a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons.

We take different views of the sacrifice of Christ according to our capacity to see it; and yet all these views may be quite in accordance with truth, for the atonement is many-sided, and operates in many directions. The Levitical types represent the different views which believing minds take of our Lord Jesus Christ; they set forth but one Christ, but that one Christ from various standpoints. The mercy is that the sacrifice of our Lord Jesus is suitable to you, and equally suitable to me, and to all that come to Him by faith. The rich, the poor, the brave, the timid, the amiable, and the immoral, all find in Jesus that which fits the individual case. You may be a person of great mind and profound thought, but you shall find in Jesus all that your high intelligence can desire. I may be a person of slender education and of narrow powers of thought, but I shall find the Lord Jesus humbling Himself to my limited capacity. The manna is said by the rabbis to have pleased every man's taste, and even so the Christ of God is so that no man who comes to Him shall be disappointed, but each shall find his need supplied. Each man shall find his case perfectly met by the Saviour's atonement, as much so as if Jesus were prepared for that man only, as if that man were the only sinner under heaven, or Jesus a Redeemer sent to him alone of all the family of man. Oh, the depth of the wisdom and of the grace of God in the person and work of our Lord Jesus Christ!

Note particularly, with great interest, that there were sacrifices provided for sins of ignorance under the law; therefore we safely conclude that a sin of ignorance is a sin. There is not that intensity of evil in a sin of ignorance which is to be seen in wilful, deliberate transgression; but still there is sin in it; for no law can allow ignorance to be an excuse for trespass, since it is the duty of the subject to know the law. Even if I do that which is wrong with a sincere wish to do right, still my wrong act has a measure of sin in it. No amount of sincerity can turn injustice into righteousness, or transform falsehood into truth.

You can illustrate this by the stern facts of nature. Certain inventors have thought that they could fly, and they have in perfectly honest faith leaped from a lofty crag; but their honest belief has not saved them from the result of violating the law of gravitation; they have fallen to the ground, and have been dashed in pieces just as surely and terribly as if they had felt no real belief in their powers of flight. If a man partakes of a deadly poison believing it to be a health-giving medicine, his sincerity will not hinder the natural course of nature; he will die in his error. It is precisely so in the moral and spiritual world. Sins committed in ignorance must be still sins in the sight of the Lord, or else no expiation would have been provided for them. Without shedding of blood there is no remission even for

SINS OF IGNORANCE.

I am greatly rejoiced to think there should be such a sacrifice provided, since it may yet turn out that the larger number of our sins are sins of which we have not been aware, because the hardness of our heart has prevented our discovering our error. You may have sinned and have no conscience of that sin at this present, ay, and you never may have a conscience of that particular offence, in this world, yet will it be sin all the same. Many good men have lived in an evil habit, and remained in it unto death, and yet have not known it to be evil. Now, if the precious blood of Jesus only put away the sin which we perceived in detail, its efficacy would be limited by the enlightenment of our conscience, and therefore some grievous sin might be overlooked and prove our ruin; but inasmuch as this blood puts away all sins, it removes those which we do not discover as well as those over which we mourn.

After the blood had been spilt by the killing of the sacrifice, and thus atonement had been made, three several acts were to be performed by the priest: first, "the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the Lord, before the veil of the sanctuary;" this represents the atoning sacrifice in its reference to God. Next, "The priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the Lord;" this sets forth the influence of the blood upon the offering of intercessory prayer. Thirdly, we read, "he shall pour all (the rest) of the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering;" this displays the influence of the blood of Christ on all our service for the Lord. Oh, for the Spirit's power to us to show the things of Christ!

I. We begin with the sacrifice of Christ in its relation to the Lord God of Israel. In the type before us the prominent thing before God is

THE BLOOD OF ATONEMENT.

No mention is made of a meat-offering, or a drink-offering, or even of sweet spices upon the golden altar; the one conspicuous object is blood. This was sprinkled before the Lord before the veil of the Most Holy place. I am well aware that some persons cry out, "The preacher continually talks about blood, and this morning from the first hymn to the last he has brought before us constant allusions to blood. We are horrified by it!" I wish you to be horrified; for, indeed, sin is a thing to shudder at, and the death of Jesus is not a matter to be treated lightly. It was God's intent to awaken in man a great disgust of sin, by making him see that it could only be put away by suffering and death. Oh, that any words of mine could cause triflers with sin to be shocked at the abominable thing! I would have them filled with horror of that detestable thing which cannot be put away except by that which is infinitely more calculated to shock the instructed mind than rivers of the blood of bulls and of goats—I mean the sacrifice of God's own Son, whose soul was made an offering for sin.

The blood of the sacrifice was sprinkled before the veil seven times, signifying this—first, that the atonement made by the blood of Jesus is perfect in its reference to God. All through the Scriptures, as you well know, seven is the number of perfection, and in this place it is doubtless used with that intent. The seven times is the same as once for all; it conveys the same meaning as when we read, "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins," and again, "We are sanctified through the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once." It is a complete act. In this text we understand that the Lord Jesus offered unto the justice of God an absolutely complete and satisfactory atonement by His vicarious suffering and death for guilty men. There is no need of further offering for sin. "It is finished." He hath by Himself purged our sins.

Albeit that modern thought will contradict me, I shall not cease to assert perpetually that the greatest result of the death of the Lord Jesus was Godward. Not only does He reconcile us unto God by His death, and turn our enmity into love, but He has borne the chastisement of our peace, and thus magnified the law and made it honorable. God, the Judge of all, is enabled without the violation of His justice to pass by transgression, iniquity, and sin. This is the idea which pacifies conscience and wins the heart; we believe in Jesus as the propitiation for sin. The lights which stream from the cross are very varied; but as all the colored rays are found in the white light of day, so all the varied teachings of Calvary meet in the fact that Jesus suffered for sin, the just for the unjust.

Note next, that not only is the atonement itself perfect, but that the presentation of that atonement is perfect too. The sevenfold sprinkling was typical of Christ as a Priest presenting unto the Father Himself as a sacrifice for sin. This has been fully done. Jesus has in due order carried the propitiation into the sanctuary, and appeared in the presence of God on our behalf. Here are the Apostle's own words, "by His own blood He entered in once into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption for us." It is not our presenting of the blood, but Christ's presenting of the blood, which has made the atonement; even as it is not our sight of the blood, but Jehovah's sight of it which causes us to escape; as it was written concerning the Passover, "When I see the blood, I will pass over you."

We now pass on to a few thoughts about ourselves in relation to this type. This sevenfold sprinkling of the blood upon the veil meant that to God is only by virtue of the precious blood of Christ. Do you ever feel a veil hanging between you and God? In very truth, there is none; for Jesus has taken it away through His flesh. In the day when His blessed body was offered up, the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom, showing that there is nothing now to divide the believer from his God; but still, if you think there is such a separating veil, if you feel as if the Lord had hidden Himself, if you are so despondent that you are afraid you never can draw near to the mercy-seat, then sprinkle the blood toward the throne of grace, cast it on the very veil which appears to conceal your God from you. If there should be a mist and a cloud between me and the brazen serpent, yet if I look that way I shall be healed. If I cannot clearly discern all the glories of my Lord and Saviour, yet if I look with the glance of trust He saveth me. Turn, then, your half-opened eyes, which only at one corner admit light; turn them, I say, Godward and Christward, and know that by reason of the atoning blood you are saved.

I further think that the blood was sprinkled on the veil seven times to show that a deliberate contemplation of the death of Christ is greatly for our benefit. Whatever else you treat slightly, let the sacrifice of Calvary be seriously considered again and again; even unto seven times let it be meditated on! Read the story of our Lord's death in the four Evangelists and ponder every detail till you are familiar with His griefs. I would have you know the story by heart, for nothing will do your heart so much good.

Remember, too, that this sets out how great our guilt has been, since the blood must be sprinkled seven times ere the work of atonement is fully seen by you. Our guilt has a sevenfold blackness about it, and there must be a sevenfold cleansing. If you plead the blood of Jesus once and you do not obtain peace thereby, plead it again; and if still the burden lies upon your heart, still go on pleading with the Lord the one prevailing argument that Jesus bled. Christ is a great Saviour for great sinners, and His precious blood can of iniquity. See it sprinkled seven times for a seven times polluted sinner, and rest your soul on Him though seven devils should have entered into you. God, who bids us forgive unto seventy times seven, sets no bound to His own forgiveness.

Do reflect that if your case seems to yourself to be very difficult, it is provided for by this sevenfold sprinkling of the blood. If you say, "My heart is so hard! I cannot make it feel;" or if you say, "I am so frivolous and foolish I seem to forget what once I knew;" then continue still to look to the blood of Jesus, and draw hope from it even to seven times. Do not go away from that, I charge you—where else can you go? The devil's desire will be to keep you from thinking upon Christ; but do remember that thoughts about anything else will do you very little good. Your hope lies in thinking upon Jesus, not upon yourself.

That dear man of God, Mr. Moody Stuart, somewhere tells us that he once talked with a woman who was in great trouble about her sins. She was a well-instructed person, and knew the Bible thoroughly, so that he was in a little difficulty what to say to her, as she was so accustomed to all-saving truth. At last he urged upon her very strongly that passage, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners," and he noticed that she seemed to find a quiet relief in a gentle flow of tears. He prayed with her, and when she rose from her knees she seemed much comforted. Meeting her the next day, and seeing her smiling face, and finding her full of rest in the Lord, he asked, "What was it wrought your deliverance?" "Oh," she said, "it was that text, 'Jesus Christ came to save sinners.'" "Did you not know that before?" said Mr. Stuart. Yes, she knew the words before, but she found that in her heart of hearts she had believed that Jesus came to save saints, and not sinners. Do not many awakened persons abide in the same error?

II. Our second head is this—the blood in

ITS INFLUENCE UPON PRAYER.

"The priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the Lord." The priest in this case goes from the inside of the holy place toward the outer court; having dealt with the veil of the Holy of Holies, he turns round and finds close at his side the altar of incense made of gold, and surmounted with a golden crown; to this he goes deliberately, and places a portion of the blood upon each of its horns. Horns signify power, and the explanation of the symbol is that there is no power in intercessory prayer apart from the blood of expiation.

Remember, first, that the intercession of Christ Himself is based upon His atonement. He is daily pleading before the throne of God, and His great argument is that He offered Himself without spot unto God. It seems to me most clear and blessed that our Lord Jesus makes this the main plea with the Father on our behalf—"I have finished the work which Thou gavest me to do." He has suffered in our stead, and every day He pleads these sufferings for us; His blood speaketh better things than that of Abel. He seeks but always urges this old one—His blood shed for many for the remission of sins."

And now take the type to yourselves. You and I are to offer incense upon this golden altar by our daily intercession for others, but our plea must always be the atoning blood of Jesus. I pray you, dear friends, to urge this much more than you have been accustomed to do in your prayers. We are to cry to God for sinners, and we are to cry to God for saints, but the sacrifice of Jesus must be our strength in petitioning.

And, dearly beloved, as this must be the plea of our intercession, so it must be our impulse in making intercession. When we pray we come, as it were, to this golden altar, and we look thereon; what is that we see? Stains of blood! We look again, and again see crimson spots, while all the four horns are red with blood. Did my Lord pour out His soul unto death for men, and shall not I pour out my soul in living earnest when I pray? May the Lord arouse us! May He never permit us to neglect the precious use of the mercy-seat!

When the late Dr. Bacchus was ill, and near to die, a surgeon visited him, and as he went out of the door, he was observed to speak to the servant. The good old divine begged the attendant to tell him what the surgeon said. After some pause he said, "Dear sir, he told me not to leave you, for you could not live more than another half hour." "Then," said the saint, "help me out of bed, let me get upon my knees and spend my last half hour on earth in praying for the Church of God, and for the salvation of men." What a blessed way of spending one's last half hour; let me rather say—of spending half an hour at any time!

I think, too, I must say that this smearing of the horns of the altar with blood is meant to give us very great encouragement and assurance whenever we come to God in prayer. Never give anybody up, however bad he may be. If you know a man that is as much like the devil as two peas are like each other, still have hope for him, because when you come to the golden altar to offer your prayers on his behalf what do you see? Why, there is the blood of Christ. What sin is there which it cannot remove? "Oh," you say, "did Jesus die for sinners like this man, and shall I despair of him, and therefore refuse to pray for him?" This is logical argument. We are slow to labor for men because we are slow of heart in expecting their salvation, and this arises out of our narrow views of our Lord Jesus. I pray you enlarge your ideas of God's mercy and of Christ's power to cleanse.

III. Time flies too quickly this morning, and therefore I must pass over many things I had thought to dwell upon. The last point is, the blood in its INFLUENCE UPON ALL OUR SERVICE.

You see we have been coming outward from the veil to the golden altar, and now we pass outside the holy place into the outer court, and there in the open air stands the great brazen altar—the first object that the Israelite saw when he entered the sacred precincts. As soon as ever he entered into the first inclosure his eye lighted upon the great altar of brass upon which burnt-offerings were burned and oblations were presented unto the Lord. It was at the foot of this brazen altar that the bowls of blood were poured out continually, so that the altar was encrimsoned with it, and the soil around was soaked with the sanguine flood.

That altar represents a great many things, and among the rest our Lord Jesus presenting Himself to God as an acceptable sacrifice. Whenever you think of our Lord as being an offering of a sweet smell unto God, never dissociate that fact in your mind from His being slain for sin, for all our Lord's service is tinged by His atoning death. Always think of Jesus in all your meditations upon Him as presenting Himself to God and pouring out His soul unto death by way of atonement. When I see that great brazen altar I do not forget how our Lord was accepted of God, but when I see the floods of blood at the foot of the altar I am reminded of the fact that "He His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree."

Viewing the type in reference to ourselves, let us learn that whenever we come to offer any sacrifice unto the Lord we must take care that we present it by virtue of the precious blood of Christ. The worship of this morning—God knows our hearts, He knows how many have really adored Him, and He knows out of those who do worship how many of us have presented our sacrifice, thinking only of the merit of Jesus as the reason why it should be received. We also bring to God as He prospers us; I trust we are all ready to give Him a portion of our substance; but do we present it upon the altar which sanctifieth the giver and the gift? Do we see the blood of Christ upon it, and present our gold and silver through that which is more precious far? If not, we might as well retain our money in our purse. When you go this afternoon to your Sunday-school classes, or go out into the streets to preach, or go round with your tracts, will you present your holy labor to God through the precious blood? There is but one altar on which He will accept your services, that altar is the person of His dear Son, and in this matter Jesus must be viewed as pouring out His blood for us. We must view the atonement as connected with every holy thing.

I believe that our testimonies for God will be blessed of God in proportion as we keep the sacrifice of Christ to the forefront. Somebody asked our brother, Mr. Moody, how it was that he was so successful, and he is said to have replied, "Well, if I must tell you, it is, I believe, because we come out fair and square upon the doctrine of substitution." In that remark he hit the nail on the head. That is the saving doctrine; keep that before your own mind, keep it before the minds of those whom you would benefit. Let the Lord see that you are always thinking of His dear Son.

And, beloved, do you not think that this pouring of the blood at the foot of this brazen altar indicates how much we ought to bring there? If Jesus has brought His life there, and laid Himself thereon, ought we not to bring all that we are and all that we have, and consecrate all to God? Let us not offer a lean, scraggy sacrifice, or one that is half dead, or broken, or diseased; but let us bring our best at its best, and cheerfully present it unto the Most High through the precious blood. One said of a young man who had lately joined the church, "Is he O and O?" and another answered, "What do you mean by that?" "Why," said the first, "I mean, Is he out and out for Christ? Does he give himself spirit, soul, and body to Jesus?" Surely, when we see the altar with Christ Himself upon it, and His blood poured out there, we must acknowledge that if we could spend our whole life in zealous labor, and then die a martyr's death, we should not have rendered even half what such amazing love deserves. Let us be stimulated and quickened by the sight of the blood upon the brazen altar!

Lastly, you notice the blood was poured out at the bottom of the altar. What could that mean but this—that the altar of thank-offering stood upon and grew out of a basis of blood. So all our deeds for God, our sacrifices for His cause, must spring out of the love which He has manifested in the death of His dear Son. We love Him because—you know the "because"—because He first loved us. And how do we know that He loves us? Behold the death of Jesus as the surest proof. I long to put my whole being upon that altar, and I should feel as I did so that I was not giving my God anything, but only rendering to Him what His dear Son has bought a million times over by once shedding His life-blood. When we have done all, we shall be unprofitable servants, and we shall say so. All that we have given to God has been presented out of gratitude for the fact that God so loved us that He gave His only begotten Son to die for us that we might live through Him.

LOAD THE ALTAR!

Heap it high! Let hecatombs smoke thereon, for it is built upon God's unspeakable gift. When sin is removed, service is accepted; "then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar." Attempt no offering of your own works till then, for unpardoned sinners bring unaccepted offerings. First, let the blood be recognized, and let the full atonement be rejoiced in. Service rendered to God with a desire for personal merit is abominable in His sight; but when our merit is all found in the divine person of His Son, then will He accept us and our offering too in Christ Jesus. God grant unto you, dear hearers, to be accepted in the Beloved. Amen.

THE REV. DR. MACLAREN,

Ex-President of the English Baptist Union.

ALEXANDER MACLAREN, whose portrait appears on the next page, was born in Glasgow in 1826, and is now fifty-eight years of age. His father was a merchant of the city. He received his early education at the High School of Glasgow, passing thence in 1842 to Stepney, now Regent's Park College, London, and took his B.A. degree at the London University.

At the age of fourteen he was converted to Christ, and publicly baptized. Two years later he had entered as a theological student at Stepney College, London, with a view to entering the ministry of the Gospel. His work there was characterized by thoroughness, and after the usual four years' course of study under the presidency of Dr. Angus, he began, in 1846, his ministerial career at Portland Chapel, Southampton. Here he labored for about ten years, attracting to the chapel a thoughtful class of hearers, the majority of whom were young men, and many of them are now filling spheres of Christian usefulness in various parts of the world.

In the year 1858 Dr. Maclaren removed to Manchester, to become the minister of Union Chapel, Oxford Road, and here he is still engaged in declaring the Gospel, notwithstanding repeated efforts which have been made by Baptist churches in Cambridge and Glasgow to secure his services. In Manchester he has gathered round him an earnest band of workers, who energetically co-operate with him in the various efforts he puts forth for the good of the great city in which it is his lot to labor.

The capacious church is continually crowded, and by eminent and impartial judges in different sections of Christ's universal Church, Dr. Maclaren is said to be one of the foremost modern preachers, and second to no pulpit orator in England. The Sunday-schools in connection with Union Chapel, where upward of a thousand children meet week by week, and the well-regulated efforts among the poor and degraded of the city, are monuments of his personal solicitude, influence, and organizing power.

In 1865 Dr. Maclaren visited Italy, and on his return delivered a course of lectures in Manchester, under the title of "A Spring Holiday in Italy," picturesque passages of which have found their way into some of the school collections of readings. Although travelling over well-trodden ground, and without pretending to say anything new or startling about scenes which so many have described, it is clear that this holiday deeply moved him, and there are passages of exquisite word-painting in the volume referred to, which, for truth and delicacy of feeling, cannot be surpassed.

In 1875 Dr. Maclaren received the highest mark of distinction which it is in the power of his denomination to bestow, for in that year he was elected President of the Baptist Union, and signalized his tenure of office by an appeal on behalf of ill-paid ministers of the Gospel, which led to resolutions being passed on the spot to have the reproach rolled away.

In 1879 the University of Edinburgh did itself honor by conferring on Alexander Maclaren the degree of Doctor of Divinity.

MR. J. W. KIRTON,

Temperance Orator and Author.

The famous little sketch entitled "Buy your own Cherries" first raised Mr. Kirton's name from a local to a universal reputation. Its pointed, telling, incisive style and its forcible presentation of the strong points of the temperance argument commanded respect for the author and insured a large circulation for his work. More than a million people have read it, and not a few have been induced by its appeal to become total abstainers.

Mr. Kirton, however, has done good service beside the writing of "Buy your own Cherries." His life for many years has been devoted to preaching the Gospel and to speaking and writing on behalf of the temperance cause. He speaks of the evils of the rum-curse with experimental knowledge of its effects on the home and family. When a boy he suffered privation and sorrow through the vice which held his father in its remorseless grasp. A well-educated man of good abilities, he resided in one of the London slums and boozed away his time while his wife worked to support the home and family. With such a sight before him it is not surprising that the boy grew up hating intoxicating liquor. The future temperance author was born January 3d, 1831. At the age of fifteen he was engaged as errand-boy to a bookseller. It was his start in life, and he made good use of it. His employer found the boy honest, industrious, and trustworthy, and he appreciated him. Ten years the connection was maintained, and at the end of that time the errand boy, having risen to the position of foreman, left in order to devote his time unreservedly to Christian and temperance work.

Mr. Kirton was not in doing so entering upon an occupation new to him. He had been for some time engaged in it as business allowed him opportunity. Early in his career he joined the Young Men's Christian Association and threw himself with ardor into the activities connected with it. He was also a member of a temperance society, and entered with zest into that work. He busied himself among his youthful friends and all the young men with whom he came in contact, trying to induce them to become total abstainers and members of the Young Men's Christian Association. It was mainly through his efforts at this time that his cousin, Henry Varley, now the eminent evangelist, was led to become a Christian. He took a special interest in reclaimed drunkards, would visit them in their homes and encourage them to persevere in their efforts to overcome their besetting sin.

So much energy and aptitude for work brought several honorary offices into the young man's hands, and one of them led to important results. Sunday services for non-church-goers were organized in the North of London, and Mr. Kirton was secretary of the committee which managed them. On one occasion the preacher engaged was not present at the appointed time, so Mr. Kirton commenced the service, expecting to see the preacher enter at any minute. But he did not come, and Mr. Kirton being there went on with the service, delivering an impromptu address. At its close he was requested to speak every Sunday, which he did for three years. So successful, so largely blessed of God were those services that Mr. Kirton was urged to enter the ministry as pastor of the Baptist Church at Burslem. He consented, and in that populous town commenced a work which has been a public blessing.

His labors in the cause of temperance have continued without abatement. He allied himself with the United Kingdom Alliance, the organization which in Great Britain has charge of the prohibition movement, and for a long time was the agent of the Alliance for the midland counties. He was also Grand Worthy Secretary of the Independent Order of Good Templars. Nor did all these engagements satisfy his appetite for work. His pen has been in constant service. Among his published works are two volumes of "Temperance Anecdotes," a "Temperance Handbook," "The Four Pillars of Temperance," "Happy Homes," besides a large number of short sketches. His latest work is a popular "Life of John Wesley," which has had a large circulation.

MARY CARTER'S SUNDAY VISITORS.

(See Illustration.)

Mary Carter was busy. The three rooms in the dingy tenement house she called home, were in a state of that uncomfortable disorder which was the necessary preliminary to the cleanliness and tidiness which would appear later in the day. It was early on Sunday morning, and Mary prided herself on having the rooms as clean as a new pin on Sunday afternoon. Then her husband in his best suit, minus his coat, having "cleaned himself," sat down resplendent in snowy shirt-sleeves to his dinner, after which he would smoke his pipe "like a gentleman," and congratulate his wife on having made the place "like a Fifth Avenue mansion."

Mary was hurrying on when a knock came at her outer door, and a lady entered. Mary knew her at once. She worked for her, doing the roughest and dirtiest work that the servants were too genteel to do. The lady was Mrs. Wharton, an indefatigable district visitor, who used to lecture the women in her district with more energy than tact. Mary never appeared in church on Sunday mornings, and Mrs. Wharton resolved to expostulate with her. To be sure, she might have done so at her own house, Mary having been there the very day before, and every day that week; but that would have caused Mary to waste her time, and Mrs. Wharton, when she paid a woman for a day's work, thought the day ought to be fully occupied.

Mrs. Wharton looked at the tilted chairs, the pail and brush, and the broom in Mary's hand with disapproval, but a simpering smile, which she supposed to be sweetly angelic, was always at her command, and was duly called up. "This is the day of rest," she said with an air of condescending information. "It comes to bless us, and, like the hand of a kind friend, to point to the world where 'the weary are at rest.' We do a bad thing when we take this day and use it as we do any of the other days of the week."

"Eh, madam," Mary answered, "rest be a good thing; I'm tired enough, but I can t rest with the dirt around. I'll be all tidy soon, then I'll cook a bit o' dinner, and after that I'll have a rest."

Mary Carter's Cleaning Interrupted.

"That is not the right way to spend the Lord's Day, Mary," Mrs. Wharton remarked. "You should do this work before Sunday, and then you could come to church and hear of a precious Saviour, and learn the way to heaven."

"No, madam, I couldn't go to church and know the place wasn't cleaned up; I should be miserable. That's for the likes o' you. It isn't for poor folks like me. Why, you wouldn't like to go to church if you hadn't servants at home to do your place up for you, and cook the dinner, and all that."

Mrs. Wharton's conscience smote her, for half an hour ago, as she left her house, she had seen her servants at work. "I would do my work before Sunday, Mary," she said, a little color coming into her cheek; "I would not leave it to be done on the Lord's Day."

"You couldn't if you went out to work every day o' the week, and come home that tired you was fit to drop." Mary said this a little impatiently, for she had no opinion of ladies who never did a day's housework in their lives trying to teach her how to manage. She moved away a little, and took her brush out of the pail as a gentle hint to the lady that she wanted to recommence her labor. But the hint was not taken. On the contrary, Mrs. Wharton helped herself to a chair, and opening the Bible, ornamented with a massive silver clasp, which she always carried when going on these visits, she said: "Come, sit down for a few minutes; I want to read a chapter to you, and then I have something more I want to talk to you about. You are really living like a heathen."

Mary obeyed unwillingly enough, and sat thinking of her neglected work while Mrs. Wharton read a chapter from the Epistle to the Hebrews. Mary heard that "a rest remaineth to the people of God," but the words carried no meaning to her except that the people of God must be people like Mrs. Wharton, with fashionable clothes, and gold rings, and watches. The reading finished, Mrs. Wharton said: "It is good news I bring you to-day. Do you see the bright sun shining in at your window, and coming in at your door?" "Ay, ma'am."

"Were your house a palace, the sun would not be warmer nor more cheery there than it is as we now see it here. The good news I have to mention is just like that light; it is as much for you as for any one else; for it is about Jesus Christ, who came 'to seek and to save that which was lost.' He is to the man or woman who believes in Him what that sun is to the eye, both light and gladness."

Having told her something more about this precious Saviour, Mary looked at her and began to speak, but her voice faltered; if the good news were for her, it seemed strange that it could do her no good.

Mrs. Wharton, having satisfied her conscience about Mary, went her way to the fashionable church she attended, promising to call another day, which Mary earnestly hoped would be a distant one.

Another interruption came, and Mary bemoaned her "bad luck." This time the visitor was a neighbor, who being on good terms with Mary did not object to the work going on while she talked. Indeed, she put a hand to it herself to help along.

"Mary," she said, "I want you and Tom to come along with me to the mission chapel to-night. The singing's lovely, and there's a preacher there as talks as simple and plain any one can understand him. You'll like it. Jem and me'll call for you."

Mary thought she had had enough of religion for one day, but her friend would take no denial, and after consulting Tom in the next room she agreed to go. It was a strange revelation to her. The Saviour who loved the poor, who sympathized with their troubles, who knew their difficulties and trials, was preached to them, and Mary was drawn to Him. She needed no urging to go the next week. Tom went too, and he signed the pledge.

"Don't you go out to work on Saturday, Mary," he said; "we shall have my beer money extra this week, and we can do without Mrs. Wharton's money. You stay home and get your cleaning done on Saturday, and we'll go to the mission on Sunday morning as well as at night. I like it."

Mrs. Wharton was highly indignant when Mary told her she was not going to work on Saturday, wondered what these poor folks were coming to, and was much annoyed by the inconvenience. But Mary persisted, and on Sunday morning she and Tom put in an appearance at the mission. As time went on both Tom and Mary became changed characters. Sunday was a day of delight to them, and though Mrs. Wharton could never forgive Mary for not working for her on Saturday, and read her a lecture on laziness, and lent her a tract on the subject, Mary always remained home, got her work done, and was ready for Sunday's rest regularly. Mrs. Wharton does not think much of Mary's religion, which causes her to be indifferent to the convenience of her superiors in station, and Mary thinks Mrs. Wharton is "kind o' selfish like," and is glad that her dear Lord chose to be a workingman and not a gentleman when He was here, "so as He could understand poor folks."

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Hester's Request.

ROBERT WALDRON spoke with earnestness, and began to feel as if pity for Mr. Morley was the real and most deeply-rooted motive of his conduct. He had no purpose to deceive Hester. He was in fact deceiving himself; and his handsome face wore an aspect of profound and solemn remorse. "And you," he continued, "the child who loved me, the little girl who used to watch for my coming and brighten into smiles when you saw me; my heart aches to see you thus. Hester, who will give you back the lost laughter of your childhood? Who can recall these gloomy days, which ought to have been steeped in brightness? If I could but call back the past, and once more set us all as we were ten years ago, I would pay down my life gladly as the price." Hester raised her eyes to his, and read in them an expression which fully sustained the words he was speaking. It was not in her nature to doubt, and experience had not taught her to suspect. She let Robert Waldron take her cold hand in his own, and stood beside him, trembling, but calm and grave.

"Is there nothing I can do for you?" he asked, in a pleading tone; "your face always wears a look of care. Is it anything besides the old trouble? Let me speak frankly to you, my child; for you are still no more than a child to me—the little Hetty you used to be. I am rich, and from many persons I hear that you are poor. If there be any time when money becomes a pressing want with you, will you look to me as an elder brother whose greatest satisfaction would be to do anything for you? Is there nothing I can do for you now? Have you no anxiety which I could take away from you at once?"

"There is nothing you can do," answered Hester, with drooping eyelids, and lashes burdened with tears which did not fall.

"Yet think," urged Robert Waldron; "for my sake give me something to do for you. It is to give me relief from the remorse I feel. Have you no wish which you could intrust to me? Is there nothing you want if you had the means? I am a man, an idle man, with nothing to occupy me. I would do anything for you."

Hester looked up to him again with her truthful and searching gaze, and retreated to the side of the Frenchwoman, who had been standing by with an eager curiosity, unable to comprehend a syllable of the earnest words which were being spoken. The girl's young face was as white as marble, and almost as motionless, except for the flicker of the light in her eyes, which seemed to be kindled from within.

"I have had one wish," she said, with pallid lips that scarcely parted to whisper it, "ever since I knew that she was lost. You are a rich man, and an idle one, and you want to make atonement. Find her whom we have lost; find her who loved you. I think of her day after day, and I ask God to bring her back to me every morning and night. She was so kind and so pretty; I dare not call her good now. I wonder what has become of her—where she is at this minute—what she is doing or suffering. Oh! if I had been you, I should never have given up seeking for her."

"Good heavens, Hester!" he exclaimed, "do you suppose I did not do all I could to find her? I left her at Falaise, while I came over to England on business; and when I returned there was not a trace of her to be found. I did everything in my power at the time."

"I have read in books," said Hester, with an air of wisdom, "that it is no sorrow to get rid of a woman of whom one is tired. You were already getting tired of her, perhaps. There was no longer any pleasure in being near her. Did you try to find her as you would have done if she had been your sister or your wife who was lost to you?"

At another time Robert Waldron might have smiled at the tone of girlish sagacity with which Hester spoke; but just now he was conscience-stricken. No; he had not sought for Rose with the persevering energy he would have used had she been really dear to him. So far Hester's wisdom, drawn only from books, was right; and yet he had made many efforts and taken a good deal of trouble, both at the time and since. Rose had been tolerably well supplied with money, and she was no child when she quitted him. He had often taken refuge in the reflection that she was a little older than himself. But now that he saw Hester, wise only with the wisdom of books, and knowing nothing of real life, but burdened with an overpowering anxiety as to the fate of the missing woman, he felt as if he had been shamefully negligent in his attempt to discover her.

"I cannot talk more about it," cried Hester, a burning flush mounting to her white cheeks and her calm forehead, "but I have no other great wish. There is nothing else you could do for me." She said the last few words in a low shy tone, which penetrated to Robert's heart. He recollected madame's sentence, "that she could do her little acts of devotion before her as before a saint." He also would willingly have knelt at her feet to make there a vow of penitence and atonement, if she would only look down upon him gently and tenderly with her grand, calm eyes, which still bore the serenity of a child in them. He resolved in himself to insure some means of seeing her again, even if she spoke only of this subject so utterly distasteful to him, and of which she spoke with such simple and innocent candor.

"Hester," he said, "I will take up this search again. But remember, it is now more than nine years ago, and there is barely a chance of success."

"Oh, you will find her!" she exclaimed, holding out her hand to him again; "whatever she is, or wherever she is, you must rescue her. It will bring peace to me, and later, perhaps, to my father. When he comes to die, how horrible it will be not to know where she is, or what has befallen her! But if you find her, then I shall know what answer to give him when he asks himself some day or other, 'What has become of my poor Rose?'"

"I will go, I will spare nothing," said Robert, warmed by one of the generous impulses which from time to time broke through the indolent selfishness of his temperament. He believed that there was no other motive at work within him, save that of an earnest desire to repair the mischief he had done; yet he kept Hester's small hand clasped tightly in his own, and felt it impossible to resolve upon leaving her presence.

"I must leave you, madame," he said, addressing the old Frenchwoman; "I am about to start for your dear France, but I shall return in three or four weeks, and if you will permit me I will pay you an early visit. Hester," he added, in English, "it will be necessary to tell you all I do. Can I write to you safely? Will your father see my letter?"

"You can write to me," she answered; "my father will know nothing about it. Good-by."

"Good-by, little Hetty," he replied; "say, 'God speed you, Robert Waldron.'"

"God speed you," repeated Hester, with a glance into his eyes which made his heart throb again. He laid his mustached lip against each smooth cheek of madame, with an air of gallantry as exquisitely refreshing to her as cold waters to a thirsty soul; and with a last look at Hester he hastened from the poor garret, and down the stairs, as if the next instant should see him on his way to Southampton, the nearest route to France.

He did start, as soon as he could make such arrangements as would not involve confiding the reason of his expedition to his father. He had no wish to make him acquainted either with his recent intercourse with Hester, or the quixotic mission she had sent him abroad for. This mission was so utterly distasteful to him, that but a little more painfulness would have made him abandon it altogether. It was like raking among the ashes of the dead to reconstruct a skeleton. It had not been a pleasant sin to him, even at the time; and now it seemed likely to prove a root of bitterness which had struck very deeply indeed. The one point of attraction in the whole of his present course of action was the tie gradually formed by it between himself and Hester. He wrote to her frequently, and looked forward to another half-stolen interview with her upon his return. Three or four times, also, she wrote to him.

The quest was as Robert Waldron expected, utterly fruitless, so far as its immediate object was concerned. He could discover no satisfactory trace of Rose, though he stayed in Normandy several weeks longer than he had at first intended, urged by Hester to make sure that he left no means untried. At last he returned to England, without announcing his intention of doing so to her, and at once paid a visit to the garret of Madame Lawson. After his purposeless and impulsive nature, he resolved to see and know more of Hester, without looking forward to any result from such an intercourse, except the agreeable distraction from ennui which it afforded him.

Madame Lawson understood him better than he understood himself; and all her inherent love of intrigue, which had been starving for lack of food in England, revived in full force. She knew very well that a monsieur, so distinguished and so handsome, did not pay his visits to her garret out of pure kindness to an exile. By dexterous questions she ascertained his position and his wealth. He even confided to her the history of his early fault, which seemed to her, accustomed as she was to the frivolity of aristocratic society as it then existed in France, so venial that she exclaimed at these strange English, who could recollect so small a sin. She could see no reason whatever why this rich and great milord should not eventually love and be loved by Hester. In fact, it was a beautiful little turn of the wheel by which the wrong which had been committed might be redressed. She very willingly let him know when he might find Hester at her place.

Robert took care to be there the very first time Hester paid madame a visit after his return. But she was not a second time to be taken by surprise. She greeted him calmly and collectedly, and listened to his account of his journeyings with a grave and downcast face, while he spoke to her almost in a whisper, lest any word should reach other ears than her own. When his narrative was ended, and she looked more sad than before, Robert Waldron could no longer keep back a question which had been all the time upon his mind.

"What could you do, Hester?" he asked; "you could not see her for yourself."

"Not see her!" echoed Hester, with a sudden flame of passion upon her quiet face; "not see her! Why should I see you, and refuse to speak to her? Why should I let you touch my hand, and hold it back from her? I would go to her to-day, if I only knew where she was."

"You do not know what the world would say," said Robert Waldron.

"I believe I know what Christ would think," she murmured. The momentary fire of indignation and protest died out, and she leaned her face upon her hands, and wept long and bitterly, with tears of mingled disappointment and longing. It was the first time that the world's opinion had been, in any shape, thrust upon her. In her own dreams of fresh romance and enthusiastic religion, she had seen no obstacle whatever to her scheme for seeking from him! She wept so long and hopelessly that Robert Waldron was almost beside himself.

"Hetty," he said, "I will do whatever you bid me. I will go back again, and come here no more unless I find her, if you desire it. But there is no chance of discovering her. I assure you most solemnly I have done all I can; yet I will go back again."

"No, no," she answered, "you must not leave your father a second time on a useless errand. But I have had nothing else to think of all these years, and now it is all over. I only wish we knew that she was dead!"

Robert Waldron echoed the wish ardently in his heart, but he did not utter it. Perhaps she might be dead; but he had never attempted to establish that point. He resolved now to put this question afloat, and see what response he could get to it.

"I have thought of one other thing I can do," he said, "and it shall be done quickly. When may I see you again?"

"I come here often," she answered, with wistful eagerness; "this is the only place where I dare meet with you. My father must never know it."

Hester had been so long sole mistress and arbitress of her own actions that there was no element either of disobedience or concealment in the arrangement she had just suggested. It was merely to shield her father from the disquietude and pain of hearing Robert Waldron's name spoken in any connection, that she appointed Lawson's garret as the only place where she could meet him. To have asked her father's opinion would have seemed utter folly and cruelty to her. As she spoke, her girlish ignorance of the world smote upon Robert's conscience, but his generosity was not equal to the sacrifice. He must see her again, why, he scarcely knew; but to forego the stolen and prohibited delight was impossible to him.

"I will see you again in a few days," he said, in a measured voice which betrayed no emotion.

He stayed no longer, but went away, leaving madame to praise her new and powerful patron. The old Frenchwoman was wary, and perfectly comprehended the rôle she had to play. She would keep his secret, and aid his meeting with Hester to the utmost of her power. To this end she maintained a careful silence about Robert Waldron to her son, who never returned from the workshop until late in the evening, long after Hester had gone home, and when there was no chance of his visits.

John Morley, in his dark den, where he brooded over his long, sad, selfish dream of sorrow, had no idea that his daughter was in direct and personal communication with Robert Waldron. He was receiving some very material shocks to his profound inattention to business; for his affairs were daily becoming more and more involved, and his creditors more pressing. In these troubles Hester had to bear more than her full share; and whenever his thoughts turned from their old sorrow, they had nothing to occupy them but this new one. It was a relief to go and see the gay old woman, whose cheerful songs and laughter stirred her heart to something of girlish merriment; and Robert Waldron's occasional presence there added another interest, amounting almost to an attraction, to her visits.

THE BLESSEDNESS OF BELIEVERS.

S. S. Lesson for June 15, Rom. 8 : 28–39. Golden Text, verse 28. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Love Includes Trust—Confidence in Trial—Care a Hinderance to God's Work—The Divine Purpose—To Produce Conformity to Christ's Image—Justification Complete and Perfect—An After Question—Symptoms of Imperfect Sanctification—Details of Daily Life as Signs—God's Varied Tests and Trials—Satan's Delight in Effecting Bondage — God's Justifying Triumphant — More than Conqueror — Small Annoyances—How to Prevent Separation.

"AND we know that all things work together for good to them which love God." All things, pleasant and unpleasant, convenient and inconvenient, expected and unexpected, possible and impossible, arising through persons or through circumstances — all things work together for good to them that love God. To whom do they work together for good? To one class only, to them that love God. When we really love another, we put a good construction on all which he does and says; we have such confidence in him that we do not suspect in him motives which we look for in others; we give him credit for doing always that which is consistent with the understanding which exists between him and us. We do not judge him by what he does or says, but by that which we believe he is; and we judge his actions by himself, whereas we judge a stranger by his actions and his words.

If we really love God, we can trust Him where we do not understand His dealings with us; we can trust Him out of our sight; and knowing that He has perfect control over all things, we can believe that He in His own secret and wise counsels is making all things to work together for our good. Joseph when in Egypt had this confidence; and unlikely as it seemed that slavery and the prison, the loss of his position and his reputation should work together for bringing about that position of rule which God had foretold him, yet so it was; and that heart of Joseph's which trusted Him then in the dark, knew afterward how to commit to Him the affairs of the mightiest kingdom of the then known world.

While we kick against circumstances and against people; while we are trying to deal with them, to prove that we are in the right and they in the wrong, we are hindering our God in bringing about that for which He has created us. What is it? "Whom He did foreknow, He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of His Son, that He might be the first-born among many brethren." He has created us, but the image in which we were first created has been obliterated by sin; He has redeemed us; justified us if we believe, sanctified us if we are yielded to Him, filled some of us with the Holy Ghost if we have let Him do it; but all this is for a purpose, the purpose of our being—viz., that we might be conformed to the image of His Son. Justification, cleansing, the filling with the Spirit, all prepare for this. But this purpose of our loving God to conform us to Christ is carried out by Him day by day through the "all things" which He permits.

We are justified, bless God, once for all, as soon as we believe, and we can never be more justified than then. We are sanctified by the offering of the body of Jesus Christ once for all. But in every detail of daily life comes the question whether our bodies are really offered to God a living sacrifice, whether really in this or that new circumstance the Holy Ghost is to be Lord in His temple or not. Where the will is completely yielded there is no question; but wherever self is allowed for a moment to have a voice, and there is a kick against persons or circumstances, there is a lack of conformity to the image of Jesus. And our loving and trials, overruling all the malice of the enemy that He may bring out in every conceivable way the manifestation of Christ in us. So long as we consider or acknowledge self, our likes and dislikes, our choices or conveniences, our reputation, etc., and so long as we attempt to set ourselves right, it is quite clear that the matter is not entirely a settled one with us that God is for us, and that therefore all things work together for good. But if the most annoying things occur, and we only see God's hand in them, it is most clear that Christ in us, not self, is regarding them, and He is making them work together for the exercise of His life in us. One whom I highly value misinterprets everything I do; praise the Lord, it is among the "all things." An elder sister attempts to manage me so that I have no personal liberty as to eating, clothing, or the disposition of my time, or the following of God's leadings. It is among the "all things." But am I to resist in such circumstances? Refer all to Him who holds the reins, and He will show the way out; praise Him for all. "But," says another, "I have a friend who professes to love me, but it is a friendship which is the veriest slavery; he assumes the control and management of me, he has invested all his money in my business, and so arranges that everything I do which he does not dictate is a loss to him, leaving me no freedom to follow the Spirit of God, and being jealous of every influence which brings me into freedom." Praise God, it is among the "all things," for it is only out of such bondage that we know the joy of the Spirit's liberty; "Ye are bought with a price; be ye not the servants of men" (1 Cor. 7 : 23).

SATAN LOVES BONDAGE;

he brings some into bondage to the world, some to business, some to pleasure, some to reputation, some to learning, some to domestic cares, some to Christian work, some to friendships; the Son of God is He who makes us free. And "if God be for us, who can be against us?" Satan will say if we seem to have no success in our Christian work, "God is against you;" but no, this is among the "all things;" God is showing that the Holy Ghost, not our own energy, is the power for service; and He will make the very failure work together for greater blessing if we learn the lesson. Satan will say that God is against us if a child much prayed for goes wrong. Let us unite with God, and have confidence in Him; then He will cause the very wrongdoing to convict the child that in him is no good thing, and cause his real coming to Jesus. Thus if God be for us we cannot recognize anything or any person against us, our cause is His cause. If we have a doubt as to His love, He says, "He that spared not His own Son, but delivered Him up for us all, how shall He not with Him also freely give us all things?" How can He, who has already given so much for us, fail in one single thing to seek our good?

How much do

WE KNOW ALREADY

of His love? He asks, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Thousands of witnesses might rise; angels, men, devils might accuse any child of God; but He says, "It is God that justifieth." What is this? The wronged party, the one sinned against, takes the part of the sinner; and that, not to prove him innocent, but to clear him from all blame. How? He asks again, "Who is he that condemneth?" and answers, oh, what an answer! "It is Christ that died, yea rather, that is risen again, who is even at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us!" He spared not His own Son! He Himself sets forth His own Son, crucified, risen, interceding for us as the justification of those who have sinned against Him. How can we wrong Him by doubting that all things permitted and overruled by Him are working together for our good? How can our hearts do anything but praise and adore Him under all circumstances?

Paul, who knew more than most men about adverse circumstances (II Cor. 11 : 18–33), says, "Who shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword?" The apostle does not write as though these were unusual things; he says, quoting from Ps. 44 : 22, "For thy sake we are killed all the day long; we are accounted as sheep for the slaughter." But he answers his question without a shadow of a doubt, "Nay," these things, these temporal things cannot separate us from the love of God, "in all these things we are through Him that loved us." Beloved reader, does an unexpected interruption when you are particularly engaged never for a moment separate you from that love of Christ which causes that all things work together for good? Does not the untidiness or forgetfulness of a servant sometimes for a moment so annoy and mortify you that it separates you from that love of God which causes that all things, these things, are working together for your good? Does not the long, unspiritual prayer of some very trying brother in the prayer-meeting, or the one who is always out of time or out of tune in the singing, never for the moment separate from that love of Christ which has permitted it? Does not the wrongdoing of a partner in business or perhaps a husband or a wife in business matters never bring about a moment's doubt as to the love of God in allowing it? Paul declares that none of these things have the power in themselves to bring about this separation from the love of Christ. It is not the things themselves which cause this lack of loving confidence in Him, but it is whether we take them from the hand of God or from that of man. Paul speaks very strongly when he says, "I am persuaded that neither death, nor life, nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord."

How, then, are we to prevent this separation? If we are really confident that God is making all things work together for our good, we shall naturally praise Him for all things, we shall have a song to sing about all our troubles, and then we shall "rejoice in the Lord always" (Phil. 4 : 4), not only occasionally. We shall sing David's song, "I will bless the Lord at all times: His praise shall continually be in my mouth" (Ps. 34 : 1), and with Paul give thanks always for all things (Eph. 5 : 20). Thus we "shall understand the lovingkindness of the Lord."

Another Dynamite Explosion took Place in London on May 31st. It occurred about half-past nine o'clock at night on the corner of the detective headquarters, Scotland Yard. The corner of the building, which was composed of thick brickwork, was blown off to a height of thirty feet, taking with it a portion of the side walls and revealing an aperture fifteen feet wide. Thirteen persons were injured, and five of them, one of whom is a policeman, lie in a precarious condition. Another is the driver of a hack, which was passing at the time. About the same hour a dynamite bomb was thrown into the area of a club-house much frequented by members of Parliament. A miscreant was seen to light the fuse, throw the bomb, and run away. Other public buildings were instantly searched, and eighteen packages of dynamite were discovered. Some of them were placed at the base of the famous Nelson column in Trafalgar Square. Had those exploded, the loss of life and destruction of property would have been enormous. London is more deeply moved by this explosion than by any that have preceded it. The lower classes especially are very indignant, and threats of reprisal are made. There are a large number of Irishmen resident in London who would fare badly if the idea of reprisal became popular. Rossa, as usual, claims the credit of having planned the explosion, and states that he knows who executed it; also he needs more money from the servant girls to aid him in freeing Ireland. He asserts that three more explosions are in preparation, the third of which will be at Windsor Castle, one of the residences of the Queen. Such a boast, if made in almost any other country, would secure him a term of imprisonment.

The Provocation of the Dynamite Outrage is on the regular line of Irish policy. On May 27th the government introduced a measure for the benefit of Irish tenants. It is on all hands considered a generous measure, by which the Irish peasantry will be enabled to become the absolute owners of their farms by paying yearly for forty years a sum less than what they now pay for rent, the government undertaking to advance a hundred millions for this purpose. The Irish evinced their gratitude by planning and executing a dynamite explosion, just as the first land bill was also immediately followed by a dynamite outrage, and, still earlier, the appointment of a secretary friendly to the Irish people was followed by his murder. The agitators realize that a government concession deprives them of political capital, and they consequently endeavor to arouse a state of feeling which would make concessions impossible.

A New Mahdi has made his Appearance in the Soudan. He is hostile to the Mahdi who has raised the trouble in the Soudan, and has, it is reported, attacked the troops before Darfour. He claims that he has the power of becoming invisible at will, and has gained believers. A story is told by the natives that the Mahdi sent soldiers to capture the new prophet, but when the soldiers had surrounded the divan in which he was sitting he suddenly vanished in the air.

General Gordon's Situation in Khartoum, perilous as it is, appears to be voluntarily endured by the brave commander, who refuses to desert those who trust him and whom he went to deliver. Sir Henry Gordon, who is the brother of General Gordon, stated on May 26th, in the course of an interview with a reporter, that the latest news received from his brother was to the effect that he had no fear as to his personal safety. He could leave Khartoum by a safe route any day, but would not until a better government in the Eastern Soudan had been established and the safety of the inhabitants from the rebels assured. At the time of General Gordon's news to Sir Henry he was engaged in a project against the slave trade in the Upper Congo. General Gordon considered that a large British expedition was needless. He only wanted a few hundred English troops to co-operate with the gunboats after the rising of the Nile to clear the country of rebels from Berber to Khartoum. The Pall Mall Gazette not long ago said: "General Gordon's own policy from the first has been to cling tenaciously to Khartoum and trust to time to dissolve the union among the Mahdi's followers and to wear away their hostility. Even Arabs get tired in time of exposing themselves to Krupp shells, and discover that their interest is to make friends of the men who are in possession of an impregnable fortress. General Gordon has food for five or six months."

A New Nihilistic Warning has been Given to the Emperor of Russia. It was conveyed in a proclamation posted on the walls of the capital and other large cities. It assures him that if he would avoid his father's fate he must grant a constitution to the people. "We address you," says the proclamation, "as a citizen and an honest man, and hope that personal ill-feeling will not smother your sense of duty and your desire to learn the truth. We only ask for justice and for what all civilized nations already possess—personal and political freedom. We ask that representatives of the Russian people should be summoned. We ask for a full amnesty, full freedom of the press, speech and meetings as the only means of saving Russia from revolution." The proclamation ends with a threat of pitiless vengeance if its demands are disregarded. The Emperor appears determined to refuse the demands made in the proclamation.

The French Invasion of Madagascar is being steadily pushed forward. Prime Minister Ferry has informed the Commission of the Chambers on Madagascar Credits that orders have been sent to Admiral Miot, the French commander in Madagascar waters, to extend his operations immediately upon the arrival of a battalion of marines from Tonquin, which it was expected would be on June 30th. M. Ferry also informed the Commission that since the 8th of May Admiral Miot had extended the blockade along the east coast of the island.

Mental and Physical Disease as the Fruit of intemperance appears to be on the increase in Great Britain, if reliance may be placed on a recent appalling statement published by the London Medical Press, which says that insanity is nearly thrice as prevalent in the United Kingdom as it was forty years ago. The number of scrofulous and tuberculous patients has also largely increased in our hospitals. In both instances the increase appears to be, to a considerable extent, due to the great and increasing prevalence of alcoholism in all classes, in both sexes, and at all ages. The spread of intemperance among children is one of the saddest and most alarming signs of the times. Very recently we saw three children, the age of the eldest of whom did not exceed ten or eleven years, in different states of intoxication, reeling out of a public-house in one of our principal thoroughfares on a Sunday afternoon; one was unable to stand without the assistance of his companions, and all were uttering filthy imprecations, which under sad circumstances and in the voice of childhood, were to us not only the most pitiable of sounds, but also the strongest appeal we had ever heard for some legal interference with that unholy traffic of which such were the results.

A Bill Legalizing the Cremation of the Dead was rejected recently by the British Parliament. The majority against it was overwhelming, and showed a decided public feeling against the practice. The society, however, which promoted the measure is so confident of the ultimate triumph of its idea that it has purchased land and erected a furnace for the burning of dead bodies. No human remains have ever been burned there, but several experiments on animals have been made. A portion of the carcase of a horse weighing one hundred and forty pounds was consumed in two hours, the ashes weighing a little under six pounds. Not the slightest odor could be detected, and there was no escape of smoke from the chimney. The ceremony, as described at the meeting of the congress of supporters of cremation held at Dresden in 1876, would take some such form as this. At the appointed hour the relatives, friends, and visitors would assemble in a mortuary hall, and there whatever preliminary religious ceremonies were desired would be performed. From this hall the procession of friends of the deceased would start for the crematory, whereupon the coffin would be removed by mechanical means. Two attendants would be supplied, whose duty it would be to open the cremation chamber and slide the coffin over the rollers into it. When the cremation has been performed a slide would be withdrawn by the official in the presence of the mourners and others, and the ashes would fall into an urn, which would then be closed down and sealed.

Honors have been Paid to an American Missionary, which are well deserved. The Rev. Cephas Bennett, of the American Baptist Mission, in Burmah, having attained his eightieth year of age, and the fifty-fourth of missionary service in that country, has received the special congratulations of the Chief Commissioner of Rangoon, together with those of the missionaries of the province and ministers of the city. Mr. Bennett and his wife for more than half a century have labored indefatigably in the cause of Burmese evangelization. He has had the joy of printing the first edition of the Bible in that language, and numerous portions of the Scriptures in other dialects, as well as millions of tracts and other Christian literature. He was the friend and colleague of the great Dr. Judson, and after all these years of usefulness he and his devoted wife are still in good health, and actively engaged in valuable work.

The Work of Bible Translation is making progress as missionaries penetrate into newly explored lands. The London Christian says: "One of the most glorious facts of modern times is the rapidity with which the Word of God is being translated into every known language of men. The whole Bible is now published in the Zulu tongue, and the work of revising the Kafir translation is advancing toward completion. The Board of Revisers is composed of seven members, representing seven branches of the Church of Christ laboring in Kafirland. Thus South Africa bids fair to be speedily in full possession of that seed of the Kingdom from which rich harvests of blessing must spring."

"Thy Healer," A New Magazine Devoted to the subject of faith-healing, may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, price five cents, including postage. It is issued in London on the first and fifteenth of each month, and will be sent to subscribers promptly on its receipt in New York. The annual subscription is one dollar. It is edited by Mrs. M. Baxter whose expositions of the International Sunday-school lessons are published every week in this journal. It contains incidents of faith-healing reported from Bethshan, the London faith-healing institution, and from other similar institutions in Europe, and articles by eminent writers on the subject.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors, and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE LEADERS OF THE NEW JERSEY CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.

ALBERT G. MABEE.

The success of the Temperance movement in New Jersey, its remarkable progress in many cities and among all classes, and especially the permanent character of its achievements, have excited a general desire to know something of the two famous workers whose energy and eloquence and organizing abilities have started the movement and carried it forward. The Christian Herald, therefore, gives this week their portraits and a brief sketch of their lives.

Albert G. Mabee is youthful in appearance. Time has dealt kindly with him, and his clear bright eye and his alert, mirthful countenance give people who do not know his age, the idea that he cannot have passed his thirtieth year. As he was born on March 15th, 1843, it is evident that he must be in his forty-second year, though he has all the vivacity and sprightliness of a much younger man. Fort Plain, N. Y., was his birthplace, and there his parents gave him an excellent education, and took care that by precept and example he should learn that the religion of Christ is the best preparation for this life, as well as a safe guide to the life which is to come.

At the outbreak of

young Mabee, though still a student, resolved to join the ranks of the Union army. Like many young men of promise both North and South, the echo of the guns at Fort Sumter thrilled his soul and sounded in his ears like a trumpet-call to duty. He joined the Second N. Y. Harris Light Cavalry, and went to the front. His military record, of which Mr. Mabee speaks with natural modesty, must have been very creditable, for we find that a special recommendation was made of him at the close of the war by his Division Commander, the late General Custer.

The year that followed the declaration of peace was a critical one for many young soldiers. Some of them had left peaceful occupations for the excitements and dangers of the battle-field, and when their services in the army were no longer required they were little disposed to return to employments so dull and insipid as those they had left. Others, and of this class young Mabee was one, had still an occupation to choose, and they too were disinclined, in many instances, to pursue any of the callings from which they might have chosen before their tastes and dispositions were influenced by military life. Something more exciting than the pursuits of humdrum civil life was demanded, and young Mabee, in common with many others similarly situated, looked around for a calling in which there would be some chance of adventure. He was attracted to which at that time were a scene of excitement and agitation, in which the young soldier expected to find associations and surroundings agreeable to one fresh from the life of a camp. He went there, and found what he sought, with the additional peril of the absence of discipline, which had to a large extent restrained the excesses of the wilder spirits in the army. He associated with some of the most lively of the men there, and soon became a leader in scenes of dissipation. To a man of his mercurial temperament strong drink is the most powerful and seductive temptation the devil has to offer, and young Mabee soon fell into the snare. Before he quitted the oil regions the demon of the sparkling dram held him in its grasp.

In the year 1867 Mr. Mabee inherited a considerable fortune on the death of his father, and returned to Fort Plain to settle down. A career of honor and respectability lay before him if he had the self-control to avoid intoxicating liquors. That, however, was a difficulty not easily surmounted. He was aided in the attempt by his associations at this time, and the general respect to which his abilities, his position, and his prospects entitled him. He also became attached to a young lady belonging to one of the wealthiest families of Fort Plain, and whom he ultimately married. The influence of an honorable courtship, regard for the lady he loved, and for his character in society sufficed to keep him from the degradation of drunkenness, but he still drank at "high-toned" places, and as he could imbibe more liquor without showing its effects than the majority of men, he kept his character unstained.

After his marriage his increased resources led to greater indulgence, and the purchase of a famous trotting horse brought him into contact with men who are the most dangerous companions for a young man with a tendency to dissipated habits. Gradually, almost imperceptibly even to himself, his bondage to the rum-curse grew more complete. He had less shame after intoxication, less disposition to resist the habit, and less regard for his character. A change of residence might, in breaking up dangerous companionships, have saved him even then, if he had resolved, in the strength of God, to begin life anew. But, unhappily, the religious training of his early years was entirely forgotten, and his power of resistance unaided could not rescue him. His wife's family having removed to Lansing, Mich., Mr. Mabee and his wife followed them, and established a new home in that city. There his habits of dissipation increased; he neglected his business, associated with dissolute men, was as often drunk as he could be, and finally lost every cent of his property. He grew reckless then, and became the terror of his family. Three times he had delirium tremens, and the third time all hope of his recovery was abandoned. Still he continued his shameful career, regardless of his own interests and those of his family, until in sheer self-defence a legal rupture of his domestic relations was secured, and Mabee was left alone to do as he would.

At this crisis of his life a noble Christian woman saw him, and with the compassion born of love to Christ and the hope which the experience of Christ's power gives, she labored for the of the depraved, abandoned sinner. God blessed her efforts, and her heart was filled with joy when the miserable drunkard wrote with a trembling hand his signature on the toal abstinence pledge. With true womanly instinct, and with that Christian dependence on divine power which animated her, she carried off her convert to a place where he might learn of Jesus and be led to trust in Him for power to overcome his tempter.

Dr. Reynolds, the noble temperance worker, whose name is blessed by thousands of reformed drunkards now living grand Christians lives in all the States of the Union, was holding meetings in Lansing when Albert Mabee signed the pledge. No man better than he could tell the young man the secret of strength. Dr. Reynolds knew by miserable experience and by a succession of agonizing disappointments the futility of all means but one of gaining victory in this war. His medical education had given him exceptional facility for using antidotes with the best chance of success, and they had failed; he had tried the "tapering-off process," and that had failed; and he had tried swearing off before a judge, and that had failed. When every expedient had been tried, and all to no purpose, Dr. Reynolds was led in his despair to Christ, and was delivered. Years afterward, when a large sum of money was offered to him to disclose the secret of his success in temperance work, he said simply, "It is not in me. I stand here believing myself to be a monument of God's grace, saved through the prayers of the noble women of America." Dr. Reynolds kept the vow he made on that terrible night when, in the agony of desperation, he flung himself on his knees, and promised God that if He would save him from the dominion of the curse which had wrecked his life, the remainder of that life should be given to telling his fellow-men the only way to escape. He told that story wherever he had opportunity, and gave to every afflicted drunkard the unfailing prescription which had effected his own salvation. Dr. Reynolds also conceived the idea of a badge, which has since become so popular in the hands of others, and as he thought of his deliverance through he blood of Jesus he made the appropriate symbol of the emancipation he taught.

It was to Dr. Reynolds that young Mabee was taken when he had signed the pledge. He had need of such teaching as Dr. Reynolds could give, and of all the encouragement that the reminiscences of Dr. Reynolds were capable of affording. He was received with open arms, and Dr. Reynolds prayed and pleaded with him, and did not rest until the young convert had learned the way of salvation and made a profession of faith in Christ. Then his emancipation was complete, and he could pass his old haunts without the slightest wish to indulge his appetite for liquor. Indeed, the very appetite appeared to have been taken away, and the fire which had burned in his veins was quenched.

TEMPERANCE WORK.

Mr. Mabee's drunken habits were well known in Lansing, where he had lived, drinking and squandering his property, and where his home had been destroyed. Dr. Reynolds rightly thought that such an experience might be utilized for good there. He accordingly persuaded him to attend the meetings and describe the way in which he had been delivered. The effect was tremendous. The miracle, like that wrought on the lame man at the Beautiful gate of the temple (Acts 3 : 10), had been performed on one whose previous sad condition was within the knowledge of all, and they were astonished. Night after night Mabee repeated his story with ever-increasing effect. Then he associated himself with seven other reformed drunkards in and adopted the Red Ribbon badge.

A REFORMED CLUB,

The effect of Mr. Mabee's speeches was observed with delight by Dr. Reynolds and other temperance workers, and he was urged to extend his efforts. Encouraged himself by seeing the fruit of his labor, and anxious above all things that men enslaved as he had been might learn that emancipation was possible, he spoke as often as his business permitted him. Finally he saw it to be his duty to relinquish business altogether and devote himself unreservedly to a pursuit more noble than that of money-getting. He gradually extended the sphere of his labors from Lansing, along the Mohawk Valley, and then along the banks of the Hudson to Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and other points. While in Ulster County, N. Y., he labored with so much success that mainly through his efforts nine towns were carried for "no license."

It was while working in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., in 1880, that Mr. Mabee first met Mr. English, and being impressed with his singularly fine musical powers and his quaint humorous speeches he invited him to join him in the temperance work. Since that time, like another Moody and Sankey, the two men have gone from place to place, preaching and singing deliverance through Jesus to the captives of Satan.

THE NEW JERSEY CRUSADE

commenced November 30th, 1882, at Decker Town. From there the work spread rapidly to other places. In every town the two workers were carefui to leave the work in permanent form by organizing a local reform club, which would hold the converts together, encourage the younger ones, and give to all the aid which omes from fellowship and union. In this way thorough organization was established through ne counties of Warren, Sussex, Morris, Hunterton, and Somerset. At Trenton, the State apital, the enthusiasm awakened was unbounded, and it was necessary to hire the Opera louse for the meetings, no other building being irge enough to accommodate the crowds of eople who thronged to hear the two workers. t Plainfield, Montclair, Blomfield, New runswick, and Rahway similar scenes were witnessed, and many of the reclaimed men are ow actively engaged in temperance work. Iopes are entertained that through the operaon of the Reform Clubs, established wherever Iabee and English have labored, the minds of ne people will be so influenced, that the passng of a constitutional amendment in New Jersey ill be ultimately effected.

One important feature in the work of these mperance evangelists deserves special notice. t is that of the money question. Their lives re distinctly lives of faith. They have never ade a bargain before accepting any invitation work, and there has never been any scandal fter they have left of unpaid bills or of quarels or disputes about insufficient remuneration. hey have accepted such reward as the gratiide of the people has prompted, and have been erewith content. The temperance cause has onsequently been saved in their hands from the pprobrium which some less unselfish advocates ave unhappily brought upon it. They have elieved in God's providence, and casting themelves on the promise they have trusted in the ord, and they have been fed.

MR. JOSEPH P. ENGLISH, whose portrait accompanies that of his fellow-worker, Mr. Mabee, n the first page, was born in Dublin, May 28th, 334. He came to America in 1851, a youth of eventeen, desirous of seeing the world and aking his fortune. Mr. English has a signifiant reminiscence of his first act on landing on merican soil, which was to go to the first rumiop in sight and have a drink. It was not that e was thirsty, or that he had an inebriate's cravng for liquor, but he was a genuine, mirthful, ovial Irishman, who naturally associated the lea of liquor with any unusual occasion. He elebrated his landing in the New World as he ould have done a birth, or a wedding, or a ineral.

JOLLY LIFE.

He soon obtained employment, working at ood wages in Brooklyn. In the evening, after ork was done, he crossed the river to have "a ood time" in New York. There were plenty f places where the rollicking young Irishman ould have the kind of pleasure he liked best. he elements needed were only jolly congenial mpanions, good liquor, and music. For music e had a passion from his boyhood, and no man the saloons could sing a better song or had a weeter voice than young English. Generous ith his money, genial in manner, and ready to in in any innocent joke, he soon had a host of iends, and led a careless, jolly life. He was a elcome guest in all the saloons, and his high aritone voice was sure to be heard in some aunt of the Irishmen of New York every night.

Young English, however, found, as many a oung man has found before him, that the evenigs spent in that fashion affected him in the ay. He did not settle down to his work in the orning after a particularly uproarious evening ith the energy he used to have. His aching ead needed a reviving draught of liquor, and mehow he grew to dislike the work altogether. It was necessary to work in order to have money to spend, but he wished his work could be less dull, less prosaic, and more like the occupation of the evening. This wish grew upon him, and one day an opportunity of the kind desired came in his way. His genius for music and his singularly attractive voice brought him in contact with the old and he was invited to join the company. The invitation was joyfully accepted, and young English transferred his scene of operations from the shop in Brooklyn to Barnum's Museum, which was then on the corner of Broadway and Ann Street, New York, where the Herald building now stands. That was exactly the kind of life he desired, and the young Irishman entered into it with zest. The show business seemed to be the very thing he was made for. His quick wit, his rollicking humor, and his beautiful voice made him the prime favorite wherever he went, and he went with the show in one capacity or other into every State of the Union.

Meanwhile the life was telling heavily upon him. Constant opportunities for drinking led to the increased growth of the drinking habit. There were always plenty of people ready to treat the popular man of the show, and young English was during the twenty-four hours never quite sober, though seldom absolutely intoxicated. He speaks to this day with horror of that time of spiritual peril. It was a time of utter darkness for the soul. He had been reared a Roman Catholic, and when he left his home in Ireland it was with solemn warnings to be faithful to his religion. But his associations, the jeers of his new friends, and his continual drinking soon made religion in any shape distasteful to him. When a man hates religion he is not far from the stage in which he is ready to declare that it is not true. That step the circus clown soon took. He avowed himself declared there was no God, no devil, and no hereafter. He could make new jokes on the sacred subject, and heard them greeted with roars of laughter and cheers by the crowd, who wished too that he might be right in his assertions.

This reckless life continued until the year 1862, when, as Mr. English quaintly remarks, he was ACCIDENTALLY MARRIED.

It seemed to him at the time a mere accident. It was done without deliberation, without serious thought—the mere passing whim of the moment, a careless act in a careless life. But the influence of the act was more potent than he knew, and his wife soon began to wean him away from his fast life, and lead him to seek something better. Eventually he left the show business, and settled down at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., where, as he explained to his wife, he intended opening a respectable hotel-bar. She was not quite satisfied about the bar, but as Mr. English assured her he should sell temperance drinks, she ceased opposing the scheme, though it never had her approval. A genuine lager-beer saloon was opened, and a thriving business established.

The place prospered, as such places do, on the miseries of others. Money that should have bought clothing and food went into the new lager-beer saloon for liquid poison. Mrs. English was unsuspicious, for her husband never came into her presence intoxicated. Indeed, at this time he was so steeped in liquor that it would have been difficult for him to take sufficient to make him intoxicated. A visit from her mother, however, about this time rendered her uneasy. Mr. English says he "saw that the old lady could not be so easily fooled as her daughter was," and he observed that his heavy drinking was noticed. The old lady, however, showed considerable tact. Without upbraiding her son-in-law, she and her daughter consulted together, and called to their councils the leader of a temperance movement then in progress in Poughkeepsie. That was the renowned temperance lawyer, Edward Crummey, of whom Mr. Charles W. Sawyer often speaks as the cause under God of his own reformation.

After much pleading, and with much difficulty, Mr. English was induced one Sunday night to go to

THE TEMPERANCE MEETING.

It was a novelty to him, but he listened, and was interested. As the speaker described the effects of liquor on the heavy drinker he mentally indorsed the description, and as he spoke of the ruin of the drunkard's family and the misery of the drunkard's home, the rumseller acquiesced, for he knew how his customers lived and how they might live if they spent less in his saloon. His conscience smote him as Mr. Crummey dwelt on the rumseller's sinful responsibility, for which he would one day have to give account, and he went home feeling miserable. He wished he had not opened the saloon, wished he could get rid of it, was half inclined to close it and become a total abstainer. All that week he was in torment. The charge that he was helping his fellow-men to go to drunkards' graves weighed upon him, and as his customers came to the bar and bought his liquors he knew that the charge was true.

THE CRISIS

came at the end of the week. Among the motley crowd which gathered in the saloon on a Saturday night was one customer who was a particular friend of the rum-seller. He was a fellow-countryman, a stalwart mason from Ireland, who liked Mr. English, and was cordially liked in return.

Tom Murray was in the saloon as usual that night, and drank heavily, also, as usual. He fell asleep in the saloon, and while he lay there, there entered in her hand. She was singularly beautiful, with bright intelligent eyes and golden hair. The rumseller was struck with her beauty, with which her bare feet and her scanty garments were in startling contrast. He spoke kindly to her as he served her with the quart of lager for which she asked. She turned to the sleeping man, and touching him tenderly on the shoulder she said, "Papa, papa, please come home. Mamma is so lonely. She's sent me for some beer so you can have it at home. Dear papa, do come." The rumseller watched the pretty picture almost with tears in his eyes, and his conscience reminded him that this misery was his work. Tom Murray, awakened by the child's loving touch, roused himself. At length the meaning of the child's sweet appeal reached his muddled brain. It exasperated him, he raised his heavy boot to kick the pretty, delicate creature. Before he could do the cruel thing, the rumseller, who had been watching the scene, was over the bar, and had him by the collar.

It was late at night. Mr. English closed the bar, and then was seen a rumseller expostulating with a customer on the evils of drink, and recommending total abstinence. But it did not end there. Tom Murray sobered up, and the two friends discussed the question amicably. Finally the conference ended in both resolving to sign the pledge the next day. They shook hands upon it, and Tom Murray went home. Mr. English locked the door, and turning around found himself in the arms of his wife. She had come in unobserved just in time to hear the last words of the conference, and her heart was filled with joy. She threw her arms around his neck, saying, "I heard what you and Tom are going to do. It is the happiest moment of my life. Mother and I have been praying for this." The next day the rumseller headed of his customers, among whom was Tom Murray, and all signed the pledge. The liquor saloon was closed, and an oyster saloon took its place, in which no intoxicants were sold.

Mr. English describes, with feelings of pain, now, the horrors of the first few weeks of total abstinence. The struggle was fierce and bitter, but he fought it as for his life. It was not until he had abandoned his infidel opinions and accepted Christ as his Saviour and deliverer that the fight with temptation was finally ended. Then he was no longer afraid to pass a liquor saloon or to smell a whiff of the steaming rum as he passed an open doorway. To his amazement, the craving left him, and has never returned.

Since his reformation Mr. English has been in several occupations, but always, wherever he might be, taking an active part in temperance work. Applications for his assistance increased upon him, for few could enliven a meeting with so humorous an address or thrill it with so sweet a song as he, until at last temperance absorbed more of his time than business. Finally making the acquaintance of Mr. Mabee at Poughkeepsie, he accepted that gentleman's invitation to join him in the New Jersey crusade, and the success that God has given to the association indicates that it is likely to be a permanent one.

1864 AND 1884.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached before the G.A.R. on Sunday Evening, May 25, 1884, the Sunday immediately preceding Decoration Day.*

"And the Lord commanded the angel; and he put up his sword again into the sheath thereof."—1 CHRON. 21 : 27.

The Davidic Legend—The Contrasts of the two Dates—I. Contrast of Bitterness and Amity—A Very Real Hatred—Proved by Loaded Guns—By Prayers of Christians on Both Sides—Complete Accord now—II. Contrasts in Domestic Life—The Good-By at the Front Door—Sly Tears on Picket Duty—An English Soldier's Brutal Letter—Present Sweet Domesticity—Who the Letters were for—III. Contrast of Religious Opportunities—IV. National Condition—A Country worth Fighting for—The Dead Troops will Come again—The Final Review—The Historic Dead—Universal Victory.

ONE day in Davidic times the people looked up and saw against the sky something which made the blood curdle and the cheek blanch and the breath stop—an angel of overtowering stature, and armed with a sword long and bright as summer lightning when it cleaves the sky from zenith to horizon. The broad blade with curved edge pointed toward doomed Jerusalem. The sheath hung dangling at the side of the great supernatural, the sheath, of course, of such vast proportion as to have held the sword before it was brandished. As long as that uncovered sword was pointed toward Jerusalem havoc and massacre and bloodshed went on; but after a while, in answer to the prayers of the people and the sacrifices on the threshing-floor of Ornan, the angel drew back the sword with the right hand, and seizing the sheath with the left he inserted the sharp point into the mouth of the scabbard, and flung the sword down deep, until the haft of it struck the rim of the scabbard with resound that made the mountains about Jerusalem tremble. Then the havoc stopped, and the wounds healed, and the former glories of the city were eclipsed by the splendors subsequent. Hear you not the clang of sabre and scabbard as they come together in the words of my text? "And the Lord commanded the angel; and He put up His sword again into the sheath thereof."

SOLDIERS OF THE GRAND ARMY

of the Republic! And soldiers who fought on the other side! All one now in kindly brotherhood, whether you wore the color that suggested the gray of the morning sky or the blue of the full noon! And let no man who, by word or deed, tries to open the old wounds, ever offer, either in this world or the next, to take my hand! Hear me while I draw out the contrast between the time when the angel of war stood in the American sky, pointing his long, keen, cutting, frightful sword toward this, our beloved land, and for four years the Nation was in awful hemorrhage, and now when, in answer to the prayers and sacrifices on ten thousand altars, that angel of war that stood above us hath hurled the bloody scimetar into the scabbard with a clang that made everything from the Canadas to the gulf tremble with gladness.

At this season of decoration of the soldiers' graves, both at the North and South, it is appropriate that I rouse your patriotism, and revive your reminiscence, and stir your gratitude by putting 1864 beside 1884. I shall make two circles around

THESE TWO DATES.

Around 1864 I shall put a garland of red dahlias for the carnage. Around 1884 I shall put a garland of white lilies for the peace. The first date I shall crown with a chaplet of cypress. The second date I shall crown with a sheaf of wheat. The one date a dead march and the other a wedding anthem. Twelve o'clock at night compared with 12 o'clock at noon.

AMITY FOR BITTERNESS.

I. Contrast, first of all, the feelings of sectional bitterness in 1864 with the feeling of sectional amity in 1884. At the first date the South had banished the National air, "The Star Spangled Banner," and the North had banished the popular air of "Way Down South in Dixie." The Northern people were "mudsills," and the Southern people were "white trash." The more Southern people were killed in battle the better the North liked it. The more Northern people were killed in battle the better the South liked it. For four years the head of Abraham Lincoln or Jefferson Davis would have been worth a million dollars if delivered on the other side of the line. No need now, standing in our pulpits and platforms, of saying that the North and South did not hate each other. The hatred was as long and terrible as the sword, the angel of war, standing midheaven, gripped pointing toward this nation, and then swung closer down till it gashed a grave trench clear through the quivering heart of the continent. To estimate how very dearly we loved each other, count up the bombshells that were hurled, and the carbines that were loaded, and the cavalry horses that were mounted. North and South facing each other, all armed in the attempt to kill.

The two sections not only marshalled all their earthly hostilities, but tried to reach up and get hold of the sword spoken of in the text—the sword of heaven—and the prayer of Northern and Southern pulpits gave more information to the heavens about the best mode of settling this trouble than was ever used. For four years both sides tried to get hold of the Lord's thunderbolts, but could not quite reach them. At the breaking out of the war we had not for months heard of my dear uncle, Samuel K. Talmage, President of Oglethorpe University in Georgia. He was about the mildest man I ever knew, and as good as good could be. The first we heard of him was his opening prayer in Confederate Congress in Richmond, which was reported in the New York Herald, which prayer, if answered, would, to say the least, have left all his Northern relatives in very uncomfortable circumstances. The ministry at the North prayed one way, and the ministry at the South prayed another way. No use in hiding the fact that the North and South cursed each other with a withering and all-consuming curse.

Beside that antipathy of 1864, I place the of 1884. Meeting in New York to raise money to build a Home at Richmond for crippled Confederate soldiers, the meeting presided over by a man who lost an arm and a leg in fighting on the Northern side, and the leg not lost, so hurt that it does not amount to much. Cotton exhibition two years ago at Atlanta attended by tens of thousands of Northern people and by General Sherman, who was greeted with kindness, as though they had never seen him before. United States Government la week voting a million dollars toward a Ne Orleans exhibition, to be held next Decembe in which every Northern State will be repr sented. A thousand-fold kindlier feeling aft the war than before the war.

No more use of gunpowder in this countr except for Fourth of July pyrotechnics or shot at a roebuck in the Adirondacks. Brig dier generals in the Southern Confederacy ma ing their fortunes as lawyers in our Norther cities. Rivers of Georgia, Alabama, and Nort Carolina turning the mills of New England cap italists. The old lions of war—Fort Sumte and Moultrie, and Lafayette, and Pickens, an Hamilton—sound asleep on their iron paws, an instead of our raising money to keep enemie out of our harbor, raising money for the Ba tholdi statue on Bedloe's Island, the figure o Liberty with uplifted torch to light the way o all who want to come in. Instead of 1864 when you could not cross the line between th contestants without fighting your way with kee steel, or going through by passes carefull scrutinized at every step by bayonets, you nee only a railroad ticket from New York to Cha leston or New Orleans to go clear through, an there is no use for any weapon sharper o stronger than a steel pen. Since the years o time began their roll, has there ever been i two decades such an overmastering antithesis a between 1864, of complete bitterness, and 188 of complete sympathy? It is the differenc between the archangel of war mid-sky wit sword brandished, and the archangel of wa mid-sky with sword scabbarded.

II. Contrast also the

of 1864 with the domestic life of 1884. Yo were either leaving home or far away from it communicating by uncertain letter. What morning that was when you left home! Fathe and mother crying, sisters crying, you smilin outside, but crying inside. Everybody nervou and excited. Boys of the blue and gray Whether you started from the banks of th Hudson, or the Androscoggin, or the Savannah don't you remember the scenes at the fron door, at the rail car window, or the steamboa landing? The huzza could not drown out th suppressed sadness. Do you not remembe those charges to write home often, and tak good care of yourself, and be good boys, an the good-by kiss which they thought, and yo thought, might be forever?

Then the homesickness as you paced th river bank on a starlight night on picket duty and the sly tears that you wiped off when yo heard a group by a camp-fire singing the plan tation song about the "Old Folks at Home." The dinner of hard-tack on Thanksgiving day and the Christmas without any presents, an the long nights in the hospital, so different fro the sickness when you were at home, with mothe and sisters at the bedside, and the clock in th hall giving the exact moment for the medicine And that forced march when your legs ached and your head ached, and your wounds ached and more than all, homesickness which had in it a suffocation an a pang worse than death. You never got hard ened as did the guardsman in the Crimean war who heartlessly wrote home to his mother: "I don't want to see any more crying letters com to the Crimea from you. Those I have receive I put into my rifle, after loading it, and hav fired them at the Russians, because you appea to have a strong dislike to them. If you ha seen as many killed as I have, you would no have as many weak ideas as you now have. You never felt like that. When a soldier's knapsack was found after his death in ou American war, there was generally a carefu package containing a Bible, a few photographs and letters from home.

YOUR HEART ACHED—

On the other hand, tens of thousands o homes waiting for news. Parents saying "Twenty thousand killed! I wonder if our boy as among them?" Fainting dead away in ost-offices and telegraph stations. Both the ars of God filled with the sobs and agonies of indred waiting for news, or dropping under the nnouncement of bad news. Speak, swamps of hickahominy, and midnight lagoons, and fire- afts on the Mississippi, and gunboats before icksburg, and woods of Antietam, and tell to ll the mountains, and valleys, and rivers, and akes of North and South, the Jeremiads of 1864 hat have never been syllabled!

* Dr. Talmage did not preach last Sunday at the Brooklyn Tabernacle. His absence affords an opportunity for publishing this, his memorial sermon, preached on Sunday Evening, May 25, of which incorrect reports have appeared in Western journals. This report is accurate and verbatim.—ED.

Beside that domestic perturbation and home- ickness of twenty years ago put the f 1884. Where do you come from to-night? rom home. The only camp-fire you now sit at s at the one kindled in stove, or furnace, or earth. Instead of a half ration of salt pork, a epast luxuriant, because partaken of by loving amily circle and in sacred confidences. Oh, ow I see who those letters were for, the letters ou, the young soldier, took so long in your ent to write, and that you were so particular to ut in the mail without any one seeing—lest ou be teased by your comrades. God spared ou to come back, and though the old people ave gone, you have a home of your own con- truction, and you are here to-night, contrasting hose awful absences and filial, and brotherly, nd loverly heart-breaks with your present resi- lence, which is the dearest place you will find his side of heaven—the place where your hildren were born, and the place where you want to die. To write the figures 1864 I set up four crystals—crystals of tears; to write the figures 1884 I stand up four members of your household—figures of rosy cheeks and flaxen hair, if I can get them to stand still long enough.

III. Contrast also

of twenty years ago with now. Often on the march from Sunday morn till night, or com- manded by officers who considered the names of God and Christ of no use except to swear by. Sometimes the drum-head the pulpit; and you standing in heat or cold; all the sur- roundings of military life having a tendency to make you reckless; no privacy for prayer or Bible reading; no sound of church bells; Sab- baths spent far away from the places where you were brought up. To-day the choice of sanc- tuaries; easy pew; all Christian surroundings; the air full of God, and Christ, and heaven, and doxology; three mountains lifting themselves into the holy light—Mount Sinai thundering its law, Mount Calvary pleading the sacrifice, Mount Pisgah displaying the promised land.

IV. CONTRAST OF NATIONAL CONDITION.

1864 — Spending money by the millions in devastation of property and life. 1884—With finances so reconstructed that all the stock gamblers of Wall street, week before last, failed to make a National panic.

1864—The surgeons of the land setting broken bones, and amputating gangrened limbs, and studying gunshot fractures, and inventing easy ambulances for the wounded and dying. 1884— Surgeons giving their attentions to those in casualty of agriculture, or commerce, or mechan- ical life. The rushing of the ambulance through our streets not suggesting battle, but quick re- lief to some one fallen in peaceful industries.

1864—Thirty-five million inhabitants in this land. 1884—Fifty-five million.

1864—Wheat about eighty million bushels. 1884—The wheat will be about five hundred million bushels.

In 1864—Cotton less than three million bales; in 1884 cotton will be more than seven million bales.

In 1864—Pacific coast five weeks from the Atlantic; in 1884, for three reasons, Union Pacific, Southern Pacific, and Northern Pacific, only seven days across.

Look at the long line of churches, universities, asylums, and houses with which, during the last two decades, this land has been decorated. Oh, was not this

A COUNTRY WORTH FIGHTING FOR?

Do not the magnificent prosperities of 1884 compensate for the hardships of 1864? Sol- diers! Praise God that He has spared you to see this day, and as you gave your bodies in battle give your souls in peace to God and your country.

Living soldiers of the North and South! Take new and especial ordination at this season of the year to garland the sepulchres of your fallen comrades. Nothing is too good for their memories. Turn all the private tombs and the national cemeteries into gardens. Ye dead of Malvern Hill, and Cold Harbor, and Murfrees- boro, and Manassas Junction, and Cumberland Gap, and field hospital, receive these floral offer- ings of the living soldiery.

But they shall come again, all the dead troops. We sometimes talk about earthly mili- tary reviews, such as took place in Paris in the time of Marshal Ney, and in London in the time of Wellington, and in our own land. But what tame things compared with when all the armies of the ages shall pass for divine and angelic inspection! St. John says the armies of heaven ride on white horses, and I do not know why many of the old cavalry horses of earthly battle that were wounded and worn out in the service may not have resurrec- tion. It would be only fair that, raised up and ennobled, they would be resurrected for the grand review of the Judgment Day. It would not take any more power to reconstruct their poor bodies than to reconstruct ours, and I should be very glad to see them among the white horses of apocalyptic vision.

Hark to the trumpet blast, the reveille of the last Judgment! They come up, all the armies of all lands and all centuries, on whichever side they fought, whether for freedom or despotism, for the right or the wrong. They come! they come! Darius, and Cyrus, and Sennacherib, and Joshua, and David leading forth the armies of scriptural times. Hannibal and Hamilcar leading forth the armies of the Carthaginians. Victor Emanuel and Garibaldi leading on the armies of the Italians. Tamerlane and Genghis Khan followed by the armies of Asia. Gusta- vus Adolphus, and Ptolemy Philopater, and Xerxes, and Alexander, and Semiramis, and Washington leading battalion after battalion. The dead American armies of 1776 and 1812 and the one million of Northern and Southern dead in our civil war. They come up. They pass on in review. The 6,000,000 fallen in Napoleon- ic battles. The 12,000,000 Germans fallen in the thirty years' war. The 15,000,000 fallen in the war under Sesostris. The 20,000,000 fallen in wars of Justinian. The 25,000,000 fallen in Jew- ish wars. The 80,000,000 fallen in the crusades. The 180,000,000 fallen in Roman wars with Saracens and Turks. The 35,000,000,000 men estimated to have fallen in battle, enough, ac- cording to one statistician, if they stood four abreast, to reach clear around the earth 442 times.

But we shall have time to see them pass in re- view before the cavalrymen, the spearsmen, the artillerymen, the infantry, the sharp-shooters, the gunners, the sappers, the miners, the archers, the skir- mishers, men of all colors, of all epaulettes, of all standards, of all weaponry, of all countries. Let the earth be especially balanced to bear their tread. Forward! Forward! Let the orchestra of the heavenly galleries play the grand march, joined by all the fifers, drummers, and military bands that ever sounded victory or defeat at Eylau or Borodino, Marathon or Ther- mopylæ, Bunker Hill or Yorktown, Solferino or Balaclava, Sedan or Gettysburg, from the time that Joshua halted astronomy above Gibeon and Ajalon till the last man surrendered to Garnett Wolseley at Tel-el-Kebir. Attention! compa- nies, battalions, ages, centuries, and the universe. Forward in the grand review of the judgment! Forward!

Gracious and eternal God! On that day may it be found that we were all marching in the right regiment, and that we carried the right standard, and that we fought under the right commander; all heaven, some on amethystine battlement and others standing in shining gates, some on pearly shore and others in turreted heights, giving us the resounding million-voiced cheer: "To Him that overcometh." And our Commander and King, having reviewed the troops, all nations of heaven and earth will salute Him as the one who, standing so long in the sky with the sword of conquest stretched toward the earth, hath at last put it back with a mighty thrust and echoing clang into the sheath of universal victory.

A SLAVE CARAVAN IN THE SOUDAN.

THE inhuman brutality of the slave-dealers and slave-hunters of Africa has often formed the subject of indignant remark. Scarcely a visitor has stayed long enough in Egypt and the countries on its southern boundaries to see any- thing of their condition without being horrified by the cruelties inflicted on the miserable crea- tures captured, torn from their homes, and car- ried off to the slave markets.

The horrors of the journey to the river are depicted in the illustration. The captured wretches, yoked like oxen, are driven in gangs, without mercy for the old people and children. When Chinese Gordon was appointed Governor of the Soudan by Ismail, the former Khedive of Egypt, he spent much of his time in intercept- ing these convoys and liberating the captives.

"I smell slaves; look under those trees!" he exclaimed one morning to his secretary, as they rode along. "No," said the secretary; but the slaves were there all the same, crouched down in the long grass at the command of the rascally Bashi-Bazouks, who were driving them. The miscreants were stripped, beaten, and dis- missed. "It was only," says Gordon grimly, "the want of power and legality which prevent- ed them being now on their backs looking up at the skies, for I had every wish to shoot them." All the way along his march through the country he was releasing slaves whom he found being driven down; but the commerce continued of such dimensions as to prove it was only checked, not killed. "We must have caught," he said, "over two thousand in less than nine months, and I expect we did not catch one fifth of the caravans." At Edowa "a party of seven slave-dealers, with twenty-three slaves, were brought to me. Nothing could ex- ceed the misery of these poor wretches. Some were children not more than three years of age; they had come across that torrid zone from Shakka, a journey from which I, on my camel, shrank." In another letter he says: "Another caravan, with two slave-dealers and seventeen slaves, was brought in, and I hear others are on the way. Some of the poor creatures were naked."

General Gordon sometimes changed his posi- tion to one on the borders of the river, where he stopped and overhauled boats in which he found slaves packed as closely as herrings in a barrel, almost dying of thirst and lack of air. He de- vised many schemes to check the traffic, but they only availed while he was present to exe- cute them. The Khedive was not in earnest, and the officers and soldiers supplied to Gordon continually deceived him and connived at the escape of the caravans. It may be that Eng- land's interference in Egyptian affairs, and the difficulty she finds in keeping clear of responsi- bility in the Soudan, may be a part of God's plan to force her to undertake this duty. The Indian troops she has at command place her in a position to put down this unholy traffic as no other nation could do it, and when she forgets English "interests," and ceases to ask "What advantage or profit will English merchants and capitalists gain by the undertaking?" then she may learn that God has brought her to her commanding position in Egypt for such a time and such a work as this.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT THE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Praying Welsh Family.—At a Recent meeting Mr. Milles said: "When I was a young lad, newly come to the city, I lived in a boarding-house, to which there came a Welsh lady and gentleman, with their son, for the purpose of putting him to study at the University. I was very much struck when the landlady told me that the family of three persons retired to their own private parlor every morning, and at the noon-tide hour for prayer, besides their usual family worship at night. I looked upon them with awe, as being people who lived near to God."

A Fashionable Lady's Heaven.—"I knew a woman, sixty years of age, who even in her old age was the leader of fashion in her locality. She went to church once a week in compliance with public decorum, and if you asked her, 'Are you a Christian?' she would have replied, 'Yes, certainly, every one nowadays is a Christian.' Notwithstanding, she had no knowledge of God and His ways. When she came to die the minister who called spoke to her of heaven, but she stopped him with the words, 'I don't want to hear of any other heaven than this world; it has been heaven to me; I have enjoyed myself thoroughly in it. It has been a good world to me; I will hear of no other heaven.' And so she passed away, I will not say where to, but I have no hope of any one who is out of Christ."

Worth Picking up from the Gutter.—Mr. Simpson related: "A man was passing along the street and saw another man lying on the pavement helplessly drunk. The sober man went on about twenty yards, when the thought struck him, 'Would my Saviour pass that man, if He was in my place? No! He would not. I must help that poor man.' Going back, he raised the man to his feet, and gave him a rattle on the side of the head, saying, 'Wake up, man, and cry, Lord help me.' Three months after a minister called on the gentleman and inquired, 'Do you remember lifting a drunken man from the pavement some time since?' 'Yes, I do,' was the answer. 'Well, then,' said the minister, 'the other day I baptized him and admitted him to Church fellowship, and he is a useful servant of the Lord.'"

A Man Hammered for Three Months.—A member of the Mizpah band said: "It is about four and a half years since God showed Himself to me as a Saviour of sinners. Like so many young men, I went to places of amusement in the evening, but an inward feeling arose in my soul that I was going on the wrong lines, and I was drawn by more gracious influences to go to church and attend Gospel meetings, till at last I was asked to lead the praise at the mission meeting, even though I was unconverted. Thanks be to God, there was an earnest preacher, and every night he spoke it was as though a heavy hammer was beating on my heart. For three months I endured the pain, but one night I went home and threw myself at the feet of the Lord Jesus Christ, and raised a family altar for the first time in my house. I retired to bed, but not to sleep, for I never spent such a happy night in my life. I could not bear to sleep for very joy."

A Singular Talk with a Student.—Mr. Lee said: "I spoke to a student in the train one day. He told me that he was studying for the ministry. I inquired, 'Is your own soul saved, that you are studying how to engage in rescuing the souls of others?' 'My soul saved!' he answered. 'No, I have no time for that; I am too busy studying.' 'Young man! it seems to me that the first thing you have to do is to get your own soul saved, and then to study for the ministry,' I said. 'There is plenty of time for that, surely,' he replied. 'No, there is not; you do not know when death will come to you.' 'Oh, I am a young man, and will take my chance for that.' 'You are too busy to get your soul saved, but death comes to busy men, to young men, and to old men, and takes them whether they are busy or idle, young or old. If he comes to you, busy or not, you must go with him, and if you are unsaved you will be forever lost.' He gave me no answer, but when we came to the next station he left the carriage with a very red face, without saying 'good-by,' but I hope that now he has found the Saviour."

The Slave of a Drug.—Mr. Jack Said: "I Got a message from a Christian man who lived in the country. He is confined to his bed with a severe and, I fear, incurable disease. When he was first seized with the illness, the doctors prescribed one of the many extracts of laudanum, to be taken internally, to allay the sense of acute pain from which he suffered. This drug has gained such power over him that whenever the pain returns, he rushes to it for relief; and the worst of it is that the doctor now says, 'Unless you can stop taking that drug, you will be a self-murderer.' What is to be done? Prayer seems to have no power, for he has prayed, and I have prayed, but still he flies to it whenever the pain comes on. I promised to lay his case before Christian friends to ask their help on his behalf." Thousands are in bondage by this fatal drug, and are unable to deliver themselves. Many have, however, been emancipated through faith and prayer.

The Shadow in a Church.—At a Workers' meeting recently, the Rev. Mr. Mackay reported: "One Sunday night I saw a dark figure creeping into the shadow of the church. I did not at first know whether it was a human being or only a shadow, but on going up to the place I found a poor ill-dressed woman. I asked her, 'Will you not come in?' 'No,' she said, 'you are all well dressed in there.' 'You are mistaken,' I replied, 'this meeting is for those who are not well dressed, though if well-dressed folk come we can't refuse to let them in.' 'Well, I must do something, or go in somewhere to-night,' answered the woman. 'I got a tract to-day which so brought my sins before me, that I can't rest.' She was certainly in a fearful state of despair, and my feelings were much moved at seeing her distress. The address that evening just suited her, and she found peace that night through faith in Christ. I have visited her since, and her husband, who is a Roman Catholic, testifies that she is a changed and better woman."

A Soldier Arrested for Praying.—"On the evening prior to an engagement, some years ago, a soldier went away from the camp to find a quiet place for his usual prayer. As he was returning he was arrested for going outside the lines, and charged with being concerned in sending information to the enemy. In vain he explained the true purpose of his retirement. He was brought before the commanding officer, who asked the prisoner, 'What purpose took you outside the lines?' 'I went in order to have my stated season for prayer in quietness,' he answered; 'I pray for you, the other officers, my comrades in arms, and myself.' 'You had better pray now for yourself, for your time is short, and you will have no need of prayer soon.' The soldier knelt down, and in the prospect of immediate death prayed for his comrades, officers, friends, and for himself. When he rose, the colonel said, 'This man did not go out for an evil purpose. If he had not attended regularly at drill, he could not have made such an appearance on parade. Let him attend to his duty.'"

A Bather Saved from Drowning.—The Rev. Mr. Sloan said: "A poor man went to bathe in the sea at Musselburgh. Having gone beyond his depth, he was swept out to sea, and was in danger of being drowned. A gentleman, seeing the man's danger, took a boat and rescued him at the last moment. The man was almost insensible; the rescuer had nothing to revive him, and there was danger in allowing the man to lie unattended till the shore was reached. An idea struck him. Giving the man a good shake, he said, 'It is absolutely necessary that something be done to restore your circulation; I can do nothing. You must take the oar and pull the boat to shore.' The man feebly put forth what power he had to obey the command, and soon the blood began to flow faster and faster, till by the time they got to the beach he was thoroughly restored to his normal temperature. This is just what I commend to feeble and ailing Christians; begin to obey, engage in active service, and soon your heart will beat with a joy yet untasted, and you will become strong and vigorous in rescuing the perishing."

THE PERSONAL ANTICHRIST.

By Rev. A. R. Fausset.

AN ADDRESS DELIVERED ON MAY 15, AT THE SOUTH LONDON CONFERENCE ON THE RETURN OF OUR LORD.

I. Not Latent Antichristianity—The Many Antichrists—The Last Antichrist Distinct—Comes in his Own Name—II. Not Lawlessness in Mystery—The Coming Widespread Conspiracy—The Dispensation to Close in Unbelief—III. Not the Romish Church—Will be Unseated by the Beast—IV. Antichrist's Prime Minister—The Three Unclean Spirits—Origin of Each—V. Antichrist a Person—VI. The Signs of his Coming—VII. His Relation to the Jews—VIII. His Relation to the Church—IX. His Destruction.

HAS Antichrist yet come? Or have we still to expect his manifestation? If still future, is he to be a state or a person? Are there signs of his coming already visible in the world? And what shall be his relation to the Church, to the world, to the Jews, and to the second coming of our Lord? These are questions which can only be answered by appeal to the infallible Guide—the Holy Spirit in the written Word. May that blessed Spirit of truth lead us to a right judgment, while we examine the sure word of prophecy!

NOT ANTICHRISTIANITY.

I. Many believe that Antichrist has already come, and that the Romish apostasy realizes all the foretold features. But we must distinguish between the Antichristianity that is latent in the long ages of apostatizing Christendom and the patent antagonism to God of the last Antichrist. That latent Antichristianity answers to "the harlot;" this patent antagonism to Christ answers to the second "beast," ministering to the first beast of Rev. 13. Jesus foretells the former (Matt. 24: 5), "Many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ." But he emphatically distinguishes these many coming in Christ's name from the last Antichrist, who shall come in his own name. John 5: 23: "If another shall come in His own name, Him ye will receive."

It is the same apostle, John, who alone uses the name "Antichrist." His definition decides the question. 1 John 2: 22: "He that denieth that Jesus is the Christ; he is Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son." Like his Master, John distinguishes the many Antichrists of the Church from the one Antichrist of the last age. "For many deceivers are entered into the world, who confess not that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh. This is a deceiver and an Antichrist." An Antichrist has come in many past ages; as Cerinthus and the Gnostics in John's time, and Mahomet subsequently denying Jesus' Messiahship and Divinity. But these are not the Antichrist to come.

LAWLESSNESS REVEALED.

II. The adversary, antikeimenos, in Paul's II Thess. 2: 1–12 answers in sound and sense to John's Antichristos. He too "opposeth all that is called God or that is worshipped. So that he as God sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God." The Pope as God does sit in God's temple, claiming God's exclusive prerogative of infallibility; but it is in God's name he does it, and not as "opposing all that is called God. "The mystery of lawlessness" was working in Paul's days (II Thess. 2: 7, 8), and has been for 1800 years; but the "revelation" of "the lawless one," "the man of sin," "the son of perdition" (the designation given only to the two persons, Judas and Antichrist), is reserved for the last short days which precede the Lord's "destroying him with the brightness of His coming."

The "falling away first" (II Thess. 2 : 3, 9) precedes the revelation of the man of sin, "whose coming is after the working of Satan with all power, signs, and lying wonders." The mediæval apostasy of Rome and the Greek churches answers to the "lawlessness in mystery." But Holy Writ plainly indicates that just before the Son of man shall come to take His great power, and bring under law the disordered world, there shall be of the people and their rulers "against the Lord and against His anointed." Our Lord Himself foretells the same lawlessness; and that its result will be that waning of love which is to be characteristic of the Laodicean or last age of the Church. "Because lawlessness shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold" (Matt. 24 : 12). The culmination of this rebellion against law and God, the Lawgiver, shall be under Antichrist fully revealed, after the elect Church has been translated. Luke 18 : 8: "When the Son of man cometh, shall He find faith on the earth?" This plainly implies that the close of this dispensation, like that of the Jewish dispensation, shall be in unbelief.

Similarly in 1 Tim. 4: the earlier stage of lawlessness, namely, while it is in mystery, is depicted: "The Spirit speaketh expressly that in the latter times some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing demons, forbidding to marry, and commanding to abstain from meats, which God hath created to be received with thanksgiving." Here the mediæval apostasy is plainly indicted. But in the later Epistle, II Tim. 3: mark the change from "latter" to "last," and from "times" to "days." "In the last days perilous times shall come.

The features here are no longer those of lawlessness in mystery, but of lawlessness on the verge of being openly revealed. Especially will this appear from comparing this list with the sins of Pagans detailed in Rom. 1, which, in a singular degree, correspond. In a word, the last days will be a relapse from God to Paganism, from Christianity to Antichristianity. The unclean spirit of Pagan idolatry and sorcery, cast out once by early Christianity, and again at the Reformation, shall return with sevenfold more wicked spirits, and the last state shall be worse than the first (Luke 11 : 24–26).

III. Herein lies the difference between the harlot and the beast; and on this difference hinges the whole question or is Antichrist yet to be revealed? Woman, or wife, is the Scripture image of the relation of the Church to Christ. Woman, like man, bears the image of God in which she was made. But when seduced by the world's pleasures, riches, and ambitions, she proves false to her heavenly Husband, she is called "the great whore" (Rev. 17). The key to the meaning is Isa. 1 : 21, "How is the faithful city become an harlot;" i. e., Jerusalem the holy is become "Babylon the great." She "sits upon the scarlet colored beast," herself assimilated to it in being "arrayed in scarlet color." In short, the Church, instead of witnessing for God against the world which ignores Him, rests on the world.

Yet she is not the beast. She was made in God's own image; the beast never was so. She raises her head toward heaven; the beast, however strong physically, grovels with face earthward. In a word, the Church, however apostate, still owns God and His Christ in nominal profession; the godless world-power's allegiance, on the contrary, is to Satan, the prince of this world, himself of bestial nature, being the old "serpent, the most subtle of the beasts of the field" (Gen. 3 : 1). Mark now the consequence: if the Romish Church be in part or wholly the harlot, then she is not the beast; and vice versâ. That she is the prominent representative of the harlot is certain, when we consider her idolatries and gross worldliness, and persecutions of the saints. Then she cannot be also the beast. Nay, she is in the end.

And not the Romish Church only, but all apostate Christendom; for, as the whole Church is the woman in her first love uncorrupted (Rev. 12), so Babylon the harlot must be the whole faithless Church of both Old and New Testament. Hence too the same is alleged of her in Rev. 18 : 24, as our Lord alleges of the whole apostate Jewish Church—that "in her was found the blood of all that were slain upon the earth."

God's principle of righteous retribution on her, accordingly, is, as the world was the instrument of her sin, so shall it be the instrument of her punishment. Rev. 17 : 16: "The ten horns upon the beast shall hate the whore, and make her desolate, and shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire."

ANTICHRIST'S PRIME MINISTER.

IV. Then, and not till then, the second beast coming up out of the earth (Rev. 13 : 11) (i. e., out of society consolidated with earthly culture), the last Antichrist, brings back the paganism of the first beast on which the whore had sat, and recommends it by a spiritual form. The second beast is identified in Rev. 19 : 20 with "the false prophet" who did miracles before the first beast to deceive men into worshipping the image of the first beast (13 : 13, 14). Our Lord foretells (Matt. 24 : 24), "False Christs and false prophets shall show great signs, insomuch that, if it were possible, they shall deceive the elect." St. Paul said (II Thess. 2 : 9), that "the lawless one's coming is after the working of Satan with all power and signs and lying wonders." And St. John (Rev. 16 : 13, 14) said that "three unclean spirits came out of the mouth of the dragon, and out of the mouth of the beast, and out of the mouth of the false prophet; for they are the spirits of demons, working miracles, which go forth unto the kings of the earth, and of the whole world, to gather them to the war of that great day of God Almighty."

Infidelity is the unclean spirit from the dragon Satan, lawlessness from the beast, and false spiritualism from the false prophet. Rev. 19 : 20; 22 : 15). When the apostate church is cast off by the beast or world, as men cannot do without some spiritual worship, however untrue, the false prophet, the last Antichrist, meets their want, and takes the place of the discarded apostate church (Rev. 13). As "patience" was the believer's need to overcome the long-continuing first beast, so "wisdom" is our need against the second beast.

ANTICHRIST A PERSON.

V. World-principles generally culminate in a person; so the world-conforming principles of apostate Judaism issued in the Old Testament Antichrist, Antiochus Epiphanes, who set up the idol Jupiter in the temple of Jehovah at Jerusalem and persecuted all who would not conform to the state idolatry.

SIGNS OF ANTICHRIST'S COMING.

VI. The signs of our times warn us that the last Antichrist's manifestation cannot be far off. Never was infidelity, the dragon's lie, so rampant. Evolution without the Divine Evolver; matter alleged to be the potential mother of life and mind; God denied alike in nature and in revelation; the higher criticism undermining the authority of Holy Scripture within the Church, and the world-philosophers from without utterly repudiating it; the Lord's coming in the past, and in the future ignored by multitudes. Then Nihilism, Communism, Positivism, Dynamitism, and mobocracy indicate the growing antipathy to all law. While Spiritualism already alleges its necromantic miracles, which seem ominous of some coming false prophet's lying signs.

HIS RELATION TO THE JEWS.

VII. But what is the relation of Antichrist to the Jews? Besides the little horn of the fourth kingdom, which answers to the first beast ridden upon by the harlot, and which is mentioned in Dan. 7, there is the little horn of the third kingdom (Dan. 8), which is associated especially with the Jews; indeed, it is significant that Dan. 2 and 7 are in Chaldee, the language of the Gentiles, but 8, 11, and 12 in Hebrew, the language of the Jews. Antiochus Epiphanes, the Old Testament Antichrist, is portrayed in Dan. 11 in minute detail. But language is there used which shows that the final and exhaustive fulfilment is yet future, for the coming king is to corrupt by flatteries such as do wickedly against the covenant, and to do according to his will, and like the lawless one of II Thess. 2, to "exalt himself above every god, and speak marvellous things against the God of gods." In Dan. 9 : 27 also a "prince" is mentioned who "shall confirm the covenant with many for one week, and in the midst of the week cause the sacrifice to cease."

Blessed be God, the oppression of Israel by Antichrist, though terrible, shall be brief; the ten kings whom Antichrist seduces receive power only for one mystical hour with the beast (Rev. 17 : 12). From the first he is doomed to perdition, and therefore called "the son of perdition" (Rev. 17). "He shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain; yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him" (Dan. 11 : 45). "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it: it is even the time of Jacob's trouble; but he shall be saved out of it" (Jer. 30 : 7).

HIS RELATION TO THE CHURCH.

VIII. What is Antichrist's relation to the Church, and to the world, and to the Lord's second coming? Already the beast or world-power is more and more throwing off the apostate church which has ridden upon it, in those once priest-ridden countries, Austria, France, Spain, and even Rome itself. In Protestant countries also governments and peoples are less and less under the authority of the external Church. When the world has completely got rid of its sham profession of Christianity, then will Antichrist be revealed. The pure Church, the Lamb's Bride, known to God amid hollow professors, will then be ready for her translation. She may suffer, or not, in the early part of Antichrist's persecutions of the elect Jews. But she shall be caught up to her Lord directly after Antichrist's "gathering his hosts to the war of that great day of the Lord," and before his gathering them together to Armageddon to the actual field. For between the two points the gathering of the ten kings of the whole world to the war in verse 14 of Rev. 16, and the gathering them to Armageddon in verse 16, stands verse 15: "Behold I come as a thief; blessed is he that watcheth and keepeth his garments."

HIS DESTRUCTION.

IX. Yes, believing brethren, ye who "watch and pray always" shall be "counted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." When Antichrist gathers the kings of the earth and their armies, the Lord Christ gathers His saints, "they that are with Him are called, and chosen, and faithful" (Rev. 17 : 14); with them He inflicts the blow which decides that the beast, the false prophet, and then Satan himself, are to cease oppressing this earth. "The Lord shall destroy Antichrist with the brightness of His coming" (II Thess. 2 : 8). "I will encamp about mine house (the restored temple) because of the army"—that of Antichrist usurping God's place in God's temple (Zech. 9 : 8), and slaying Christ's two witnesses then at Jerusalem (Rev. 11). He whose right it is shall take the kingdom as His own. With Him shall reign His saints over the world, just because they gained "the victory that overcometh the world, even our faith" (1 John 5 : 4). Believers would not accept the world kingdom at Satan's hands; therefore they shall have it at Jesus' hands. Having such glorious hopes, and seeing that the predicted signs are "beginning to come to pass, lift up your heads, for your redemption draweth nigh" (Luke 21 : 28).

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Nominations for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency made last Friday by the National Republican Convention are probably now known to all our readers. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD last week defined its attitude on this subject, and now that the candidates have been nominated, it sees no reason to qualify or withdraw any remark then made. The convention having nominated the candidates, it will be for the people to decide whether they are men fit for the highest places in their gift. There is less difficulty than usual in doing this, because of the abundance of material accessible for forming a judgment on their record. Both statesmen have been prominent in public life for more than twenty years, and their characters and achievements are well known. Nevertheless, men will come to different conclusions on the subject, and in doing so may, on both sides, be acting conscientiously. This is a matter for the individual conscience to decide, and it will be well for every citizen to refrain from pledging himself until he has given the subject a careful and prayerful consideration.

The Republican National Convention Assembled in Chicago on Tuesday, June 3d. The first struggle was on the election of temporary chairman. The National Committee nominated for the office General Powell Clayton, of Arkansas. The nomination was supported by the Blaine section, but opposed by a combination of Arthur and Edmunds men, who succeeded in electing instead ex-Congressman John R. Lynch, of Mississippi, a colored man. The vote was 430 to 388. The convention on Wednesday elected, without opposition, as permanent chairman, General John B. Henderson, of Missouri. On Thursday the platform was adopted. Its utterances are, as usual, somewhat vague, and show how little difference exists today between the Republican and Democratic parties. As to the tariff, it demands that duties shall be levied, not for revenue only, but so as to afford security for our diversified industries and protection for wages and capital. It demands a heavier duty on foreign wool. As to the currency, it commends "the best money," but does not state its idea of what the best money is. It favors the establishment of a national bureau of labor, the enforcement of the eight-hour law, denounces the importation of contract labor from Europe or Asia, is opposed to land grants to corporations and non-resident aliens, and advocates liberal pensions. Neither female suffrage nor Prohibition finds a place among the planks. On Friday balloting was commenced. The first ballot gave Blaine 334½; Arthur, 278; Edmunds, 93; Logan, 63½; John Sherman, 30; Hawley, 13; Lincoln, 4; General Sherman, 2. Two more ballots were taken, and Blaine's strength increased to 375. On the fourth ballot Illinois cast 34 Logan votes for Blaine, and there was a general break for the Maine candidate, who received 541 votes, 130 more than were necessary for a choice. In the evening Senator John A. Logan, of Illinois, was nominated Vice-President by acclamation.

Only a Brief Summary of the Events in the lives of the two candidates is necessary in the case of men so well known. James Gillespie Blaine was born January 31st, 1830, at Union Township, Washington County, Pennsylvania. At the age of twelve he was sent to Washington College, where he graduated with honor in 1847. He taught school at Frankfort, Ky., after leaving college. There he first met the lady whom he afterward married. She was a Maine lady, and by her advice the young professor went to Maine, settling at Augusta, where he was married. He became assistant editor of the Kennebec Journal, and took an active part in politics, and was elected to the State Legislature in 1858, and was chosen Speaker in 1860 and 1861. In 1862 he was elected to the Thirty-eighth Congress from the Kennebec District. The same constituency successively re-elected him, and in 1869 he was chosen Speaker of the House of Representatives, and was re-elected two succeeding terms. In 1876 Mr. Blaine was elected to the Senate, resigning in 1881 to enter President Garfield's Cabinet as Secretary of State. John A. Logan, the candidate for the Vice-Presidency, was born in Jackson County, Illinois, on February 9th, 1826. He served in the Mexican War with distinction, and at its conclusion commenced the study of law, gaining admission to the bar in 1851. He was elected to the State Legislature as a Democrat in 1852, and in 1856 was a Presidential elector on the Buchanan ticket. In 1858 Mr. Logan entered Congress. He was re-elected in 1860, but resigned to take part in the war. He joined as a volunteer, but rose to the rank of brigadier-general, with command of the Army of the Tennessee, and took an important part in the chief engagements. At the close of the war he returned to the House, and served there until his election to the Senate in 1871. He was re-elected in 1879.

The Political Firmament is Lurid with the portents of a coming storm. The nomination of Mr. Blaine has divided the Republican party especially in New York into two angry sections. The animosity awakened in 1872 was trifling compared with the passion that now agitates the party. On the one side is the majority, enthusiastic for a leader of conspicuous ability, splendid talents, and genial manners. On the other is the minority, loathing the candidate under whose banner they are invited to march. The majority finds in Mr. Blaine its ideal chieftain, in whom it has unbounded confidence. He is precisely the man to awaken such enthusiasm. There is nothing cold or colorless about him. He is a leader about whom men cannot be indifferent. Those who come in contact with him are moved to ardent admiration or goaded into fierce antagonism, and both effects the nomination has intensified. Whether it was wise to nominate a man who would thus cleave the party in twain in the face of its foe, rather than one who would unite it, the Republican majority appears likely to have an opportunity of finding out. History shows us that when the day of battle comes, Republicans are apt to forget personal dislikes, smother their resentment, and fall into line. The Convention, when it nominated Mr. Blaine, probably expected that this would happen again; but appearances this time are against that expectation. Republicans who love their party may object to the policy and political creed of a candidate chosen by a convention, but he may give such explanations and pledges as will induce them to support him, for the sake of the party. But the difficulty with Mr. Blaine's antagonists is of a different kind. It is one that explanations and pledges are not likely to remove. Those who are opposed to Mr. Blaine as a candidate for the Presidency, say that they are so on ethical grounds. They allege that he is morally corrupt; that when he was Speaker of the House he used his position and influence in the interest of corporations, and accepted from them rewards for his services; that since that time he has consorted with men of character so vile as to tarnish that of any man who associated with them; that his whole public career proves him to be a man destitute of honor and conscience, whose nomination is a disgrace to the party, and whose election would be a disgrace to the nation. Having stated in language so emphatic objections so weighty, they are little likely to fall into line and vote for the candidate. Some of them declare they will vote for the Democratic candidate, others that they will not vote at all, while others again urge the nomination of a second Republican candidate of unblemished reputation, who, though he could not be elected, would, by his candidacy, afford an opportunity for Anti-Blaine Republicans to vote in a way that would clearly express their principles, which would not be done if they refrained from voting, or voted for a Democrat. The situation is a remarkable one, and dispassionate observers will watch its development with no ordinary interest.

The Attempt to Repeal the Civil Service Reform law has received a check from the House Committee on that Department. The committee last week presented a unanimous report against the proposed repeal. The report, after describing the evils of patronage and the spoils system, for which it holds both parties responsible, states that the law has done much toward uprooting them. It closes with the following emphatic remark: "Your committee, entirely satisfied with the thorough, conscientious, and non-partisan work of the Civil Service Commission, are justified in the belief that its continuance will aid in a large degree in eradicating the prevalent evils of the civil service of the Government." The committee is composed of eight Democrats and five Republicans.

The New York State Prohibition Convention will be held in Albany on July 8th. The convention will nominate candidates for the two vacant seats of Associate Judges in the Court of Appeals, and choose seven delegates-at-large to the National Convention, to be held at Pittsburg, Pa., on July 23d. It may be hoped that the latter convention will be rightly guided in its nominations. The present disorganized condition of the Republican party renders it possible that a wise nomination would bring a large accession of strength to the Prohibition ticket. The deplorable blunder of 1880 should not be repeated while so many unobjectionable candidates may be found among Prohibitionists.

The Temperance Victory at Orangetown, N. Y., is already bearing fruit. The commissioners have refused to grant any licenses except to four hotels—two in Nyack, one in Piermont, and one in Sparkhill. Not a single ale or beer or grocers' license has been granted, and the lager-beer dealers are greatly excited. Those whose applications were rejected threatened to sell any way, and a large sum of money has been subscribed by them for the contest. The Law and Order Association is firm in its determination to see that the law is complied with, and has also a large sum of money subscribed.

A Valuable Law, which Should Clear the streets of New York of some of their obscene exhibitions, is now in force. It makes it a misdemeanor to sell, give away, exhibit, or offer for sale to any minor, any book, newspaper, pamphlet, or other publication principally made up of criminal news, police reports, or who shall exhibit such publications within the view of any such minor.

A Conscientious Printing Company in New Jersey has taken a decided stand on the liquor question. The Crump Label Company, of Montclair, N. J., has issued a notice that it will print no more labels for liquor dealers. One of the directors thus explains its attitude: "We employ between 300 and 400 hands, and there are not more than half a dozen of the men who have not signed the temperance pledge. Some of them were hard drinkers. When the present temperance-awakening struck Montclair, and our men began to feel its influence, we felt as though the company ought to do something too. A company can't take the pledge, but this company could show its desire to be with the men by refusing to work for the liquor trades. So its president, Samuel Crump, promised for the company that no more work of that kind should be taken. We have been making for one liquor firm about 10,000,000 labels a year. About $20,000 worth of business a year is what this decision will cost the company."

Delegates from Young Men's Christian Associations in the United States or Dominion of Canada to the World's Conference of Y. M. C. A.'s at Berlin, in August next, may obtain credentials from the International Committee in New York by getting their State or Provincial Committee to nominate them as a representative from such State or Province, and having the secretary of the committee notify the International Committee when such nomination is made.

A New Building in the Bowery, New York city, is to be erected by the Young Men's Christian Association between Spring and Houston streets. It is to be four stories in height, and will be of brick, with stone trimmings. It will have a frontage of fifty feet. It will contain a reading-room, library, gymnasium, bowling-alley, class-rooms for instruction during the fall and winter evenings, and a hall for lectures and entertainments. Provisions will also be made for other purposes of a practical nature. The cost is estimated to be about $50,000, a large portion of which has already been raised.

Mr. E. W. Bliss Recently Closed a Successful series of services at Atlanta, Ga. During the two months the mission covered, the interest continued to increase, and the services were honored of God by the conversion of large numbers of sinners, some of whom were once leaders in opposition to the truth. Letters received from Atlanta, and incidents published in the local journals, prove that the visit of Mr. Bliss has been the means of reviving the Lord's work in all the churches of the city.

The Effort to Transfer the Maine Law from the statute book to the Constitution, which is to be made in September, is already agitating the whole State. Repeated statements have been made that the law has been a failure, but Rev. S. W. Adriance, who has lived there some time, avers that it has proved a success. He writes: "As for myself, having lived many years in States having the best form of license laws, the change to absolute prohibition in Maine is striking and agreeable. The villages and townships throughout the whole State are wonderfuly free from the traffic. In the old days, before the Maine Law came into effect, all these had their hotels and corner stores. Take the State through, it is a vast success. On none of the respectable streets, even of Portland (which presents the greatest facility for smuggling) is there a single rum-shop, open or secret. Liquor dealers in other States regularly send quantities of liquor by express, in all kinds of shape, to assumed names at stations all along the lines, and then write letters to known sympathizers telling them to call for it. Sometimes it is sent in trunks, then in dry-goods boxes; but the constables, sheriffs, police, etc., again and again have seized these and turned their contents into the gutter."

Temperance Work in Colorado is Rapidly tending in the direction of absolute prohibition. A correspondent of the Observer writing from Pueblo last week says: "A law and order society, composed of members of both political parties, recently organized work on a direct prohibition basis. As a result, the saloon-keepers and their friends organized 'The Citizens' Protective Union,' and made up a ticket by indorsing the pronounced whiskey men on each political ticket. Only one man named by the saloon-keepers was elected. Eight men, or one half the council, were chosen as pledged prohibitionists or pronounced for high license. This movement was led by Dr. Hays, of the Central Presbyterian Church, supported by the ministers and Christian people of the city. At Colorado Springs, which is a temperance town of six thousand people, the whiskey men made a strong effort to gain control of the city government. Prohibition was the only issue. The result of the election is the total defeat of every one nominated by the whiskey men. This is the beginning of the end, which will be constitutional prohibition in Colorado."

Artificial Beauty was Exposed by a Visit to a mineral spring as related by one of the party. A lady with a number of friends visited Avon Springs, N. Y. As they sat around the spring drinking the waters, her face was observed to undergo a remarkable change. She was noted for the beauty of her complexion, but now it assumed a mottled appearance; large patches of a dark shade resembling the discoloration produced by a blow appeared on her cheeks and neck, and the skin surrounding the marks turned to a ghastly gray hue. Her friends became alarmed, and summoned a physician, though she insisted that she was perfectly well. On the physician's arrival the phenomenon was explained. The young lady had applied a preparation to her face to give brilliance to her complexion, and the air, impregnated with the sulphur of the springs, had changed the effect of its ingredients, thus producing the disfigurement. There are many people whose real character will one day be similarly revealed. Now "they deceive every one his neighbor," pretending to be sincere Christians; but God says, "behold I will melt them and try them" (Jer. 9: 5-7).

Smoking a Pipe on a Keg of Powder Resulted in the death of the smoker and the destruction of his home a few days ago. The Cleveland Leader thus describes the occurrence: "About a month ago a miner left a keg in the house of Thomas Murrins, near Coalburg, promising to call for it soon. The keg had been so long about the house that the dangerous nature of its contents was forgotten. Murrins came home this evening, and, lighting his pipe, sat down on the keg. His wife and child were in the next room, and the woman saw a blinding blaze of light, and felt herself hurled violently away. The powder had exploded in some way, tearing Murrins to pieces, utterly demolishing the house, and blowing the woman and child a distance of fifteen feet, badly burning both. Neighboring houses had their windows broken by the shock, and the community was much agitated by the accident. It is thought the child cannot live." Murrins must have been either a very forgetful or a very reckless man. The consequences of his act would have been the same in either case. The degrees of criminality vary, but men have to bear the natural results of their misdeeds, whether they are committed intentionally or thoughtlessly. Many men who would be too prudent to imperil their lives so recklessly, are with more culpable temerity risking their souls. Thoughtlessness and carelessness are carrying thousands to their doom (Ps. 50: 22).

CYPRUS was by no means a reputable island; it was devoted to the goddess Venus, and you can imagine what her worship was, and what would be the fruitful licentiousness which sprang of it. It was the native country of Barnabas, and as he was at first the leader of the missionary party sent out by the church of Antioch, it was fit that Barnabas and Saul should begin preaching there. Landing at one end of the island the two apostolic men traversed it till they came to Paphos, where the Roman governor resided. Now, this Paphos was the central city of and was the scene of frequent profligate processions and abominable rites. We might call it "the place where Satan's seat is." Athanasius styled its religion "the deification of lust." Neither men nor women could resort to the shrine of Venus without being defiled in mind and depraved in character. Yet it was no business of the apostles to stop away either from Cyprus or Paphos because they were the resorts of the gay and vicious; but the rather there was a special need for them to go thither with the purifying waters of the Gospel. The more wicked the locality the more need for Christian effort in that very spot.

Moreover, the Holy Ghost had sent the missionaries to Cyprus, and therefore they might safely enter the caverns of dark obscenity, and proclaim the word of salvation among the openly abandoned. Nor need they fear of success, for publicans and harlots have frequently been known to enter the kingdom before self-righteous Pharisees. Even the vilest of open sin is not so hard to deal with as a proud heart, which abhors the doctrine of the cross because of its humbling character. Let us not refuse to plough up any kind of soil; great harvests come from broken rocks.

Happily for the two servants of the Lord, God had prepared their way as He prepares the way of all His servants; for whenever He sends a sower forth to sow, albeit that a part of the land which he sows may be rock, or trodden path, yet there is always a portion which is

PLOUGHED BEFORE THE SOWER COMES.

God has a prepared people wherever He sends a minister to gather them in. He doth not mock us by sending us upon fruitless errands. If He bids Philip go down to the way which leads from Jerusalem to Gaza, which is desert, Philip does not find it a desert spiritually, for there he gathers one of the sweetest flowers that ever bloomed in the garden of the Lord. So now, when Barnabas and Saul come to Paphos it shall not be to break their hearts over the filthiness and obscenity of its idol worship, but to find for the Lord a jewel amid the mire.

The chief magistrate of the island was a candid, studious, prudent man; he possessed an intelligent and inquisitive spirit, and was desirous to know all that could be known. Pliny mentioned him among the authors from whom he quoted. This man was anxious to discover the truth if it could be discovered; he had said with Pilate, but not as Pilate, "What is truth?"

A certain Jew who was expert in the dark learning of the East, and practised sorcery, had obtained considerable influence over this ruler, whose name was Sergius Paul ; but instead of teaching him the truth this false-hearted Jew imparted to him the mysteries of the Magi and the superstitions of sorcery. Bar-jesus was this mountebank's Jewish name, but he was false to it, for he was no son of Jesus, but one of a generation of vipers. Sergius Paul hearing that there were other Eastern teachers in the island, and being dissatisfied with the teaching of Elymas, sent for Barnabas and Saul to teach him the Word of God. What a door of hope for this prudent man ! What a splendid opening for the two preachers of Christ !

I. Notice first

OPPOSITION TO THE FAITH.

The missionaries were not to have it all their own way ; Bar-jesus, who was also called Elymas, "withstood them, seeking to turn away the deputy from the faith." As Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses when he commenced his mission, so this Jew Bar-jesus opposed himself to the ministers of Christ. In some respects opposition to the Gospel is to be much deplored. To oppose truth when it is seen to be truth, and to shut the eyes to light when it is admitted to be light, is a heinous offence against the God of truth, and He will certainly avenge it. Let us pity with all our hearts the men who oppose the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the more so because we believe that in some instances they know better, and are violating conscience by their opposition.

If half the noise that has been made in this country against certain infidels for wishing to exercise the rights of English citizens had been spent in prayer for their conversion, it would have been a more profitable use of zeal, and would have been far more likely to bring down a blessing upon the nation. We are too apt to ban and curse antagonists, instead of pitying and praying for them. It is not yours and mine to shut the door in any man's face, however depraved he may be ; but still to stand and entreat him to come to the Saviour, regarding even the judgments of God which fall upon him as meant to last only for a season, and intended to lead him to repentance ; for this is the usual design of the chastenings of this life.

But I further notice that opposition is eminently overruled for good, and therefore it would be unbecoming in us to lament it or dread it. We may not think so much of opposition as to yield to it so far as to cease our testimony, or tone it down, or omit a portion of it. The Apostle Paul, when speaking of a place where he hoped for great success, said a great and effectual door was opened to him, and there were many adversaries (1 Cor. 16 : 9). It would seem that the second sentence was as good as the first. Wherever there is likely to be great success, the open door and the opposing adversaries will both be found. If there are no adversaries, you may fear that there will be no success. A boy cannot get his kite up without wind, nor without a wind which drives against his kite. A contrary wind does much more for us than we suppose. Adversaries advertise the Gospel, and so spread it. Opposing work, although in itself evil, is wondrously overruled by God for the best purposes ; since persecution often arouses natural sympathy, and this becomes a ladder by which love climbs up into the heart.

The devil is growing a little wiser than he used to be ; but he still remains a fool ; for if he looked back over his own history, he would see that he has been the means of spreading the Gospel by the attacks which he has made upon it. "Divide and conquer," said Satan ; he divided, but he did not conquer. His raging winds carry far afield the precious seed of divine truth ; every tempest that he raises speeds onward the barque of the Church. Now, see ! Saul of Tarsus desires to preach and tell Sergius Paul about the eternal truth, and Elymas must needs interpose. "What good could that be?" cries one. "How can that be overruled?" It was overruled ; the Lord made the wrath of man to praise Him, and brought to nothing the subtlety of Elymas.

In all probability the opposition of Bar-jesus may have called the attention of Sergius Paul more intently to the doctrine of the Word of God. When a certain doctrine is neglected and half forgotten by the Church of God there rises up a bold heretic who rails at the truth most bitterly, and then Christian people remember it, defend it, and propagate it. But this man's opposition was overruled further, for when Saul looked at him and pronounced upon him the solemn judgment of God, namely that he should be blind and should not see the sun for a season, then the proconsul saw what power attended the word of the Lord, and how truly it came forth from the Almighty. God by that solemn judgment set His seal to the truth and let all men know that it could not be reviled without the most solemn hazard to the opposer. Blinded Elymas seeking some to lead him by the hand was a visile witness for the truth against which he had fought. His sightless eyeballs were a just judgment from God. He had shut the eyes of his mind to the truth, and the Lord justly closed the eyes of his body ; as he groped for the wall he was against his will a most convincing witness to the truth of the Gospel, and of the divine commission of Barnabas and Saul.

Depend upon it the Lord will yet baffle all opposers and He will establish His truth above all the traditions of men, His adversaries themselves being judges. Out of their own mouths will He condemn His enemies. He will so confound and confuse that their blindness shall bear evidence to the light of His Word, which blinds the proud and self-sufficient. Men will again see how 'professing themselves to be wise, they became fools." Manifestly even before the eyes of the unlearned it has happened, and will happen again that learned sceptics will give vent to sheer folly, and become the victims of childish credulity till men shake them off and say—"They are not the wise men we thought they were, and the old-fashioned Gospel which they set themselves to overthrow is better than their vaunted discoveries." So may it be right speedily.

Moreover, this Elymas by his overthrow made the victory of Christ to be the more conspicuous. Sergius Paul was one of the great ones of the earth, for those days comparable to a king, and when he believed, it was a noble gain to the cause. A chamberlain of the queen of Ethiopia had believed before him, but as not many great men, not many mighty are chosen, the conversion of the Proconsul of Cyprus was a great triumph for the Gospel. It is noteworthy that from this point Saul of Tarsus is called Paul, and we read no more of Barnabas and Saul, but of Paul and Barnabas. If Saul had assumed the name of Paul from this memorable conversion it would not have been an unworthy act, for his joy at the winning of Sergius Paul might fitly have expressed itself in a fashion suggested by a common custom among Romans. It is very singular, but from this moment we do not find him called Saul except when he is telling the story of his conversion and necessarily uses his old name. Luke in the Acts of the Apostles henceforth calls him Paul ; and that name must often have cheered the suffering apostle ; when he was persecuted he would remember his own namesake, the Roman proconsul whom he had brought to the feet of Jesus. Courage then, brothers and sisters, whenever you are trying to serve your Lord ; if you are assailed, take heart and hope that a great victory is near. The devil would let you alone if you were doing nothing of any consequence against his kingdom. If he could forsee your defeat, he has plenty to do, and therefore he would spend his strength elsewhere ; but as he fears you he assails you. If you were a mere official he would let you go on with your rigmarole ; but since he sees you to be a living servant of the Lord he raises up an Elymas, with smooth and slippery tongue, to speak against you.

A SUGGESTIVE TABLEAU.

This opposition must have been to Paul very instructive, for it was symbolic of the future. It seemed hard to teach this man, this Hebrew of the Hebrews, of the tribe of Benjamin, as touching the law a Pharisee, that he was sent to preach to the Gentiles, for even when he went to Cyprus he and Barnabas kept pretty much to Israel, preaching the Word of God in the synagogues of the Jews ; but now he is to have an object lesson, which will show him his full career as in a living parable. Jew and Gentile are both before him. The Jew Elymas is opposing with the bitterest venom—true picture of his race. Sergius Paulus, the Gentile, listens with most prudent attention, candidly weighing everything, and at last he believes : thus has it been with many of the Gentiles. The chosen of God among the Gentiles accept that which the Jews refuse.

When Elymas was struck with blindness what a sorrowful picture he was of that blindness which has fallen upon Israel ! "Blindness in part," saith Paul, "is happened to Israel," and so it happened unto Elymas ; "Thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season." That word, "for a season," is a door of hope, for as the day came when Elymas could again behold the sun, so the day cometh when the blindness shall be taken from the heart of Israel, and the seed of Jacob shall look on him whom they have pierced. The scene before us is a tableau of the whole history of the Christian church in its relation to Jew and Gentile.

II. We have done with the opposition ; now let us consider certain aids to faith. Sergius Paul, "when he saw what was done, believed, being astonished at the doctrine of the Lord." Kindly notice the words I have selected for a heading to this second part of my discourse—"aids to faith." I have not called miracles causes of faith, for they do not cause it, although they may lead up to it.

WHAT SERGIUS PAULUS SAW

did not make him believe, but it helped him to believe. What did he see then ? He saw what was done.

First, he saw the great courage of Paul. In another case boldness struck a blow at unbelief, for when the rulers saw the boldness of Peter and John, and perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men, they marvelled. In this case the effect would be the same. That despised and persecuted Jew, Saul of Tarsus, fixed his eyes on Elymas as though he were perfectly master of the situation—as indeed he was—and without hesitation or apology addressed him, "O full of all subtlety and all mischief, thou child of the devil, thou enemy of all righteousness, wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord?" What made Paul bear himself so bravely ? What had given courage to this otherwise retiring individual to come into the front and speak like a hero, as he was ? Intense conviction on the mind of Paul led him to speak thus plainly, sternly, and even indignantly ; and we are sure that he did not err in so doing, since his warmth was not the heat of his own spirit, but the fire of the Spirit of God, for we read that he was filled with the Holy Ghost. Let every teacher of Christ be thus filled, and then let him speak boldly as he ought to speak.

THE MIRACLE.

It must have been an aid to Sergius Paul's faith to have seen the dauntless outspokenness of the greater Paul ; but when he saw Elymas blinded, that gave a further impulse to him. When God works in judgments among the sons of men many are astonished, and inclined to hear what this Word may be which bears so solemn a seal from the God of judgment. O sirs, I would to God that some of you who have seen men die in their sins would be warned by what you have seen. He that will go to the hospital with his eyes open, or perhaps even call upon his next-door neighbor when his sins have come home to him, may see what sin can do even upon the outward fabric of our manhood. What it can do upon the soul can be guessed from the ruin which it brings upon the body. He that has once seen the bane will long to know the antidote. He that has smarted under the curse of sin will be anxious to learn the way by which the plague can be stayed, and men can be made anew in the image of God.

But if God's judgments and wonders are aids to faith, what shall I say of His wonders of mercy? Blessed be His name, these are much more common, and can be much more easily seen. I cannot show you to-day a man blinded because he refused the Gospel; but I can show you a great many whose eyes have been opened by receiving the Gospel. I for one can say, "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see;" what I could not understand is now clear to me; what I could not receive has now stamped itself upon my very being, to my heart's intense joy. I know, brothers and sisters, that thousands of you could rise if I were to ask you to testify that the Lord has renewed you in the spirit of your minds, and has brought you into spiritual life, light, and liberty. Glory be to God for it!

It ought to be a great help to inquiring minds when they see numerous conversions all around them, for conversions are the standing miracles of the Gospel, and if any man will only look into them, and consider them awhile, he will perceive that they are the truth can have. Evidently there is a singular power in the Gospel which is not to be found anywhere else. What is this power? Whence comes it? Could it go with a falsehood? We have seen the Gospel produce a singular revolution in a man—not a reformation merely, but a far deeper change, a new birth, a complete reconstruction of his nature; how was this done? I knew a man who was of a fierce temper, a troubler to his own household when he happened to fall into his fits; he was so passionate at times that I should not like to tell all the wild things which he would do. I have seen that man since conversion, and he has had things to test him which might, as we say, have provoked a saint, but he bore them patiently, and in a manner which I desire to imitate. The lion has become a lamb; he is gentle and tender; no one could think that he was the same man; indeed, he is not, for grace has made him a new man in Christ Jesus.

We have seen persons revelling in licentiousness, who sinned greedily, who could not be satisfied with any common sin; but they have heard the Gospel, and become chaste and even delicate in purity, so that the very mention of their former crimes has shocked them and made them weep. Such persons have manifested a watchful care against the fault in which they once delighted. They have been afraid to go near their old haunts, or to mix with their old companions. What has wrought this? What teaching must that be which accomplishes such marvels?

These changes have sometimes taken place in a brief space of time. Look at Colonel Gardiner, going to keep an assignation of the worst sort, and as he waited for half an hour because he found himself too soon, he saw or thought he saw a vision of our Lord upon the cross, and being reproved and melted by the sight, he fled from the spot, repented, believed, and lived a godly life. Until his death at the battle of Prestonpans, he was one of the leading Christians of his day. "That is an extraordinary instance," says one. I tell you I have met with scores equally remarkable.

WHAT IS THIS CHANGE?

Is it fact or fancy? Do I see the sceptics smiling in a pretended pity for our folly? We are quite able to bear their contempt; will they be willing to hear a little reason? I claim that we have a right to be heard even by those gentlemen who believe only in actual phenomena. This is not to be put aside by a wave of the hand and a sneer; all attempts in that direction are as unphilosophical as they are insulting. We depone to certain operations which we have seen in others and felt in ourselves, by which the current of our thought is changed, our loves and hates have been made entirely different, and our whole manhood has been made anew. These operations we believe to be wrought by the finger of God, and to be proofs that the Gospel is supernatural and true.

A sceptical lawyer in America took it into his head to attend a Wesleyan class-meeting; and he sat down apart from the rest merely to take notes of what was said, as he might have done in a court of law. He knew the persons who spoke one after the other, and bore testimony to the effect of the Gospel upon them. They were his neighbors; and he thought to himself, "If I were arguing a case, and could put these people into the witness-box, and they were on my side, I should feel quite sure of carrying my case; for they are well known for honesty and truthfulness." Several persons, without any collusion, rose one after another, and though their stories greatly varied, yet they all came to one point—that they had believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, and by the power of the Holy Ghost had been made totally new. As the lawyer went out he said to himself, "Their case is proved; I cannot question the truthfulness of any of these witnesses. There must be much more in religion than I thought." This led him to seek the Saviour for himself, and he became a Christian.

III. But I must proceed. Lastly, let us observe the source of faith. "Then the deputy, when he saw what was done, believed, being of the Lord." It is doctrine, then, or faithful teaching, which brings men to Christ. Let those who despise doctrine mind what they are doing, for the doctrine of the cross is only foolishness to them who perish. Under the influence of the Holy Ghost, the plain teaching of the word of the Lord leads men to believe in Jesus. I do not think it is any great good for a preacher to stand up and cry, "Believe, believe, believe," if he never tells you what is to be believed. There is plenty of this kind of preaching about, and the result is sadly transient and superficial. Poor souls say, "We are ready to believe, but tell us what to believe; we are ready to trust, but tell us what to trust in." If we do not preach the great doctrine of the atoning sacrifice, if we do not lift up Christ as suffering chastisement in man's place and stead, we have not put before them the basis on which their faith is to be built. Justification by faith and regeneration by the Spirit must be taught continually.

The proconsul was no doubt astonished to see Elymas blinded, but he was a great deal more astonished at the doctrine which Paul preached when he began to tell him that salvation was not by the works of the law, but by faith in Jesus Christ; that the way to be accepted of God was not by presenting to the Lord anything performed by us or felt within us, but by laying hold upon the righteousness which Jesus Christ has wrought out and brought in. When he heard this good news, he might well be astonished, and yield his heart to Jesus. Dear friends, the most astonishing thing in the world is the Gospel. I say to you who do not understand the Gospel, if you want a refreshing sensation, if you go in for novelty, and desire something off the common, begin to study the Word of God, and to hear it without prejudice. Here is a doctrine which is always news, always glad tidings. Hear and your soul shall live. Turn from it and you will perish.

Come then, my hearers, come and candidly study

WHAT IS TO BE BELIEVED.

Come and be astonished at the doctrine of Christ crucified! Incline your ears, arouse your minds, and yield your hearts; be eager to be instructed of the Holy Ghost, who waits to teach you. If you are willing and obedient you shall eat the good of the land. If you desire to know God you shall know Him. The great Father is not far from any one of you. There is the light! It is not dim, nor far away. The fault is in your eyes if you do not see. Oh, that you would cry out with Bartimeus, "Son of David, have mercy on me." Oh, that your prayer would be, "Lord, that I might receive my sight." Then you would see, and believe, and live forever. God grant it this very morning, to the praise of the glory of His grace. Amen.

GOSPEL WORK AMONG THE HEATHEN.

Incidents Related by Missionaries at Recent Meetings.

Converts who Stand Fire.—The Rev. Hendrick Frend, of China, speaking at a Methodist Missionary meeting, said: "Some of you have seen a picture of a soldier who was being pointed at with the finger of scorn, and some one remarking, 'He stands fire.' Exactly the same thing may be said of the Chinese—they stand fire. A young man came into my congregation one Sunday morning, while I was baptizing two or three native residents. At the close of the service he said he would be very pleased if I would accept him also, and baptize him that day. 'I want,' he said, 'to join the great Church.' 'But,' we said, 'we do not know about you; we must make inquiries as to your character, and ascertain whether you are a fit person to be received into the great Church. Come into the vestry, and if you should be a fit person, then, after proper training and instruction, we shall be only too pleased to receive you among us.' He went into the vestry, and we learned that for some time he had been coming, like Nicodemus, secretly to hear the Word of God explained. He had received the truth into his heart, and was prepared to give himself fully to Christ's service. When his friends heard what he was doing they sent him a letter with the words, 'This letter comes from the God of Thunder himself.' This was done to intimidate the young man, and to lead him to believe that he was incurring the wrath of his friends, and that if he continued in his evil course he must expect the God of Thunder to strike him dead. However, he was not daunted. He came again and again for instruction, and the news that I received from him shortly after I landed in England was that he continued to seek our society, and was now being prepared for admission into Christian fellowship."

A Chinese Pharisee's Conversion.—"In the year 1881 we learned that a young man who had been for a long time seeking to establish his own righteousness by means of works of merit had been led into one of our preaching places, where, having heard the word of life, he was led by the Holy Spirit to embrace the truth as it is in Jesus. What was the result? Why, he began to pray, and next year it was reported to us that in answer to his prayers his father had been brought to a knowledge of the truth, and he is now a member of our society. This religion which we preach to the people lays such a hold upon them that it cuts down to the roots of their superstitions, and they are prevailed upon to give them up."

Living in a "Haunted House."—I was once visiting the city of Fuchan, and heard one of our native preachers, who had just been sent there from Canton. He was addressing a large congregation of heathen Chinese, and he said: "It is not many years ago since I was like yourselves. I was fond of all the festivals; I used to delight in rioting, and all the rest of those things, but a change has come over me. A short time ago I was appointed to the city of Fuchan; when I was appointed it was necessary for me to find a house to live in. I went through the city in search of a suitable house, but could not find one for some time, but at last I heard of a house which was to be let, and ultimately I took it. I was passing through the streets shortly afterward, and informed some of my friends that I had found a house, and they asked me where; I told them it was under the shadow of an enormous pawnshop. 'Why,' they said, 'the place is haunted. If you go there you will see all sorts of spirits.' The missionary, however, laughed and went about his business. He went to the house and stayed there week after week, and subsequently he was asked by his friends, 'Well, have you seen any of those spirits yet?' 'No,' he said, 'I have seen no spirits at all. I have never been able to find out that the house is haunted, and I am able to live there in peace and quietness at a very small expense.' His friends asked him what made the difference between him and other residents. 'It is just this,' he said, 'I have learned to trust in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to believe that His Gospel is the true Gospel, and this Gospel teaches us that we need not be afraid of things like this, such as our old superstition teaches us.'"

The Joy of Leading Men to Christ.—The Rev. John Hutcheon, of India, said: "I am sure Father Calvert on my left hand, and the few senior missionary secretaries, can never forget the purity and the depth of the joy which attaches to the baptism of their first heathen converts. I shall never myself forget the extreme pleasure and delight that I had in the baptism of the first three young men converts in Mysore. I shall never forget the feeling that thrilled through my heart when one of the most bedevilled specimens of humanity that I ever saw, who blasphemed my Saviour for six years as I passed to my schoolroom, became a convert to our religion. When the long arm of Christ went down into the very débris of Hindooism and seized this bedevilled old priest, and washed him and saved him, I could not doubt the conversion of India."

"The Age of Revivals in India has Begun, and the work of our early pioneers has secured magnificent results. In Tinnevelly alone, with 2,000,000 of people, you have no less than 100,000 Christians, or 20 per cent. The very conditions of Indian society are being reversed. The old devil dancers of southern India are now becoming the graduates of the Madras University, the native clergymen of the native church, the public teachers and the leaders of public thought, as well as the most responsible men of southern India; while, as for the old Brahmins, they will by and by be seated by the gate of some Jericho, like Bartimeus the blind beggar. God grant that even in their blindness and their beggary they may take up his cry and say, 'Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy upon me.'"

The Curse of Hindoo Widowhood.—"There are in India no less than 21,000,000 of Hindoo widows. You may find 55,000 of them in Calcutta. You will find nearly 100,000 little widows of ten years of age or below it, who have never left their father's houses, with all that is beautiful and sweet and bright eaten out of their child-life by this terrible curse of Hindoo widowhood. You find them by the thousand sitting on the ground, fasting twenty-four hours twice a week, and weeping for hunger and thirst, with their little mouths parched and dry, and their bodies burned with fever.

A New Tree Inside an Old One.—"On the walls of the city of Canton you will find a very curious growth. There is a tree, the heart of which is almost completely gone, while the outside has still a certain amount of vitality and life. Another tree has grown up within the old tree, and as I have watched it it has been spreading its branches, and growing, and growing, and now it is growing so rapidly that the younger tree is outgrowing the tree that is round it, and getting too big for it, and very soon the old tree will have to succumb entirely to the new. So the Gospel of Jesus Christ has been planted, not within the other trees, not outside the other religions in order to encircle them, but within the very heart of the people. The religion of Jesus Christ goes down to the vital part. It is growing up within the other trees, but is bound to outgrow them, and the time is not far distant when these old trees shall die and fall to the ground entirely, and the new tree shall take its full place."

A CONFLICT IN A SOUTH AMERICAN FOREST.

(See Illustration.)

A MISSIONARY in South America describes, in the course of a narrative of a journey of exploration, the incident depicted in the illustration on this page. It was a conflict between two formidable beasts, in which the ferocity of their natures was exhibited in its intensest form.

The jaguar is one of the most powerful and dangerous of the denizens of the forests of that region. Almost as large as a Bengal tiger, its head massive, its jaws huge, and its feet and claws of immense strength. One of these animals has been known to seize a horse and drag it a considerable distance to its lair. They seldom attack a man, but when pressed by hunger may occasionally be seen prowling around the outskirts of the villages on the lookout for any domestic animals astray, and in such cases the people know that it is wise to keep children in places of safety.

The ant-eater is not a match for such an assailant. Its strength is in its fore feet, which it uses like the bear, its hug being as fatal as that of the bear. From the tip of the snout to the end of the tail the larger specimens measure six and a half feet. They have no teeth, but when attacked and unable to escape they fight with desperation, using their claws with terrible effect.

In the struggle witnessed by the missionary, the jaguar's efforts were directed to getting on the back of its enemy, which the ant-eater for a long time foiled by its quick movement, occasionally getting in work with its fore feet, which rendered the jaguar mad with pain and frenzy. But the conflict was too unequal to admit of any doubt as to its termination, and, as might be expected, the ant-eater at the close lay dead under its powerful enemy.

Such conflicts show how the curse brought upon the world by man's sin is still in force, working its fruit of pain and misery and death even in the animal world. That curse will still operate until He comes, whose right it is to reign. Then and not till then will there be a restitution of all things, and the whole creation now groaning and travailing and waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God will be delivered. Then will come the predicted time when the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together. (Isa. 11; 6.)

AN ORPHAN'S FRIEND.

GAZING from the window of our pretty cottage in the country on the evening of my arrival there with a friend of my girlhood, we saw a happy picture. It was not anything picturesque, but it was pleasant to my eyes. It was simply my two girls out in the garden catching the apples a sturdy little boy was throwing down to them from the limb of the tree. Being asked about this boy by my friend, who knew that the two girls made up my family, I told her his story, which I repeat here for the encouragement of those who may have opportunity of helping the poor.

It was a bleak cold day a year and a half ago, snow overhead, slush underfoot, a piercing wind howling around with a weary, monotonous sound. In the midst of it a little barefooted, thinly-clad boy, whose pale face, wan and pinched, told its own tale, a tale of sorrow, a tale that needed no utterance, for on every feature want was plainly written.

I had been busily employed in visiting various stores in the city, making purchases for my two girls, then about to return to school after the Christmas vacation, when I saw the little lad whom I have described. I had found some difficulty in obtaining what I needed, and was returning home weary and sadly out of humor, when I was accosted by the boy.

The Orphan Boy's Refuge.

"A penny, lady, a penny, kind lady," extending his little hand, numb and blue with cold.

"No, boy, I have no pennies."

Not usually hard-hearted or deaf to such appeals I hurried on, thinking of my dear little ones at home, when suddenly there seemed to flash before my view the words, "Be ye mindful one of another."

A more gentle feeling awoke within me, and I returned in search of the lad. "Here, my boy, take this," I said, offering him a quarter.

For a moment the lad hesitated, but at length took it, saying, "Oh, thank you, thank you, kind lady," and he drew his tattered sleeve across his eyes.

"Do not cry," I said; "are you so hungry? Come, tell we where you live."

He named a street close at hand, which I knew to be the abode of the poorest of the city's inhabitants. It was the spot favored by those in that stage of poverty when the struggle to live without crime is becoming desperate. It was still broad daylight, and I knew there was no personal danger to be apprehended in visiting the place; so when the boy told me his father was dead and his mother was ill and suffering hunger I determined to go home with him.

At last we reached the house, and I followed my guide up dilapidated stairs, which creaked at every footfall. The room we entered had no light, except that admitted by a small window, which through its broken panes also admitted an icy draught, which must have caused agony to a delicate invalid. In the corner of the room, on an old bedstead, lay a woman, pale, motionless, and apparently young.

"Look, mother, dear! such a kind lady has come to see you. She gave me a quarter," cried the boy. Receiving no response, he said, "Look, lady, look, mother is worse! her hands are cold as ice! Why don't she speak? Why don't she answer? Oh, tell me, lady, tell me?" he asked piteously. The truth must be told, and so I answered with gentleness, "My dear, she is dead, and will never speak again; and you are an orphan boy."

The boy was not too young to understand the dreadful words. He threw himself on the body of his mother, crying bitterly, and passionately kissing the poor cold lips. I could not leave him alone in his desolation, and so after speaking to the woman who kept the house, and telling her where to send for the proper authorities, I left, taking the boy with me. Poor as the room was there were evidences in it that the dead woman and her child had not always been so poor. One or two articles, utterly worthless now, indicated that there had been a happier time for them.

I took the boy home, and told my husband the story. We agreed to save him from the streets, and at least give him an opportunity of becoming a better man than would be likely if he were left to the mercy of charity. We sent him down here into pure country air, and put him under the care of the gardener. He goes to school, and in the evening and on holidays helps the gardener about the grounds. Our children have taken quite a liking to him, and he is never so happy as when allowed to do something for them. That is why he is here, and why we take so much interest in him. He has given us no trouble, and what we have done for him is but a small part of our duty as Christians. I think we too often forget that Christ made the poor His representatives and whenever we will we may do them good.

SINNERS AND SUFFERERS.

A SERIAL STORY.

Summary of the Story.

[JOHN MORLEY, a studious bookseller of Little Aston, a widower, marries Rose, a beautiful young lady, who accepts a man older than herself because she is weary of earning her own living. John Morley introduces her to his daughter Hester, who, at his request, promises to love and honor her as long as she lives. Mr. Morley is deacon of a church, and his brother-deacon is Mr. Waldron, a member of Parliament, and an aristocrat. Mr. Waldron's daughter tries, in an injudicious way, to lead the young Mrs. Morley and Hester to the Saviour. She fails, and Mrs. Morley wearies of the dull life she lives. Mr. Waldron's son arrives, and proves to have been, under an assumed name, an acquaintance of Mrs. Morley's before her marriage. He induces her to elope with him, and thus brings heart-breaking misery on Mr. Morley and his daughter. Nine years afterward, having parted from Mrs. Morley, Robert Waldron returns. He is attacked in the street, and wounded. A medical student, Grant, finds him unconscious, and carries him into the nearest house, which happens to be Mr. Morley's. His identity is kept a secret from the man he had injured, but is discovered by Hester. Robert Waldron recovers, and having become attached to Hester contrives to meet her in her visits to the mother of her father's workman, and at Hester's request goes to seek Mrs. Morley, but is unsuccessful. From this point the story proceeds.]

The New Preacher.

At the close of the session Mr. Waldron bade farewell to his constituents, and resigned his seat in the House of Commons. It had been his wish that his son should take his place as the champion of religious interests; but it was very well known that, as yet, Robert Waldron showed no proclivities toward religion; and there was little chance of his being elected by the borough which had known and trusted his father so long. Mr. Waldron still retained his mental vigor, and was disinclined to fall into the inactivity of old age; but his health was breaking, and he was too careful of his life to risk it any further by his conscientious attendance to his parliamentary duties. At home he had yet a post to fill as a landowner, a magistrate, and a member of the church at Little Aston, where he reigned with the absolute sway of a despot.

He settled down as a country gentleman upon his estate at Aston Court, and found it, upon the whole, not unsuited to his taste. He had with him his two children. His son was the most affectionate, his daughter the most pious; he hardly knew which occupied the first place in his heart. For Robert, it was now his great desire to find a wife who would make a home for him, and secure himself from the dread of his son taking flight once more. The yearning of an old man to see his children's children playing about his knees took hold of him. But it was a question whether a husband of sufficiently eminent piety could be discovered for Miss Waldron, who was already approaching a doubtful age, and had not yet seen any one who was, in all respects, worthy of a Miss Waldron.

In furtherance of his own growing desire, Mr. Waldron urged Robert to think seriously of marriage; but when he replied by a request that his father would name the lady whom he would most willingly receive as his daughter-in-law, with a promise that he would then consider the matter, Mr. Waldron was at a loss. He ran over in his mind all the marriageable ladies in the neighborhood, and found none that quite accorded with his own views.

"You ought to choose for yourself, Robert," he said, with a little ill-humor.

"I have no choice," answered his son, meekly.

"Robert," he exclaimed the next Sunday night, after his return from the chapel, where he had glanced during the singing of the hymns once or twice at Hester's sweet, devout face; "Robert, if the thing were not utterly impossible, I would rather have Hester Morley for my daughter-in-law than any other woman in the world."

Mr. Waldron deceived himself. It was this very impossibility which made it possible for him to think of the bookseller's daughter as his son's wife. A good deal of the natural pride of rank was subdued in him, but it was not altogether cast out. Robert Waldron's ears tingled at the sound of this name uttered in such a connection; but he made no reply. It was, of course, a secret to his father that he had ever seen Hester for himself.

"She is exactly the creature that would have suited you," pursued Mr. Waldron, "lovely, refined, and modest; pious, too, for she is soon to become a member of the church. You are satisfied with Hester Morley's state of mind; are you not, my dear?"

"Not altogether!" replied Miss Waldron; "she is not open enough for me. I sometimes fear lest the root of the matter is not in her. But why are you talking about Hester Morley to Robert?" Miss Waldron had but just entered the room, and her father shrank from communicating to her his first frank and inconsiderate utterance.

"I was merely alluding to her," he answered evasively.

But, after this night, Mr. Waldron's mind often reverted to Hester. He looked into his own heart, and found that he had never given to any being, out of his own family, the love he felt for her. As for Robert, he set before himself the impossibility, the insurmountable obstacle, and gazed at it, and pondered over it, till it grew slowly less impossible and less insurmountable. He resolved to conquer it. The impenetrable barrier which lay between them should be removed. The deadly hatred of John Morley—and he had every reason to believe his hatred to be deadly—must be overcome. Hester's own heart, still free, and given neither to Grant nor himself, had to be won. It seemed, on the whole, as if he had very much in his favor—wealth, rank, good looks, refinement, and cultivation. He would set them all against the accusing memory that rose against him. By lifting Hester so far above her station, the wrong would be, in part, balanced which had dragged down Rose into depths far below hers.

The idea of the honor proposed for her never dawned upon Hester. Her interviews with Robert Waldron were not clandestine to her, as they would have been to any other girl. There was no one to inquire where she went or whom she saw; no one to whom she was in any way bound to give an account of her actions. She would almost rather have died than have mentioned Robert Waldron's name to her father. But for herself she did not shrink from seeing him and conversing with him. There was an old childish tenderness lurking still in her heart, which wrapped about him and Rose, as about two beings who had made the brightest interval of her young life. Her knowledge of their sin was vague; and a thickly-woven veil of forgiveness wrought through the long years was thrown over it by her. But the very purity and intensity of her forgiveness protected her. She had never thought of love; and the thought did not awaken at any touch of Robert Waldron's.

It seemed as if Hester was just now brought into more close and frequent contact with the Waldrons. Miss Waldron organized anew her meetings for the female members of the church, and quite naturally Hester became a regular attendant at them. She was then constantly associating with her former teacher and patroness; and though Miss Waldron was not a whit less patronizing than when she was a child, she had grown up to it and thought of it only as "Miss Waldron's way." As to Mr. Waldron, she saw him often at chapel, and he always smiled upon her with a look of admiration, amounting to affection, as she accompanied her gray-bearded father along the chapel isle. "If it had only been possible," he thought each time, "how gladly I would have welcomed her as my son's wife."

Though Mr. Waldron was now a great man, he could look back upon his early days when he had been used to visit his grandfather, the tenant of a small and poor farm, holding a position not much higher than an agricultural laborer. He was not a man to ignore or despise his own lowly origin, though his daughter did both; while Robert was so well content with his present position as to be indifferent to that which had been his grandfather's and great-grandfather's. Certainly, Mr. Waldron had desired him to marry into a good family; but if that could not be, there was nothing in the circumstances of Hester's father, as far as regarded his birth and character, which would render her an unsuitable wife for his son. Two generations back it would have been John Morley who would have been visited with scruples as to the fitness of such a marriage.

Now that Mr. Waldron had no other interests to engage him, he had leisure to give his whole attention to the affairs of the church; and he soon came to the conclusion that the great age and growing infirmities of its old pastor demanded some efficient assistance in the performance of his duties. Since John Morley had withdrawn from all active participation in church matters, the whole power and influence had fallen naturally into the hands of Mr. Waldron, who ruled without a voice being raised against him, or even a whispered murmur among his brethren, who looked up to him from afar off as to one who had an unquestionable authority. When, therefore, he proposed, in a church-meeting assembled especially for the purpose, that a colleague should be elected for Mr. Watson, adding, in a business-like manner, that he would pay him a salary from his own pocket, and not trouble the church with that charge, the proposition was carried unanimously, and with applause; and the choice of the co-pastor was intrusted solely to him.

Not solely to Mr. Waldron, however. It was an all-important charge, and Miss Waldron felt that the chief responsibility rested upon her devoted shoulders, which bore some cross perpetually. In fact the church at Little Aston was governed by her through her father, though perhaps unconsciously so to him. She made the choice of a colleague a subject of prayer in all her meetings, and of very anxious thought in her own closet, which was a handsome and luxuriously furnished dressing-room, where she could meditate for hours without risk of intrusion. It would not do to have a married minister, who might be under the legitimate domination of a wife; yet a young pastor was a somewhat dangerous creature to let loose in her fold of lambs. She balanced the disadvantages of both states with the most profound solicitude, but at length decided in favor of a young minister, who should be entirely free from female influence; the more so as she did not shrink from the necessity of keeping a more vigilant oversight of her own part of the flock. This decision was communicated to her father, but represented under quite a different phase; and Mr. Waldron agreed with her, that they might do some untried but devoted young man an untold good, by introducing him into the ministry under their patronage.
